Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

turing them, the committee have not (as the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. FULLER, seemed to think) considered themselves a private committee, acting on the private petitions of individuals, who sought support and encouragement from Government, at the expense of the nation. They have not examined the petitions or statements of manufacturers, with a view of ascertaining whether their establishments are productive or losing. Their interest has not been a leading motive in our minds: it was of little importance; and if this bill, either in its general principles or its details, cannot be supported on national principles, we are willing that it should fall, and that its fate shall be ours. We have thought that this nation can never be flourishing or independent, unless it can supply from its own resources its food, its clothing, and the means of defence; that, to be dependent on foreign nations for the articles essential for these purposes, is inconsistent with true policy; and that the system which has entailed on us this dependence, must be radically changed. In a matter which involved so many interests, we found many embarrassments—among not the least of them, those which arose from the duties assigned to the different committees of this House. The Committee of Manufactures was a new one; its powers and duties were undefined by any rule; the various subjects referred to them related as well to the revenue and commerce of the country, as its manufactures. It was our wish that each committee should act on its appropriate subjects, not to encroach on the jurisdiction of either. It was our first intention to have reported a bill which should have related only to the manufactures of the country. But the House will recollect that, at a very early period of the session, a resolution was passed, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to report the effect on the revenue of a prohibition of wools, cottons, and iron; that his reply was, that an increase of duty on those articles would impair the revenue, and tend to introduce smuggling. This was a subject on which we knew the House was sensitive; a deficit in the receipts of this year of five millions, had been officially announced by the Treasury. The Committee of Ways and Means had reported no bill, had recommended no means of filling the Treasury, and, to our repeated calls, had answered that none would be adopted by them. You now find that the result of all their deliberations has ended in the bill on your table, authorizing a loan of four millions—two directly, and two from the Sinking Fund, to meet the ordinary expenses of the year. I did not approve of the resolution which had thus called on the Secretary of the Treasury to take a part in this great national controversy, and thought it not right in gentlemen to call in the influence of that department against a large portion of the nation, struggling against what they conceived to be the indifference of our own, and the efforts of foreign Governments. To have framed a bill confined to the sole object of promoting the manufactures of the nation, by imposing a high duty on those of others, the effect of which would have been still further to diminish a revenue already incompetent to our ordinary expenses, would have thrown us in the way of the very difficulty which gentlemen had so early foreseen, so carefully provided against. The cry of revenue, the Treasury, and smuggling, would have effectually defeated all our projects. There was no other committee disposed to act in concert with us. Left thus alone—the Treasury report against an increase of duties; the Treasury itself empty; the Committee of Ways and Means unwilling to assist in filling it, and yet called upon by the petitions of thousands of individuals to do something to protect the industry of the nation—the committee had no alternative but to abandon, subject to certain destruction, the great interest confided to their care, or to go the extent of their jurisdiction, and report a system which, while it would not injure the commerce, should aid the revenue, and save the manufactures of our country. In recommending a general revision of the existing tariff, we are sensible of being exposed to the imputation of encroaching on the province of other committees; but, as they have declined or refused to act, I hope no objections on this score will come from them. From the House I anticipate none—confident in the hope that they will inquire, not so much from what committee this bill emanated, as whether its provisions will promote the general welfare. And if, in the opinion of the House, this measure is called for by the distresses of the country; if it will tend to their relief, and to restore the nation to its former prosperity; if it is essential that such encouragement should ever be given to national industry as will enable us to supply the articles of our own consumption, you have the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury for saying that this is the proper time. In his annual report on the finances, he tells you this in the most explicit language; he tells you, too, that your present revenue is insufficient—you must increase it, or diminish your expenditure.

This is a time of profound peace, when our expenses are those only of an ordinary Peace Establishment; no national calamity has befallen us; yet a loan is necessary for the present year, and a larger one will be required for the next. When a system of revenue has thus completely failed, and from the operation of plain and natural causes; when we cannot flatter ourselves that, in the present state of the world, it can become better, but are certain that it must become worse, it is time to look to our situation, and retrace our error. It is an unpleasant duty in any committee to be obliged to examine existing systems, and recommend a change, but it will be at once perceived that the nation which relies for the means of paying its expenses solely on imposts, must encourage the importation, and not the manufacture, of its article of consumption. Whilst this is its policy, its internal industry must be confined to articles of export, to pay for foreign fabrics which are imported. With importations, revenue must diminish; and this has been the reason why all attempts to promote our own manufactures have hitherto failed. Now the system must be changed; you must either make perpetual loans, or open new sources of revenue, by giving a new turn to the labor of the nation. At all events, I beg gentlemen to consider that, to me, the danger to the Treasury is no answer to this bill: if it is empty, it is not my fault. Two short years since, I was in a proud minority of five that opposed the repeal of those taxes which, if continued, would have given you an abundant revenue. If, in their abolition, the encouragement of manufactures has been retarded, let no inconsistency be charged upon me; if the system has failed, it is not because it has not had its full and fair operation, but because it is inconsistent with the present situation of this country and Europe. You may resort to temporary expedients; but the people of this country will not consent to a continual accumulation of debt, in order to protract a system which can alone heal the general distress. What must be done should be done soon. The able and intelligent officer at the head of your finances tells you this is the time; and I tell you, that you may as well avoid the approaches of old age, or the stroke of death, as a change in your financial system. You must not wait till the voice of the people calls for it in language which you cannot resist, and when the revulsion will be so sudden as to shake to its foundation the system to which gentlemen now cling so eagerly. If this miserable system of impost, as the exclusive source of revenue, is necessary for the support of commerce; if the internal industry of the country is to be checked and protracted till public opinion demands the change, let gentlemen beware lest all parts of the system go together.

Those who now complain that the Committee of Manufactures, propose too much, will, when that day arrives, (and come it must,) regret the rejection of this bill, which proposes a change—gradual, but necessary for the prosperity of the country. In proposing it, the committee are aware that, from one side of the House, we shall be assailed with the cry of—you will ruin commerce; from the other, agriculture; and from all, smuggling and revenue. Intelling us that commerce supports the Government and furnishes its revenues, gentlemen must not deceive themselves in thinking that the people of this country do not know that the consumer of foreign goods, and not the foreigner or importer, pays the impost. The consumption of foreign produce, and not its importation, is the source of the revenue; a kind of taxation the more oppressive on the people, because, by employing the merchant or collector, the consumer pays, not only the amount of duties, but the accumulated profits of all the merchants through whose hands the article passes, from the customhouse to the consumer. If the committee are censured for speaking thus plainly of a system on which this Government has hitherto rested for its support, the House must recollect that, at its organization, impost was only one, not the exclusive source of revenue. As soon as the debts of the Revolution were assumed by the New Congress, a system of excise and internal taxation was resorted to, as a paramount means of paying the interest of the National Debt. During the administration of General WASHINGTON and his immediate successor, an excise on spirits, snuff, and snuff mills, duties on refined sugar, licenses to retailers, carriages, auctions, and a stamp act and land tax, were imposed. Let it not be forgotten that, in the preamble to the act for laying an impost, the encouragement of domestic manufactures was one of the avowed objects of the law. This was the revenue system of the founders of our Government. We do not attack, but rest upon it; it is the only one on which this nation can rely for permanent protection in a time of European peace; we must recur to it, unless another great convulsion should again derange all the institutions of the civilized world. The policy of this Government was changed, not because it was found unwise, but because the continuance of the war in Europe rendered it unnecessary. Then other nations wanted our provisions; their price was such that the labor of this country was diverted from its natural course. Instead of making, we imported the articles of common consumption. The impost was found sufficient for all our wants. But, in the change of events, Europe can now feed herself, and can compete with us in other markets for our provisions. Those nations from whom we import the most, now refuse to receive our produce at any price. Thus there has been a radical change in those relations with other nations, which gave the turn to our national industry. A wise legislature will and must shape its internal policy to meet the changes which make a revision necessary. The present is not a forced, but the natural and settled state of this country. The events of the last thirty years have been unparalleled in history; we must not expect their recurrence, at least in our time. It requires no reasoning to prove that measures calculated on a general war in Europe, will not suit a general state of peace; they must and will be controlled by circumstances. We must look to facts, and profit by experience. Effects will flow from causes; they cannot be averted or avoided; we must meet them sooner or later. It is best not to attempt to conceal from ourselves or the nation the necessity of coming back to the original system on which this Government first commenced its operations. In proposing the measures which the committee have reported, we have thought it best to avow the intention to be such a change in our internal policy as will gradually lead the people of this country to be independent of any other for the essential articles of subsistence, and the means of defence. We well know it is a thankless, ungracious task. The manufacturers complain that too little, the merchants that every thing, and I well know that here it is thought that too much has been done. These measures have caused much excitement. This is not the time to expect that justice will be done to our motives. But the committee have this, and it is no small satisfaction, that, though they have not pleased others, they have pleased themselves. Their system has been matured with much pains, and with the most anxious desire to relieve alike all the suffering interests of the country. How far this bill is so calculated, the House will judge, from an examination and comparison with the existing tariff, which I will now explain, begging that gentlemen will not forget one thing—that the present tariff was a revenue bill, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, more to aid the Treasury than to protect the industry of the country. The report of Mr. Dallas was strongly in favor of domestic manufactures; yet, in that of the Committee of Ways and Means, it is remarkable that the word manufactures is not mentioned. I presume that the gentleman from South Carolina, who was then the chairman of that committee, had then the same opinion on this subject that he now entertains. When gentlemen complain of the extravagant protection that this bill affords to national industry, they are, perhaps, not aware that, in general, it exceeds but in a small degree that recommended, in 1816, from the Treasury, almost exclusively for revenue. They must not think it strange if a Committee of Manufactures, combining this with other great national objects, should have felt it their duty to propose some changes necessary to meet the calls of the country.

The bill proposes—

A duty of 12½ per cent. ad valorem on the articles enumerated in the first class, and 20 per cent. on all not enumerated, which embrace many manufactures, but which it was thought best not to particularize. In the present tariff, these were at 7½ and 15 per cent. The committee could discern no good reason for leaving them at this low rate of duty, and were abundantly convinced that, for the double purpose of revenue and manufactures, the proposed rates were proper. It would be going too much in detail to trace the various rates of ad valorem duties from 1739 to 1804. In that year they were permanently fixed at 12½, 15, and 20; with the addition of the Mediterranean Fund, they were 15, 17½, and 22½, and continued so during the most prosperous period of our commerce and revenue, till, in 1812, when the permanent duties were doubled, making 27½, 32½, and 42½. They continued so until 1815, after the peace, when the Mediterranean Fund ceased, and the duties remained till July, 1816, at the rates of 25, 30, and 40 per cent. ad valorem. Had they remained so, you would not have been assailed by general cries of distress from all parts of the nation; we should have enjoyed, not a nominal, but a real independence; our resources would not have been sent abroad to protect and reward the industry of others, to the ruin of our own merchants, manufacturers, and farmers. But it was thought proper to reduce the duties; and the fear of smuggling, it seems, is assigned as the reason. I am not enough acquainted with the mysteries of commerce to know what is the smuggling point.

Gentlemen may talk about it as they please; there is no evidence that our duties have ever been so high that there has been smuggling to any great extent. From 1804 to 1812 the lowest rate of duties was 12½ per cent.; we heard no complaints then; during the year 1815, and the first six months of 1816, the lowest duty was 25 per cent. The importation of ad valorem articles in 1815, amounted to eighty-six millions of dollars, and gentlemen are called on for the proof of smuggling. They must give reasons better than the mere suggestion of this danger, against this small increase of duties; which is, in effect, only coming back to the old rates before the war. We are not to be deterred by threats of this kind; and, judging from experience, have no fears that an increase of duties, even to the war rates, would produce this effect; but if there was danger, it is no argument to us to be told that this Government is unable to enforce measures which are adopted as necessary to the general welfare. We are not so weak; our laws are not so insufficient; the rates proposed have been collected, and they can and will be collected if enacted. When the danger becomes realized, it will be time to apply the remedy. While it is merely fanciful, and, as I believe, held out to defeat the salutary provisions of this bill, I shall not deem it worthy of further notice. The next rate of duty is 25 per cent.; in the present tariff these articles are rated at 20, but in the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means they were recommended at 22. I hope it will not be thought extravagant that we propose an addition of three per cent. Articles of copper are at present at 25 per cent. One expression is changed, which will be found to apply to most of the ad valorem articles in this bill; in the old tariff it is "material of chief value;" this creates great difficulty at the custom-house, where an article is composed of materials paying a different rate of duty; it is generally entertained as made of that which pays lowest; thus defrauding the revenue and injuring the manufacturer. To avoid this, the committee have adopted the expression "component material," so that any article composed of mixed materials pays the duty of the highest. The House will observe that there is in this clause a drawback of the duties on sheet copper, used in building or repairing ships; in the present tariff "copper and brass in pigs, bars, or plates, suited to the sheathing of ships," is duty free. Under this clause all sheet brass and copper imported, for whatever purpose, is embraced, to the great injury of one class of manufactures, and the diminution of the revenue. While the committee are fully disposed to protect that most noble manufacture, a ship, they are unwilling that any other advantage should be taken of a provision intended solely for this purpose. It is believed that this object is fully answered by the proposed drawback. It has been submitted to intelligent and experienced merchants, and no objections have occurred. While on this subject, I must notice some publications in which the committee are charged with hostility to commerce and ship-building, in raising the duty on sheathing copper and sail duck. The best answer to the charge is, that it is not true; in fact this bill proposes no change on either; the duck is an important article of manufacture, for which we ought not to be dependent on any other nation, and which ought to be encouraged; yet the Committee were unwilling to interfere with it. We expect much abuse and have received no little; but let me give one word of advice to those inclined to bestow it so liberally; read before you write.

The next clause proposes a duty of thirty-three per cent. on woollens. In Mr. Dallas's tariff it was proposed at twenty-eight. On cottons, of thirty-three; the same as proposed by him. Both are now at twenty-five. These being among the most important items in the bill, the House must indulge me in going fully into the reasons which have induced the committee to propose the additional duty. It would seem almost unnecessary to convince this House, that the interest of the nation required that it should clothe itself; that it ought to feed itself, will not be denied; yet food is not more necessary than raiment; and I cannot see how any people can be independent who must look abroad for that. At all events, the committee have thought that, in bottoming this bill on this national principle, that we ought to feed, clothe, and be able to defend ourselves, we placed it on ground that could not easily be shaken. Our motives rise higher than the interest of manufacturers; whether they make or lose money now; whether it tends to enrich one or another, or all classes of society, has scarcely entered into our consideration. The nation must command its own consumption, its own means of defence. The last war found us destitute. I beg the House to remember what the gentleman from Kentucky told us the other day; that our gallant soldiers were destitute of clothing, until the Government connived at smuggling, to procure cloth from the nation with whom we were contending. National feeling, if not interest, should forbid the recurrence of such a scene; it shall not be charged on the Committee of Manufactures. If it was right in 1816 to impose a duty of twenty-five per cent. on woollens and cottons, principally with a view to revenue, there will be found a strong reason for its increase in the duties now imposed by the British Government, of six pence sterling on every pound of wool, and six per cent. ad valorem on cotton wool, imported after the 5th January, 1820. Wool has been an article of export from this country to England. The new duty excludes it; the ports are now shut against your provisions; they will not permit its importation till the price of wheat is ten shillings sterling a bushel. Let those who complain so much that the agricultural interest will suffer by this bill, reflect on these facts. Let the farmer decide whether it is most for his interest to purchase his clothing from the foreign manufacturer, who will purchase neither his wool nor his provisions; or the domestic one, who will give him a market for both, in his anxiety to guard against the profits which may accrue to his neighbors and countrymen, by the success of their manufactures. Let him be sure that he falls into better hands by trusting himself to the liberality of foreigners. It is feared that there will be a monopoly and a desire of speculation, if our own countrymen can supply our demands; yet there seems to be no fear that our course of policy should give that monopoly to the British manufacturers. Hundreds, thousands of our citizens, are out of employment; they would add infinitely to the national wealth, to our independence, and save its resources at home, if their labor was employed in converting our raw materials into fabrics for our own use.

But it is contended that our true policy is to employ the labor of other nations, pay them the profits of their manufactures, for the purpose of directing the industry of ours to productions which can find no market abroad, and have no value at home. These new duties imposed in England on wool and cotton, ought to awaken us to our situation; no part of the country ought to be more alive to their effects than that from which the opposition to this measure is the greatest. England does not wish to encourage the cotton of America. She gives you unequivocal indications of her policy. She will take it till her colonies can furnish her supplies. Though her best customer, though she now depend on us for the raw material to support her manufactures, she takes wool from the continent, cotton from us; but imposes heavy import duties, which are paid by us who consume the manufactured articles. We thus furnish her Government with revenue, her laborers with employment, while ours are idle.

I am afraid we are not aware of the bold and dangerous experiment we are trying. We are now to decide on the course of internal policy which shall best develop the resources, promote the industry, and secure the independence of the country. Is there not some danger of our erring, by adopting the system which best accords with the views of the British Government? If it were submitted to them to choose a set of measures for us which would best promote their interest, we well know it would be such as would secure to their merchants, manufacturers, and mechanics, the supply of all our articles of consumption and defence; to give to them the employment of the labor and the profits of converting the raw materials into fabrics for use. It is the source of their national greatness; the great object to which all their efforts are directed; their policy is most unyielding and unbending. It has existed for ages, and been completed by a steady and uniform series of legislation; they have not left things to "regulate themselves;" this has not been, it will not be, their maxim; but they wish to see it adopted by those who are to be the dupes of their policy. What is sound political economy there, is, it seems, here the raving of madness, the result of empiricism; yet it would excite some sensation in this House if the Ministers of England should formally present us with a plan for our adoption; we should, at least, inquire whether it was the result of their friendship to us, and whether it would not be as safe to trust to the opinion and advice of our own statesmen. To import only our raw materials and provisions, to be our exclusive merchants and carriers, was their colonial policy before the Revolution. The great men whose wisdom carried us through that struggle, did not then think that the system of internal policy which was best calculated to secure our independence and to coerce England to respect our rights, was to afford employment to her citizens, encouragement to her artificers, to the impoverishment of our own.

The immortal Congress of 1774, entered into an agreement not to export any produce to England, to import no goods from that country, to consume none made there; and denounced, as enemies to American liberty, any person who would violate this agreement. It has never been charged on Bonaparte that he was deficient in foresight, or did not understand the mode of attacking his enemy. His continental system was not aimed at the influence or political power of England, but against her manufactures. That he knew to be the source of her power, and there he attacked her. To save them, England fought and subsidized all Europe. There has been a strange revolution in the moral world, if the connexion between causes and effects is now dissolved; if the measures which, in 1774, were necessary to secure, would now be destructive, of the great interests of this nation. We have been taught to look with veneration to that Congress; it is, indeed, a change, when we forget their maxims; and, in contending with the same nation, for the same rights, reject and spurn their principles as wild and ruinous, anxious to adopt those recommended by the Ministry and political economists of England. This is, at all events, a dangerous experiment; before we trust too much on it, we ought to be sure that the solid interests of the country, and not its destruction, is their governing principle. It will be said that more liberal ideas are now adopted by other nations; that the principles of political economy are now better understood. France has been mentioned; but when her tariff is examined, it will be found to be more rigid—to contain more prohibitions than that of England. As to us, it contains some provisions which, I think, cannot fail to alarm the agriculturists, the cotton planters of this country. It is worthy the attention of this House to look at their import duties on cotton wool:

From India, 30 f. per 100 kil., equal to $3 per cwt.
 Other countries out of Europe, 40 f. per 100 kil., equal to $4 per cwt.
 Entrepôts, 50 f. per 100 kil., equal to $5 per cwt.
 Turkey, 15 f. per 100 kil., equal to $1 50 per cwt.
 French colonies, 10 f. per 100 kil., equal to $1 per cwt.

This short item contains much information and instruction. Their whole tariff breathes against your agriculture and commerce a spirit of hostility as unequivocal as any regulation of England; as to cotton more so; it is a duty of four dollars per 100 pounds; equal to 20 per cent. ad valorem, on the raw material, while England imposes only 6; that it is aimed at this country is evident from its being $2 50 per 100 pounds, more than on cotton from Turkey, and one dollar more than from India. If it is a reason why the cotton of Turkey should be preferred on account of the profits of her trade, it cannot extend to India, to which they export little; but ought to bear lightly on us, as we are one of the best customers of France for her wines, brandy, silks, cotton, and small wares. She requires our cotton now, but this duty is an earnest of what you may expect from her when she can procure a supply from her colonies or other countries. She receives your tobacco, but takes care to exclude us from all chance of a competition in the market, by compelling a sale to the Government, who buy at their own price. Rice, from India, pays one dollar per 100; from America, two dollars. Thus, we find the two nations with whom our intercourse is the greatest, pursue the same policy as to our great agricultural products, the only ones they receive from us: they are enriched by the manufacture of it—we purchase immense quantities of their cottons, and woollens, and silks; these favors produce no relaxation on their part. Our agriculture and manufactures are now prostrate, and commerce goes next. With England it is safe, not because it can regulate itself, but because it is regulated by a convention, to the observance of which the national faith is pledged. With France we have none. Your ships are now said to be virtually excluded from their ports. This part of your commerce is now to be protected by regulations—by a bill now on your table, laying a duty of eighteen dollars per ton on French shipping. This code, remember, is not the offspring of the age of benighted ignorance, prejudice, or exploded theories, or of the man against whom all Europe combined; but in 1817, by the Government which has been restored by a common struggle, existing in all the effulgence of the light which has been shed on the subject by their own and English writers on political economy, who are not regarded by the Governments where they live; whose books are for exportation, not for home consumption, and now for sale in your lobby, to enlighten you on the merits of this bill. It is a matter of much regret to me to find their opinions quoted with respect here, when they are disregarded where they are known. There is no country but this that studiously leaves her great concerns to regulate themselves. They are all guarded and preserved by regulations of the most rigorous kind. Yet it seems to be expected that, when our establishments are obliged to contend with those of other countries, the latter, aided by all the force and influence of public opinion and legislation, ours can succeed against this unequal competition, the neglect of Government and public prejudice. If the nations with whom we vie would adopt the same maxims, then the industry of the country would protect itself. All that is asked is to meet regulation by regulation, and thus make the competition fair and equal. Apply to their products the same rule that they apply to ours; if they tax our raw materials, tax their manufactures to the encouragement of ours; if they exclude our provisions, exclude their products; let our legislation keep pace with theirs; then our industry will be protected, foreign nations will be compelled to observe, practically, the rule which they discard from their code, but press into ours—"let things regulate themselves." I shall be satisfied with any course if it is uniform. No regulation, or regulation against regulation. If these views, or any of them, are correct, it will not be thought unreasonable that the committee have recommended an additional duty on cotton and woollens of eight per cent.; it is not so much a protecting as a countervailing duty, to counteract the new duties imposed in France and England on our cotton and wool.

Had these duties existed, or been known at the time of forming our present tariff, it is but reasonable to believe that the duty would have been higher. The proposed addition is certainly moderate, and consistent with every principle of national interest. The minimum has not been changed. It is proper here to remark that, by estimating all cotton goods to have cost 25 cents a yard, and assessing the duty on that sum, the coarser cottons of India have been excluded; and I beg the House not to lose sight of one fact, which is admitted by all to be true, that coarse domestic cottons are now made cheaper than they were ever imported. The remark is equally true of nails, and every other article of which this country commands the consumption. The domestic competition will have this effect on every article. This fact ought to quiet the fears of gentlemen who affect to think that the encouragement of domestic industry tends to take from the many a bounty, for the benefit of the few. Such has been the case in all other countries—those which exclude the importation of foreign fabrics, always undersell those who leave things to regulate themselves. The experience of nations, for ages, cannot deceive us; it is, at all events, not safe to adopt theories, and reject the lights of history and experience. Let us follow the course which has led other nations to greatness; it will be time to prefer theory to fact, to adopt the dreams of speculative writers, when we shall have discovered that the principles which make others rich, will impoverish us; that the path which conducts others to wealth and power, will lead us to poverty and colonial dependence. In a word, that if we sell more than we buy, if our income exceeds our expenditure, we are ruined. That, if the farmer buys his goods from those who buy his produce, and gives it a value at home which it has not abroad, he pays a bounty to the manufacturer.

It will be observed that this bill recommends an additional duty on cottons from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, of seven per cent. and of ten on silks. It was done for these reasons: that the countries whence these articles are imported consume none of our raw materials, afford no market for our produce, employ none of the labor, and exhaust the specie of the country. It is but fair that a preference should be given to the fabrics of those nations who receive from us something in return. There was an additional reason why the committee thought it best to make this discrimination. It is a matter of serious complaint that the duties imposed by the French Government on American tonnage have nearly destroyed our commerce with France. It is now said to be cheaper to send a cargo there in a French ship and pay freight, than in one of ours and pay none; the difference of the duties and charges is estimated at about three thousand five hundred dollars a voyage. This is another consequence of the peace in Europe; every nation is now desirous of reclaiming its own commerce, of carrying its own productions, and bringing back the articles it wants. We have had the carrying trade of the world; the protection of our flag was wanted; now every flag protects itself; the commerce of other nations will be increased at the expense of ours. Regulations which are to produce this effect cannot be called hostile or unfriendly; they result from the desire which all Governments ought to feel of protecting their own interest; it is equally vain for us to expect our commerce to be what it has been, as that the nations of Europe will give ours a preference to their own; (these are maxims reserved for our adoption.) How to shape our course of legislation on this subject is a matter of extreme difficulty. Committees of the House have different plans; a system of commercial warfare is recommended, in the hope that France will relax in hers. We have thought it safest to make an appeal, not to her fears, but to her interest; to give her a peace offering by preferring hers to the fabrics of India, rather than to provoke by excluding her ships from our ports. As it affects merely the manufactures of the country, the latter would be the course to be pursued; for if, in the prosecution of this war of legislation, she should exclude our cotton, the raisers of it will join us in creating a market at home. In thus recommending the measure which is opposed to the interest of those for whose exclusive benefit the committee are said to be acting, we hope to avoid the imputation of hostility to commerce. The navigation acts on your table are bold measures, designed to compel the two most powerful nations of Europe to give up their favorite systems of commercial and colonial policy, not the expedients of yesterday or the moment, but settled, matured, and acted on for more than a century; which have entered into all their favorite plans of commercial and naval greatness. In such a contest there is much risk; if these measures produce the desired effect, I shall not be among the last to rejoice; but if they fail, if, instead of saving they destroy your commerce; if, instead of producing a relaxation, they only add rigor to the regulations they are intended to counteract, it shall not be charged on the Committee of Manufactures that it was a part of their system. Had these navigation acts emanated from us, I well know the clamor which would have been excited; as they have come from the Commercial Committee, they will be hailed by the mercantile interests as the means of restoring commerce, and I hope they may prove so; but, having a different opinion, fearful that this measure would recoil upon us, destroying what it was intended to save, we have inserted this feature in the bill. A duty of 25 per cent. is proposed on linen and a minus of 25 cents. The rate proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means in 1816, was 20; it was fixed at 15. This is one of the most important items of domestic consumption; flax, the raw material, raised in all parts of the country, is not an article of export to any extent; linen is one of the most favored manufactures of England, it pays no excise for home consumption; and the Government pays a custom-house bounty of 25 per cent. (on coarse fabrics) when exported. Woollens and plain cottons receive none; the duty on them, therefore, operates for the double purpose of revenue and a preference of ours over the imported article. But, as to linen, the present duty only operates as a tax on our own consumption, being 10 per cent. less than the British export bounty; affording, contrary to all principles of a wise policy, a decided preference for a foreign manufacture. It is impossible to imagine any sound reason for leaving this most important article so wholly unprotected. In the present tariff, if the committee have erred, it is in not proposing a still higher rate of duty; on coarse linen it only equals the bounty; and then, so far as respects the competition with our fabrics, makes it duty free; on the finer, it has some small operation as a protecting duty. This increase of duty on linen has caused much complaint. The House will now judge with what reason this bill is called an extravagant one. The other objections, when examined, will be found to have no more foundation than this.

The next clause proposes a duty of 30 per cent. on silk from India, 20 from other places: it now pays 15. No good reason could be discovered for so low a rate; it is an article used mostly by the rich; there is less danger of smuggling than on most others; it is imported only in large and valuable ships, and, if from India, is allowed to be landed only in specified ports. A very intelligent merchant from Boston recommended a duty of 83 per cent. on all kinds, from every country alike: there will probably be no objection to the proposed increase. Raw silk is made duty free in this, though in the present tariff it paid the same duty as the manufactured. Printed books are at 35—the same as proposed by Mr. Dallas in 1816; they pay 15 at present. Paper and leather—the raw materials are now at 30; the manufactured article should be higher, as it gives employment to much of the labor and a market for many of the products of the country. If imported for colleges, &c., they are duty free; if for common sale, they are a most important article of consumption, and, like others, should be made at home; if for mere amusement or works of taste, they are fair subjects of revenue: none can better afford to pay taxes than men of leisure and wealth. If any gentleman thinks a discrimination ought to be made, so as to impose a lower rate of duty on works of science and literature, there will be no objection. The other items in this clause are generally at 35 per cent.—the same as recommended by Mr. Dallas—and in the present tariff are rated at 30. The House will thus perceive, that on articles paying an ad valorem duty, the proposed increase is generally from 5 to 10 per cent. If the only protection offered by this bill to the national industry consisted in the mere rate of duties, they will be found not to come up to what are generally called protecting, but would be justified for the mere purpose of revenue. The committee were sensible that if all the protection necessary was in the imposition of high duties, that the cry of extravagance and smuggling might defeat their measures. They have thought the object could be better accomplished by adding such provisions to the bill as would effectually secure the collection of the duties imposed, and so to apportion them as to produce not only revenue by the consumption, but be in some measure a discrimination between the foreign and domestic manufacture. In this view we hope that all will concur.

The mode of ascertaining the value of goods on which a duty is to be assessed, has been attended with much difficulty—an almost constant war between the merchants and the officers of the customs, and has been often changed. The original mode of ascertaining the value “at the time and place of importation,” prescribed by the act of 1790, was the fairest and most equitable; as an ad valorem duty, it was in fact what it purported to be—so much per cent. on the value. But, as a different standard of valuation has long since been adopted, it was thought best not so much to alter as to modify it. The mode proposed in this bill has been pursued; but the Committee are not tenacious on this point. There is, however, one feature in this clause which is deemed of infinite importance to the manufacturing interests, and which the House must indulge me with explaining. It is the addition to the valuation of all drawbacks, bounties, premiums, and allowances, which are paid by foreign Governments on exportation, and assessing the ad valorem duty on the aggregate value thus ascertained. It is somewhat singular that our system of imports, which is avowedly for the double purpose of revenue and the protection of our own manufactures, should have overlooked this provision, which is indispensable for the latter. The House will at once perceive that, if the foreign export bounty equals our import duty on the same article, the duty is only a tax on the consumption of our own citizens; the foreign article comes into the market on the same terms as the domestic; this is fully exemplified in the article of linen. The British Government pay the exporter 25 per cent. bounty; ours, charging the importer 25 per cent. import duty, it thence becomes duty free. At the present duty of 15 per cent. the importer has a clear profit of 10 per cent. after paying our duty. This is certainly left-handed protection to manufactures. Hence it is, that, without inquiry into the cause, we are told you are unreasonable; no duties will satisfy you. The great reason why many of the present ones are incompetent is, that they are checked and rendered unavailing by this artful and masterly system of bounties and drawbacks. It is the true secret by which to account for the immense wealth and power of a nation whose population but little exceeds our own. She is too wise to trust to imports as the sole source of revenue—commands her own consumption, draws the chief support of her Government by an excise on her manufactures; they afford materials and open new sources of commerce; her system of bounties enables her to undersell other nations in their own ports, while her political economists mislead us by their speculative and ruinous theories. The article of linen fully illustrates her policy. Though her taxes and expenses are enormously oppressive on the people, yet the makers of linen pay none, no excise on their materials or manufacture; to encourage this fabric, which unites the three great interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, she wisely apportions the burdens of her Government so as to leave this unembarrassed. This accounts for the cheapness of the article at home, and, added to the enormous bounty on the export, gives the true reason for underselling us. Let the British abolish this system, let an article pay the same price for home consumption as for exportation, it will then be seen there is not much difference between manufacturing here and there. One article pays an enormous excise, another none; let them be equalized, and neither have an export bounty, in the aggregate it will be found that we could meet them in market, if not without any, with a small rate of protecting duty. Let cottons, woollens, and linens, pay the same excise as glass, beer, and spirits, and cost to the consumer in this country as much as they do in England, you would be called on for little further protection to our industry. The manufacture of these articles pays no part of the expenses of their Government, is burdened with no taxes, because they are the sources of their greatness, the machinery by which they draw to themselves the resources of all nations who purchase them; retaining us, their commercial, naval, and political rivals, in a state of colonial vassalage. It would be right and fair to aim at once at this system, by adding to the ad valorem a specific duty equal to the bounty paid, and drawback of excise allowed on the exportation. Then our duties might be called protecting ones, and be said to afford efficient protection to our manufactures; then the competition would be, on national and individual grounds, a fair one; but the committee, aware that this is the first attempt to introduce such a principle into our code, that it would not be prudent to attempt too much at once, only propose to consider the bounty and drawback as a part of the original cost on which the duty is to be assessed. To exemplify this—on linen a duty of 25 per cent. would only counteract the bounty; we recommend the addition of only one-fourth of that amount. It is not to introduce a war of legislation, but in some measure to counterveil the association of their system; increased duties will be imperative when they are evaded by increased bounties.

I hope these principles will meet the approbation of the House; if they do not, all our laws will be vain; we had better say at once to those who want protection, "let things regulate themselves." If it is proper to act at all, we must act efficiently; the interests of our country are assailed by an enemy deep in his designs, persevering in their execution, governed by a spirit ever awake and watchful, deterred by no opposition, subdued by no difficulties—the wisdom and the resources of a mighty empire directed to one great object, the supply of foreign nations with the articles of consumption. Great as she is, we can meet her in open war, can beat her on the land, the water, and in the Cabinet, but succumb in legislation; become the dupes of her policy, quietly indifferent to the exhaustion of our resources, which flow to her in one constant increasing current. Our dependence on her almost daily increasing, she exulting in the successful operations of her policy, relieved from the expense of governing us, enjoying all the benefits we could afford her as colonies.

When other interests are endangered by foreign powers or regulation, you are not backward in resisting them at the risk of a war; if a ship or cargo is seized, a seaman, native or naturalized, impressed, or discriminating duties imposed on tonnage, you do not leave things to "regulate themselves;" every thing is protected, every thing defended, but manufactures—these alone are unworthy of national protection. Decrees and orders in council that embarrass commerce are not suffered to operate unmolested, but a system of bounties and drawbacks, destructive not only of interests equally important, but in their consequences involving all in one common destruction, are practically opposed only by the favorite maxim, leave us alone, let them regulate themselves. I hope we shall extend it to all, or be consistent and apply it to none. We are independent in name, have the powers of self-government, but tamely content ourselves with being dependent on our rival for articles of necessity and the means of defence. We cannot clothe or arm our soldiers, build or equip a navy, without procuring from England the means. National pride and honor ought to revolt at the degrading reflection. I hope to see the day when, in full command of our consumption and means of defence, our resources retained at home, our great interests safe from foreign competition, we shall be in fact, as well as in name, free and independent States. This consummation will not be brought about by folding our arms and leaving the industry of the country to regulate itself. It was not thus that, in the first Punic war, you emerged from colonial dependence; that, in the second, you successfully defended your dearest national rights. Before we can be what our resources enable us to attain, you must wage the third Punic war, not of arms, but of legislation; assail our rival where she is vulnerable, in the source of our greatest danger; her systems of bounties, drawbacks, and premiums, and in her manufactures, where the Congress of 1774 assailed her; go at least as far as self-defence will authorize—protect our own.

The bill proposes an additional duty on hemp of twenty dollars per ton; it was deemed necessary that, for an article of the first necessity, without which we could neither build nor equip a ship, we should not be dependent, as we now are, for the supply on foreign nations. In case of a war, all our naval preparations might be suspended until it could be produced here. It is so essential for national defence, that we must command enough for our own consumption. Viewed as an agricultural production, which was formerly raised in great quantities in the Western States, but which has been destroyed by foreign competition, or as a manufacture, it equally deserves protection; at a time when our provisions, excluded from foreign markets, do not command a price which pays the expense of cultivation, when the agriculture of the country is as depressed as its manufactures, it needs at least so much protection as to enable it to compete with foreign productions. These reasons, it is hoped, will exempt the duty on this item from the charge of hostility to agriculture. This article now pays a duty of thirty dollars a ton, the wholesale price of which is two hundred and forty dollars, equal to twelve and a half per cent. ad valorem; the proposed increase will be twenty-one per cent. If considered as a manufactured article, essential for consumption and defence, it is hoped that the propriety of the increased duty will be apparent, as it can be raised to an amount far beyond the demand; the domestic competition will make the increased price on the imported article but temporary. The same apply to the additional duty on cotton, and the further one, which must meet with general assent, that, if the manufacturers of cotton supply the country with their fabrics, they ought to use our own raw material, and not import it from India. The cotton planters must not indulge in fancied security. In 1817, the foreign cotton imported and consumed in the United States was 1,700,000 pounds; in 1818, 4,000,000; in 1819, it amounted to 6,700,000; when they find it thus increasing, and France and England imposing high duties on its importation, they ought to be awakened to the necessity of at least securing the domestic market, not trusting entirely to the foreign. The day may not be very distant, when they will find from experience that their favorite maxim of "let us alone" will apply as little to agriculture as it now does practically to commerce.

I now come to two items on which the House will not only expect, but require me to say something—glass and iron; one infinitely interesting to the district, the other to the State I represent. It is best not to mince matters, but to speak plainly. This has been called a Pittsburg, a cut-glass bill, local, partial in its operations; and I have been charged with framing it from interested motives. Gentlemen had better be cautious how they use the word Pittsburg as a name of reproach; it may be, like the term whig—one of pride, and not of disgrace. I tell the House frankly, that I have not lost sight of the interest of Pittsburg, and would never perjure myself if I had; but the charges shall be met plainly, and if you are not convinced that the interests of that place are identified with the nation; that cut glass can be defended on national grounds, then I agree that Pittsburg, its Representative, its favorite manufacture, and the tariff, may go together. I will rest the whole bill on this item, and freely admit that the increase of duty on glass, plain, not cut, is among the greatest proposed. In selecting articles worthy of national protection, none are more eminently deserving of it than those, the raw materials of which are of no value for exportation; the conversion of which into articles for use, produces something out of nothing—turns into manufactures of the greatest value and beauty the worthless produce of the earth—furnishes a market for the productions of the farmer—gives employment not only to laboring men, but boys who would otherwise contract habits of idleness and vice. The foreign material bears to the manufactured article the proportion of twenty-five cents to one hundred dollars; the rest is the product of our own soil: small quantities of ashes, and lead, the principal material—sand, which is fit for no other purpose, not even to make mortar—stone coal, the machinery. In the days of our prosperity we have made to the amount of a quarter of a million of dollars worth in a year. It was so much money extracted from the bowels of the earth by the labor of hundreds, adding to the wealth and comfort of all within the sphere of its action. Now we make, I may say, none. Will gentlemen tell me who has profited by the change—the farmer, the laborer, our country, or the foreign manufacturer? Plain glass now pays an impost duty of twenty per centum; it is proposed to raise it, and make it specific, ten cents a pound. In England the impost duty amounts to a prohibition; made there, it pays for home consumption an excise of £4 18s. sterling on the 100 weight—on exportation there is a drawback of the excise, and a custom bounty of one pound five shillings sterling, making in all six pound three shillings, equal to twenty-eight cents a pound between the price to the consumer in England and here. The custom-house bounty alone amounts to near six cents a pound; and from this document, taken from the custom-house in Boston, it appears that, in an invoice amounting to one hundred and twenty-nine pounds in value, the British bounty amounts to one hundred and twenty dollars, our import duty of twenty per cent. to one hundred and fourteen, leaving a clear profit of six dollars. With the addition of the excise drawback on an invoice of five hundred and fifty pounds sterling, the importer, after paying all export duties, freight, insurance, commission, and all charges, makes a clear profit of fifty-one pounds. Has not this article peculiar claims on us for protection? The present duty is a mere tax on the consumer; it operates as no discrimination between ours and the industry of other foreign nations, but leaves it to struggle against the effects of a positive premium on importation. The proposed increase will not, as a protecting duty, amount to more than twenty per cent. ad valorem; on cut glass it is only proposed to add five per cent.; the duty is now thirty. I am aware of objections to the duty on plain glass, and am sorry to find them come from manufacturers, glass cutters, not makers, but importers of plain glass, who are not satisfied with thirty per cent. on cut glass, and represent plain as a raw material, which ought to be duty free. In Pittsburg it is both made and cut, and the House will judge who is most actuated by national principles, which plan adds most to the sum of national wealth, industry, and resources. Gentlemen are mistaken in supposing mine an iron making—it is an iron buying, iron consuming district. The time has been when six thousand tons were purchased annually, not one of which was made in the district; but to the State of Pennsylvania it is of the utmost importance; it is her staple manufacture; to the nation the all essential article for private consumption and public defence. It ought to be less interesting to us, whether it requires protection, whether the establishments for its manufacture are declining or prosperous, we can and must supply ourselves. Every part of the Union abounds with the raw material; it is perfectly worthless for all other purposes—not fit for roads. The working of it not only employs much of the labor, but furnishes a market for much of the produce of our soil. These good effects are not confined to a small space. An instance of this occurs in the fact that the iron works in the interior of our State are supplied with bacon from Kentucky. The remark is true of this, as of all other manufactures, that the farmer is among those who derive the most profit from their success. It is a matter of most perfect astonishment that so important an article should have been not only so perfectly and wantonly abandoned by the present tariff, but pointedly selected for reprobation by a strange policy, which, whilst it raised the duties on most other articles, reduced that on iron nearly one hundred per cent. From 1804 until 1815, it was at seventeen and an half per cent., and until 1816, at fifteen—a duty which might have been saved these interesting establishments, thus apparently destroyed by design. Pigs and castings, in 1816, paid fifteen per cent. ad valorem; bar iron nine dollars per ton, equal to, say nine per cent. ad valorem; in 1818, the duties were increased to fifty cents a hundred on pigs, seventy-five on castings and bar iron. In this House it was raised to twenty dollars a ton by a majority of forty-seven, but reduced in the Senate to fifteen. Had the duty been a proportionate one in 1816, a rate lower than the one now proposed would have been sufficient to have insured a domestic supply; but the reports of the Treasury present us with facts which call for immediate and efficient interference. In 1818, the importation of bar iron exceeded sixteen thousand tons; in 1819, it amounted to near twenty thousand. The decrease of ad valorem importations in this year has exceeded $19,000,000, while the increase of bar iron has been near four thousand tons. Comparing it with cotton, there are many more national reasons for its protection: the materials of one can be exported, but the other cannot; we send out of the country near $2,000,000 annually, for an article we could make at home, and out of materials perfectly worthless in themselves. The rate of duty is not unreasonable in itself, or disproportionate to other items in this bill or the old tariff. On the first of this month the wholesale price of it was, according to the New York and Philadelphia prices current, from one hundred to one hundred and ten dollars a ton. Calculating on the price at the place of importation, the fairest mode of fixing an ad valorem duty, it would be only twenty-five per cent., the same as on cottons and woollens now, and eight per cent. less than is proposed—five less than on leather and paper, in the present, and ten less than is proposed in this bill on the former. Considering it as an article abandoned in the former tariff—that what will restore the declining will not reanimate the dead—that, in the embarrassment and distress of the last year, the importations have rapidly increased, while others diminish, I confidently hope that, in affording to this a protection equal to other articles, no objection will or can be made by those who profess to be friendly to the system.

Iron is certainly an article of necessity, but not more so than clothing. It is called a raw material; we would as soon apply this term to a ball of cotton yarn or a piece of broad cloth. This word raw material is strangely misunderstood. The glass-cutter calls plain glass; the iron-founder pigs; the rope-maker hemp and flax; the copper-smith and brazier brass and copper in sheets and still bottoms, raw materials; while the makers of these articles call them manufactures, and petition for protection. I believe the safer rule is to consider that which is taken from the earth as the raw material, and every change in its form or value, by labor, as a manufacture, equally entitled to encouragement. It is certainly true policy to afford it to every thing which can be made at home, especially when the material can never become an article of export; the extent of the protection to be regulated by the amount of importation—the deficiency of revenue supplied by an excise on the manufacture protected. The increased duty on molasses has excited much opposition and some feeling of those who seem to consider it partial and oppressive. I must ask a candid review of the principle on which this bill has been framed, the situation in which the committee has been placed, and, with an assurance that no feelings of mine can be gratified by bearing hard on my native country, beg them to look at this item on national grounds. Pressed with petitions from every class of manufactures, praying for high duties on foreign articles which interfered with theirs; sensible that something ought to be done, yet beset with difficulties on all sides, unaided and alone, we were thrown on a forlorn hope. A partial, local system would have insured its own defeat; a general one might impair the revenue. To avoid that, to shape our course to meet the interests of a nation so widely extended as this, one might almost say twenty-two different nations, divided at least into great sections, some engaged almost exclusively in agriculture, some in commercial and manufacturing pursuits, and some in all, was attended with uncommon trouble. We are not disappointed in finding other motives attributed to us, but disclaimed, which are not founded on the general principles avowed by us. In proposing increased duties on the various articles in this bill, there seemed few, if any, on which so many reasons could be brought to bear. The article is bulky, cannot be smuggled, and aids the revenue. The transportation of it from the South employs as much shipping as from the West Indies. It cannot injure commerce; still less so, if you adopt the navigation act which stops the intercourse with the British islands. View it as a produce of the soil or a manufacture, it is as much entitled to protection as any other. This bill tends to essentially aid the manufactures of the Northern and Middle States; it is but fair that they should exchange them for the productions of the South; buy from their customers, their friends, and countrymen. As an article of domestic consumption, it is not of much importance; to a family which consumes twenty gallons in a year, the increased duty is one dollar. The wages of the child employed in a factory put in operation by this bill, which would otherwise be idle, would pay it in two days. If distilled, and the spirits exported, there is a drawback of the duty; if for home consumption, the fairness of the duty is at once apparent.

The present duty on a gallon of the lowest proof rum is 42 cents; if distilled from molasses, it now pays $7\frac{1}{2}$; at the proposed rate, 15; there can be no rational reason for this great difference, when an article of consumption is made from a foreign material which can be produced at home. If the domestic product is encouraged, the spirit distilled is duty free. With these strong reasons, the committee could not overlook this article; my mind is not better satisfied with any one in the bill. We could not, with any justice to ourselves, recommend to the House a system which should not embrace, as far as practicable, the interest of all alike; it is in vain to expect the concurrence of such a body as this to any measure of partial operation. Take any one item in this bill, some part of the country will object to it, and if confined to one alone, there would be a majority against every one.

Gentlemen must look to the whole, and not confine their inquiries to what bears hard on sectional interest; extend them to the benefits derived; viewed in this light, the balance will not be found against the part of the country from which the opposition to this duty principally comes. An increased duty of five cents a bushel is proposed on salt; most of the reasons which apply to others will to this article, but there are some which do so exclusively; if it is at all sound policy to command the consumption of our articles of necessity, it is emphatically so of this, which can be made anywhere, and for which, in a cessation of commercial intercourse, a most enormous price is imposed. It is a manufacture, the raw material of which is the ocean, the principal machinery the fire; nature does the greatest part of the labor. It is an important item of revenue. The present price in the interior is from one dollar to one dollar and fifty cents per bushel; on the seacoast, say 70 cents; it is said that such a duty should be laid as may tend in some measure to equalize the cost to the consumer.* The duty on spirits is not altered; it is an important source of revenue, and cannot be spared; the present rate is high; the committee wished to have increased it to prohibition; but it was not in their province to submit an excuse to supply the deficit of revenue. We well know that to take, in one item, 2,500,000 dollars from an already exhausted treasury, would destroy the whole bill; yet I feel authorized to say that none would more cheerfully concur in the prohibition of foreign spirits, and an excise on domestic, than the Committee of Manufactures. It may be proper here to observe, that that committee did not act on the items in the bill printed in italics, except brown sugar and molasses; this list was furnished to us, with a view to revenue, by a gentleman whose situation brought that subject under his consideration; for any other purpose we have no anxiety to retain them.

The fourth section allows a drawback of the duty on tin and copper when made up and exported; this is a new feature in our system, but deemed necessary for the double purpose of aiding the manufactures and commerce of the country. It would have been extended to other articles, but it was thought better not to make the bill too complicated, or to go too much into detail. The foundation once laid, it can be built on hereafter. The manufacture of these articles for the West India market, would be a source of employment to our labor, and profit to the employer, if enabled to compete with the same articles made and imported by others. With a duty of twenty per cent. our workmen would be excluded; with this drawback, they come in on equal terms. These articles present the commencement of a system which we must some day adopt, and which will make the foundation of our prosperity unshaken. It consists in imposing such an import duty as will secure us our home consumption; an excise on consumption, (for revenue;) on the exportation, a drawback of excise; thus making the manufacture of one article exemplify the policy and all the great objects of Government. The remainder of the bill, except the 9th and 10th sections, is copied from the present law; those sections have been inserted with the sole view of guarding against frauds which exist to a very great extent, and which, if not checked, will completely counteract principles of vital importance to the system we have recommended. Fears have been entertained that the 10th section will be injurious to the fair commerce of the country. It is not so intended, and can be so modified as to secure the objects of the committee, without injuring an interest equally worthy of national protection as the one I am advocating. If it cannot, I will consent to strike it out, for I am no enemy to commerce.* This is not the time to make professions; they will not be believed till the excitement occasioned by this and the other bills reported by the committee shall have subsided; when they are calmly examined, there will be found no evidence of a disposition to protect one at the expense of the other great interests of the nation: all are alike depressed, presenting equal claims on a government designed for the common benefit; struggling against foreign competition and regulations; all parts of the country require your protection. The committee, adopting the opinion of the Treasury, that this was the proper time to effect a change in our internal relations, have not, in recommending this measure, overlooked these interests. It makes ample provision for revenue; if the imports continue the same as in 1818, the increased duties add $5,800,000. It must be matter of conjecture, how far the diminished importation will equal or exceed the increased duties; if the system of imports is alone to be relied on, if you will resort to no other, it is your duty to make the most of it; not to attempt to support it by loans and taking the Sinking Fund, as proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. If you will cling to it, I hope you will not reject this bill because it aids manufactures as well as revenue; that those who are so sensitive on the state of the Treasury, and object to this, will propose a better mode of apportioning the burdens on the consumer. Pass this bill, reduce the credits of the custom-house, impose a duty on auction sales—you want no loan; the cry of revenue will be hushed by an union of those who wish to fill the Treasury and protect our own industry. But we understand each other very well: revenue is one of the alarm bells to defeat this bill; those who raise it, well know, that for the present it makes ample provision, but that for the future a new system must be adopted; one which must combine the protection of the great interest which they oppose. As it is inevitable, it is better to come to it gradually; if postponed till the voice of the country makes an imperative call, do not blame us if the revulsion is sudden, and the shock violent.

In five short years your impost has diminished from thirty-six millions to sixteen, more than three millions of which is now in suit. Your expenditures are twenty-six millions in a state of peace. It requires no spirit of prophecy to tell that the income will not meet the expenses; you must resort to new means; to internal taxes, to excise. In using these words I will not be misunderstood: by internal taxes I mean not direct ones on land, but on auctions, pleasure carriages, watches, expensive furniture, &c.; in other words, those taxes on the rich and money-making classes of society, which were repealed two years ago, when a temporary overflowing of the Treasury induced you to abandon the original financial system of revenue, and trust alone to imposts. By excise I mean a tax on the domestic manufacture which is protected from foreign competition. Excise has been an odious term, but it will soon be understood and divested of its terrors. To the consumer it makes no difference whether he pays to the merchant two dollars impost on a pair of boots, or the same amount of excise to a shoemaker; to a farmer, whether he pays five dollars impost on his coat, or five dollars excise to the manufacturer. There is, indeed, one difference, and that contains the sum and substance of political economy—he can pay the manufacturer in wool and provisions. The merchant he must pay in money; he must remit it to England; she excludes our produce and raw materials. This illustrates the difference between impost and excise; the first turns the whole attention of the Government to encourage the importation of foreign productions, as the means of imposing a tax on the consumer. If the country commands its own consumption, importation and imposts cease; now every thing becomes subservient to revenue and to commerce, as the means of transporting the instruments of taxation. Such a system necessarily checks, if not destroys, our internal industry. Domestic manufactures paying no tax, the encouragement of foreign, is the inevitable consequence.

Whether this system is beneficial to the nation, is no longer a matter of opinion, but of history. The late war totally destroyed the imposts; you were left without revenue; foreign importation ceasing, the manufactures of the country sprung up and flourished. Amid all the pressure and privations of the war, the people grew rich and were able to pay taxes to the amount of $12,000,000 in one year. How much could they afford to pay now? The peace found the national resources untouched, the nation strong, and the people contented: while the war duties continued, there were no complaints; revenue was abundant: commerce flourished; manufactures prospered; farmers rolled in wealth; not a murmur was heard against taxes; even when you repealed them, there was but one solitary petition on your table praying for the measure. It was most strange, after this experience of the salutary effects of the then state of things, that there should have been a recurrence to the old system, which must be again abandoned on every fluctuation of our commerce and foreign relations, which can never be permanent, but is in its nature temporary; resulting from the chapter of accidents, relied on by no nation but ours, and by us found insufficient by experience. Even at this moment, when our opponents are so alarmed about it, we have made up our minds to vote for a loan after this bill should have been defeated, for fear it will impair this noble and beautiful system of impost. You will, before you adjourn, contradict your declaration, that the system is good, and the revenue sound, by a "be it enacted," and the legislative declarations of the three branches of Government pronounce that it is found wanting. This is no time for concealment; the House will not understand me as attempting to disguise my views on this subject. If national industry is ever to be protected; if we are ever to command our own consumption; the system of revenue must be changed; part impost, part excise. While you rely exclusively on the first, it is in vain to expect that sound measures of national policy can ever be adopted. A temporary check on foreign importation may, for a time, give a favorable turn to the labor of the nation; but, in their recurrence, our establishments must fall. Do nothing, or do something permanent and efficient, so that there may be some assurance that the national industry will not be exposed to abandonment by every varying motion of foreign policy. Restore a confidence now destroyed: bottom your revenue on the manufactures of the country; then both are placed on a foundation which combines the support of the Government with the best interests of the nation.

We are told that this bill will destroy commerce: this is not an unexpected alarm; it was raised when the last tariff was passed; it is equally loud when any measure is proposed which adds a cent or a dollar to a duty on importation. Joined with smuggling we shall always hear the cry repeated, when any measure is proposed not tending to the exclusive benefit of that interest. I had indulged a hope, that, at this time, when the commerce of the country was as prostrate as our manufactures, when both are pressing us for protection from the same dangers, that its friends would have made common cause, and joined in a common struggle for self-preservation. The hope was not a sanguine one; commerce has been too long a pet, the spoiled child of Government, to think there are any other interests worth protecting. The mere creature of legislation, raised to importance by our laws and the expenditure of a great portion of our revenue for its support, commerce has presented herself as the Atlas which supports the Government, the country, and all its great interests; now, it seems, she cannot support herself. Yet, while approaching you in a suppliant posture, praying for a bankrupt law, to save her merchants, navigation acts, her shipping, she still retains the spirit, still thinks that all legislation must be for her benefit; boldly claiming the rights of primogeniture; loudly protesting that any thing done for the other children of the nation is her destruction. While this is commerce, "I am against it;" but if she claims equal protection, or even a double portion in her favor, I will go as far as any man in this House to support the fair trade of the country.

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

Important as I think manufactures, commerce is no less so; but I must be understood as not meaning that commerce which is confined to the export of raw materials and the import of manufactures for home consumption, which adds nothing to the labor and wealth of the nation; only draws from the consumer what he ought to retain at home—our resources to enrich other nations; but that commerce which, by the carrying trade, the export of foreign produce, and our own manufactures, draws wealth from others to us; equally promoting the great interests of the country. The friends of commerce may boast of its importance and profits, yet they well know that even to the merchant, the export of provisions, and import of goods for domestic consumption, has been a losing business. Examine their ledgers for the last thirty years; they will find it would have been cheaper to have bought bills than to remit produce. I well know that the export of produce down the Ohio has been unproductive; the first price has never come back to our country. The history of the country, the public documents on your table, prove the fact as to the seaports, that the only profitable commerce has been the carrying trade; the re-export, the drawback system, the same for which a permanent foundation has been laid in this bill.

It is admitted that the flourishing period of our commerce was from 1802 to 1812, the best years 1806 and 1807; it has been declining since the peace—1816 and 1817 very bad years; the worst was 1818; yet the average amount of exports for the first period was less than in 1818 by one million. There was this remarkable difference:

From 1802 to 1812 the average exports amounted to	$69,171,000
Domestic produce, $38,157,000; foreign	31,014,000
1818, whole amount of exports	70,142,000

Domestic prod.	$50,976,000;	foreign	$19,165,000
1806, net revenue	16,081,000;	drawb'ks	9,709,000
1807,	16,493,000;	"	9,995,000
1818, revenue rec'd	25,832,000;	drawb'ks	3,343,000
1816,	32,786,000;	"	4,830,000
1817,	22,082,000;	"	3,937,000

These facts present you with a history, and account for the rise and decline of commerce as well as manufactures; they require no comment, but afford much for reflection: they show the kind of commerce worth protecting, in which I will be behind no one at all hazards, even of a war. Left now only in the enjoyment of the export of our produce and the importation of articles for consumption, we are losing the carrying trade—not for the want of laws to protect it, but for this evident reason, that the commercial nations of Europe can be their own carriers, import directly from their own colonies; they are not to be diverted by navigation acts; other means must be adopted to restore our commerce and give employment to our shipping. We must do as all other nations have done—make ourselves carriers by creating materials for trade. None ever become so by being the consumers of the manufactures of others. In a settled state of things, commerce cannot exist without manufactures—the one is the basis and affords the materials of the other. While it is thought bad policy to supply ourselves, we cannot expect to supply others: it is in vain to hope for employment for our ships when we have nothing to export which will pay expenses; equally vain to place our faith in measures intended to coerce its employment by other nations, in opposition to their interest. Ships, commerce, and colonies, is their maxim. It would be ours in like circumstances.

The agricultural class of the country seem alarmed at this bill; with what reason it is certainly difficult to divine. Their situation is not more enviable than that of the other great interests. The ports of Europe and the British West Indies are closed against their provisions: some are actually imported for our own consumption. Havana has been a good market: the last accounts from that place represent the market completely glutted with provisions. Rice dull at five dollars; flour thirteen dollars, duties nine dollars; upwards of twenty thousand barrels had arrived there from ports in France, and from St. Andero, in Spain, and further supplies expected from the same quarter. Wheat in the interior thirty-seven and a half cents a bushel; flour at your farms three dollars, and four dollars in the seaports; excluded from foreign markets, you complain that we are about creating a domestic one.

Thus it is when the time has arrived in which all the great interests in the country, being equally prostrate, and one general scene of distress pervading all its parts, there was a reasonable hope of a union of sentiment, and a common effort to restore us to what we were. When the path we propose is consistent with the experience of all nations as well as our own, we are met on all sides with the chilling cry of—Let us alone; leave us to regulate ourselves. You have regulated yourselves till legislation is necessary to restore. Remember, if the revenue has failed, if commerce is without employment, and agriculture has no market, manufactures have not caused it. One would think, in hearing the various cries of danger from this source, that they were progressing with giant strides till their interest had become a Brobdignagian among the Lilliputs. It seems to be forgotten that it is writhing almost in the agonies of death; far from being able to injure others, it cannot save itself; and it is as low as its worst enemies could wish it. All have alike sunk beneath the effects of foreign policy, and your indifference: laid low alike, struggling side by side. The three great interests of the country are to be restored only by your interference; they call on you in sepulchral tones, equally to warn you of past errors and imploring for future aid. But, sir, listen to all alike; do not let revenue, crying for a loan, commerce for bankrupt and navigation acts, drown the voice of manufactures, asking for protection. Do not, after imparting your favors with a liberal hand to the others, reply to the calls of this great interest—"regulate yourselves." You will not say so to commerce: you will give her regulations, and enter on a legislative commercial war for her protection. But you will poorly answer to the nation for your partiality—that it is of no national importance who produces, raises, or makes our articles of consumption; that may regulate itself: it is alone worthy of our interference, who shall bring them here from foreign countries. That we will regulate.

We have been called on by the gentleman from South Carolina for the evidence on which the committee have acted. Of the description referred to in his resolution we have none; and I tell the gentleman plainly, that the Committee of Manufactures have not acted, and would not act, on the statement, or even the affidavits, of interested persons. Others may make motives for us—but we shall not avow what we disdain. I refer him, for the information on which we have acted, to the commercial codes of other countries—our own official documents from the Treasury; to the able reports of the Committee of Commerce, of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to one which deserves particular notice, from being presented by himself; the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means in 1816. I repeat it, that the profits of manufactures had not been our leading motive, but the public national interest; this nation must command its own consumption and the means of defence. The Treasury report tells us that the ad valorem imports of 1818, are $58,000,000, our domestic exports only $50,000,000. This must be changed; we must buy less than we sell. There is one domestic work on political economy, better than any imported; containing more sound political maxims than any I ever read. The almanacs of "Richard Saunders." He says, "if you keep taking out of the meal chest and put nothing in, it will become empty."

This is the state of the nation; an enormous flood of importation has swept before it the industry of the country; $36,000,000 of imports a year have exhausted its resources; it is literally empty.

Look where you will you will find property depressed, produce declining, laborers seeking employment; nothing increasing but debts and suits, and forced sales. The sound of a hammer does not disturb you, unless the constable's, sheriff's, or auctioneer's. If the petitions on your table do not give you the true cause of this; if, when manufacturers and farmers are joining in their applications for the protection of national industry, you want other evidence of the general distress; let each member of this House say what is the situation of his own district. Many of them have seen manufactures flourish; did farmers then suffer? Has their practical operation ever been injurious to any portion of the country? We have tried the systems of supplying ourselves and depending on foreign nations; those who have seen the effects of both can best judge of the merits of this bill. But if you want other evidence of the cause of this universal distress, and to find out an effectual remedy, do not disregard the unanimous opinion of the Legislature of New York, expressed in instructions to her delegation here. This is the voice of 3,200,000 freemen. When a nation thus complains, we are not to inquire if women and children cry. Pennsylvania speaks in a still more decided tone; not of instruction or complaint, but of a stop law to prevent the sale of real and personal property in execution, unless it sells for two-thirds of its appraised value. It is time to reflect when such a State speaks in language like this. Five years ago she was the richest in the Union; her property was valued under your authority at 346 millions; New York at 273 millions; she has been and yet is a proud State; fertile in resources, strong in her institutions, she stood the shock of the Revolution, the consequent peace, the embargo, and the late war, unhurt. But she could not withstand the destruction of her manufactures, the prostration of her industry, the deluge of importation, your enormous imposts; she has yielded to the pressure of general distress, and, for the first time in her history, has been obliged to resort to a stop law to save the persons and property of her citizens. All must regret the necessity; the other States have not resorted to the same measure; they may have as much necessity. One county in Virginia, I see by the paper of to-day, has passed a stop law of its own, by refusing to appoint any officers to enforce the collection of debts. Sir, this state of thing affords abundant evidence of the necessity of your acting. You have tried the present system till all the interests of the country are alike destroyed. Give this one a fair trial; you can be no worse, unless you persevere in a policy which was founded on a state of things which no longer exists; which will increase the national distress in proportion to its continuance. Adopt a system founded on those plain practical principles which have been sanctioned by experience, and can never be destroyed by a storm, which will pass the country unhurt.

[Note.—The navigation acts have been passed; the West India, with one dissenting vote in the Senate—in the House, by a vote of ayes 94, noes 25; the French, without discussion, or even a division in either

House; there was no one heard in the House of Representatives. This furnishes a good practical commentary on the favorite maxim of "leave things alone"; it cannot be expected to pass without comment. No subject will better explain the actual policy of this Government in relation to their internal concerns. The French navigation act has been called for by the great body of merchants, who complain that the French tariff excludes entirely the employment of American shipping; to counteract this we have imposed a duty of eighteen dollars a ton on French vessels arriving after the 1st of July next. It is well to compare the discriminating duties of the two nations. Our tonnage duty is fifty cents light money, the same in all; one dollar a ton on foreign ships; the French is ninety cents; ten cents less than her ships pay here. The French duty most complained of is on the import of our produce; we impose an addition to the rates of duties of ten per cent. on all goods imported in foreign vessels of those nations who have no convention with us. France imposes on cotton a duty of four dollars a hundred imported in French ships, five dollars and fifty cents in foreign; if from an entrepot, five in French, five dollars and fifty cents in foreign vessels. Tobacco, in French ships, free; foreign, one dollar a hundred. To ascertain who is the aggressor in this contest, who first began this discrimination on tonnage and goods, whether it is in self-defence or from a spirit of monopoly, and on which side, may be some time worthy at least of examination. If the conduct of France had been unprovoked; if she first began this warfare, and we are on the defensive, and prefer retaliation to reduction, there are two modes of counteracting it; a tonnage duty which would exclude French shipping, or a duty on their manufactures, which would compel them to reduce theirs on our raw material. The first has been adopted; its operation is only in favor of the merchant; the second was rejected; it would have benefited the manufacturer and the farmer, and been of equal service to commerce. The heavy discriminating duty is on our produce, not tonnage. The principle of equal protection should have embraced all interests alike; it has been confined to the carrier, the producer, and the manufacturer has been overlooked. The rights of primogeniture have been successfully asserted, and unanimously sanctioned. Will France give way, or retaliate? In the latter event, let the agriculturist look to the exclusion of his produce; the shipping interest can only be reached through the products which give it employment; the cotton planters have unanimously opposed the protection of manufactures, and advocated the navigation acts; they have thrown their entire weight into the scale of commerce. The consumption of their cotton was unworthy of their notice. The carrying of it has induced them to join in a commercial war which may terminate against their interests. Mr. Gallatin states that we imported "60,000,000 of the produce of French industry, more than two-thirds the produce of modes and luxuries manufactured at Paris, and of Lyons' silks, exported from Havre, exclusive of wines, brandies, and dried fruits, and other articles of that nature." One would think that this fact would have assured to a statesman the point in which to attack France. Exclude her manufactures from our market, or impose a duty equal to hers. That, however, seems not to be consistent with the rules of political economists; it would give employment to our laborers, infuse life and new spirit into our manufacturers. A reduction of import duties would increase the price of the raw material to the farmer, diminish it to the consumer of the manufacture; these are considerations which have excited no attention. The great national contest now is, whether the duties shall be the same, whether imported in French or American vessels. Let the cotton, tobacco, and rice planter, look out. The day may come when the sugar planter may find it would have been as well to have excluded the produce of the British islands as the carrying of it in British vessels.]

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, rose, after Mr. BALDWIN concluded, and expressed his views of the tariff, in general opposition to those of Mr. B., as regards the merits of the system of revenue from imports, but without denying that some of the present duties might require to be increased. He did not however go far into the general question, having risen to move an amendment in the following clause:

"First. A duty of 12½ per centum ad valorem on all dying drugs, and materials for composing dyes, not subject to other rates of duty; gum arabic, gum senegal, saltpetre, jewelry, gold, silver, and other watches, and parts of watches; gold and silver lace, embroidery, and epaulets; precious stones, and pearls of all kind, set or not set; Bristol stones or paste work, and all articles composed wholly or chiefly of gold, silver, pearl, and precious stones; and laces, lace veils, lace shawls, or shades, of thread or silk."

The amendment was to strike out the word "twelve," in the first line, for the purpose of inserting in lieu thereof the word "seven."

Mr. CLAY, after paying a high compliment to the ability and substantial character of the speech of Mr. BALDWIN, said that, until an answer was to that speech at least attempted, he should abstain from engaging in the support of the general principles of the bill. At present, he only rose to say that it became the friends of the manufacturing system not to lend themselves with too much facility to alterations proposed in the system which has been reported by the Committee on Manufactures. That committee had, with a patience and industry never surpassed in this House, prepared and reported a general system. Its provisions were no doubt the result of much calculation; and, if the friends of the general features of it listened to every application which should be made to change this or that particular item, the effect would be, that they would lose the whole. Mr. C. then made some remarks against this particular motion.

The question was taken on Mr. SMITH's motion, and decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. SILSBEE next moved to amend the bill, by striking out the proviso, which is in the following words:

"Provided, That all cotton cloths, or cloths of which cotton is a component material, the cost of which at the place whence imported, with the addition of 20 per centum, if imported from the Cape of Good Hope, or from places beyond it; and 10 per centum if imported from any other place, shall be less than 25 cents per square yard, shall, with such addition, be taken and deemed to have cost 25 cents per square yard, and shall be charged with duty accordingly."

This motion was negatived—ayes 45.

Revision of the Tariff.

APRIL, 1820.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then moved to strike out the following proviso of the bill :

" Provided, That all linen cloths, or cloths of which linen is a component material, from whatever place, the cost of which at the place whence imported, with the addition of 10 per centum, shall be less than 25 cents per square yard, shall, with such addition, be taken and deemed to have cost 25 cents per square yard, and shall be charged with duty accordingly."

Mr. SMITH said incidentally, (and he and other gentlemen repeated the suggestion afterwards,) that he made this motion, not from any expectation of succeeding in the proposition, for, from the intimation thrown out by the honorable Speaker, he perceived that the bill must be taken as it stands, and that it was in vain to propose any amendment.

After some observations from Mr. CLAY and Mr. BALDWIN against the motion, and Mr. SMITH and Mr. LOWNDES in favor of it—

The question was taken on Mr. SMITH's motion, and decided in the negative—ayes 48.

Mr. SILSBEE moved to amend the bill, so as to reduce the proposed duty on imported coffee from six to five cents per lb., and spoke in support of the motion. After some remarks from Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, against it—

This motion also was negatived.

Mr. MEIGS moved to increase the duty on iron castings from one dollar and a half to three dollars per hundred weight.

This motion also was negatived.

Mr. HOLMES moved to reduce the duty on iron bars and bolts, except iron manufactured by rolling, from the proposed amount of one dollar and twenty-five cents per cwt. to one dollar.

This motion was opposed by Mr. KINSEY, and was also negatived.

Mr. MEIGS moved to amend the bill, by inserting a duty on steam machinery imported, of three dollars per hundred weight.

This motion was also negatived.

Mr. KENDALL moved an amendment, the object of which was slightly to vary the duty on paper; which also was negatived.

Mr. SILSBEE moved to reduce the proposed duty on imported molasses, from ten to five cents per gallon.

This motion was opposed by Mr. CLAY, and supported by Mr. HOLMES, with much good humor on both sides. It was also supported by Mr. FOOT and Mr. WHITMAN, and opposed by Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana. It was negatived by a large majority.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, April 22.

Mr. PINCKNEY offered a joint resolution directing the Secretary of State to transmit one copy of the Journal of the Convention, which formed the Federal Constitution, to each of the members of that Convention, who are now living.

Mr. PINCKNEY's reason for offering this resolution was, that the surviving members of the Convention no doubt desired to have copies of the Journal, but none were to be purchased; and he therefore thought it proper that they should be furnished from the copies printed for the public use.

The resolution was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, nem. con.

Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Hunter," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish additional land offices in the State of Alabama," was recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide relief for sick and disabled seamen," reported the same with amendments, which were read, and, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

Bills from the Senate, of the following titles, to wit: 1. An act for the relief of Thomas L. Ogden and others; 2. An act for the relief of Matthew McNair; 3. An act authorizing the building of a certain number of small vessels of war; 4. An act for the relief of Thomas Leiper; and, 5. An act confirming the proceedings of the inhabitants of the village of Cahokia, in the State of Illinois, in laying out a town on the commons of said village; were severally read twice and referred: the first and second to the Committee of Claims; the third to the Committee on Naval Affairs; the fourth to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims; and the fifth to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the allowance to the judges of the orphans' court, in the counties of Washington and Alexandria," was read a third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act authorizing the sale of thirteen sections of land lying within the land district of Canton, in the State of Ohio," was read the third time, and passed.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage.

Mr. SAMPSON, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill by reducing the proposed duty of ten cents per gallon on molasses to seven cents; which motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, moved to amend the bill by inserting a duty on butter, of nine cents per pound; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMES moved to reduce the proposed duty on imported salt from twenty-five to twenty cents per bushel.

This motion was supported at some length by the mover, and was opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and SAWYER, of North Carolina. Messrs. CLAY and McCOR made some incidental remarks, the former adverse, the latter favorable to the motion.

The motion was negatived—ayes 56.

The bill was amended, on motion of Mr. BALDWIN, so as to provide for the use of such hydrometers, in determining the proof of spirits, as the President shall prescribe.

Mr. WENDOVER moved to amend the bill by adding to the duty on shoes of leather, silk, &c., on shoes or slippers of prunella, or other materials, a duty of forty-five cents per pair. This motion was agreed to.

Mr. STRONG, of New York, moved to increase the duty on spirits of the different proofs twenty cents per gallon; the bill proposes from thirty-eight to seventy cents per gallon, according to the proof.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the motion on the ground that it would amount to a prohibitory duty, which it was not proposed at present to adopt. The motion was negatived.

Mr. STRONG then moved an increase of ten cents per gallon; which motion was also negatived.

Mr. SILSBEE moved to reduce the proposed duty on hyson skin, souchong, and all other black teas, from twenty-five to twenty cents per pound.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, submitted a number of statements and facts to show that the existing discrimination in the duty on bohea and black teas permitted an evasion of the higher duty, and that the duty ought to be the same on all those teas, to prevent frauds, &c. He was in favor of Mr. SILSBEE's motion.

The motion was negatived—ayes 34.

Mr. WENDOVER moved to make a discriminating duty on these teas, by making the duty on hyson skin twenty-eight cents per pound; which was negatived.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, to prevent the frauds carried on under the words "and other green teas," moved to include "other green teas" with hyson and young hyson in a duty of forty cents per pound; which was agreed to.

The Committee then proceeded to fill up the blanks left in the bill for fixing the duty on wines; and, after a good deal of discussion, and the rejection of various other sums, the blanks were filled to read as follows:

"On Madeira, Burgundy, Champaign, Rhenish, and Tokay, $1 per gallon; on Sherry and St. Lucar, 60 cents a gallon; on other wine, not enumerated, when imported in bottles or cases, 30 cents per gallon; on Lisbon, Oporto, and on other wines of Portugal, and those of Sicily, 50 cents a gallon; on Teneriffe, Fayal, and other wines of the Western Islands, 30 cents; on all other wines, when imported otherwise than in cases and bottles, 15 cents."

Mr. KENDALL moved to strike out the duty of five cents per pound on oil of vitriol, so as to leave the importation of it free, as heretofore; which was negatived.

Mr. WHITMAN moved so to amend the bill as to reduce the proposed duty on printed books from twenty-five to twenty per cent. ad valorem, and supported his motion at some length. The reduction was supported, also, by Mr. HARDIN, who was opposed to any duty on the importation of literature, and by Mr. LIVERMORE, and was opposed by Messrs. KINSEY, BALDWIN, and CLAY, on the ground, principally, that it was so far not a tax on literature, as foreign books were allowed by the bill to be imported duty free, for philosophical and literary societies, academies, colleges, &c., and that the proposed duty was necessary to protect the business of printing and publishing in this country. Mr. SERGEANT entered into the discussion on incidental points, and was in favor of the motion.

The motion was finally agreed to—ayes 69, noes 53.

Mr. WHITMAN next moved to amend the bill by reducing the duty on plain flint glass from ten cents to seven cents per pound, under a conviction, from information he had received, that the latter duty would be an ample protection of the domestic fabric.

Mr. BALDWIN opposed the motion, and entered into various statements and references to the British and other tariffs, &c., to show that the duty of ten per cent. was as low as, with a just regard to our own production of the article, could possibly be fixed, and to prevent the glass establishments of the country from being placed entirely at the mercy of the British manufacturer; arguing that it was a manufacture which, of all others, ought to be encouraged, inasmuch as it was the product of materials which were of no value for any other purpose.

The motion was negatived, without a division.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, the article of copper, manufactured into sugar boilers, was inserted among the articles entitled to drawback.

For the reason that he did not understand it, and that it might be dangerous, as far as he could foresee its operation, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to strike out the following clause of the 9th section of the bill:

"And that all goods, wares, and merchandise, which shall be imported in any ship or vessel from any foreign port or place, or which in her voyage shall have touched at any foreign port or place, shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed and taken to be of foreign growth, produce, and manufacture."

The motion was supported by Messrs. SILSBEE and WHITMAN; and Mr. BALDWIN replied, that the clause was intended to guard against frauds on the revenue from Canada by the Lakes, &c.; but he was willing to meet any proper views on the subject, and, on a conference with the gentlemen opposed to it, had no doubt it might be framed to the general satisfaction, if the motion were withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH, for the present, consented to withdraw his motion.

The bill having been gone through—

Mr. TYLER, of Virginia, moved to strike out the first section of the bill, and was prepared now to go into the remarks which he intended to offer in opposition to the bill, if it were the pleasure of the Committee to listen to an argument on its general merits; but, as the Committee had been engaged for several hours in a laborious and fatiguing consideration of its details, he moved that the Committee now rise.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, presented to the House a mass of correspondence derived from the Executive department, between the Ministers of our Government and those of France and England, respecting our trade with the British American colonies, and the general intercourse between France and the United States; which was ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, April 24.

Mr. WENDOVER presented a memorial of the American Society of the city of New York for the encouragement of domestic manufactures, complaining of the system of credit given for the duties on the importation of foreign manufactures, and of free sales at auction; and praying that the bill now pending before Congress, regulating the payment of duties on merchandise imported; the bill imposing duties on certain sales at auction; on imports and tonnage, may be passed into laws, previous to the termination of the present session of Congress; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which the said bills are committed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the city of Baltimore, praying that measures may be adopted to prevent the citizens of the United States from engaging in the business of privateering, under the flags of the Governments of South America; and that certain ports in the United States may be designated, in which, only, the cruisers of those Governments may be permitted to enter, and that those lying on the waters of the Chesapeake Bay may be among those which may be prohibited; which petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SLOAN presented a letter from George Jackson, of Zanesville, in the State of Ohio, charging Samuel Herrick, a member of this House from that State, with having improperly received money, for his services in procuring a pension for a certain Robert Cue, and enclosing the evidence of the said charge; which letter was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VAN RENSSLAER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing or suspending the expenditures on fortifications, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed "resolution for the distribution of certain copies of the Journal of the Convention which formed the Constitution," was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES,
Resolved, That the letter from the Secretary of the Navy, of the 7th April, 1820, with the documents which accompanied it, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and that they be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that no commander, or other officer in the naval service of the United States, shall receive on board his vessel any gold, silver, or jewels, without orders from the President of the United States, or the Navy Department; and that no officer, without such orders, shall transport, as a passenger, any person in the naval or military service of a foreign Government engaged in war; and the Committee of Naval Affairs are also instructed to inquire into the expediency of determining, by law, whether any compensation or freight shall be, in any case, permitted, for articles transported in vessels of the United States.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the line heretofore caused to be surveyed, marked, and designated, from the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, due east, in pursuance of the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate certain boundaries," passed May 12, 1812, so far as the same extends due east from the western boundary line of the State of Ohio, be and remain the established boundary line between the said State of Ohio and the Territory of Michigan.

The resolution was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill from this House entitled an act for the relief of John Steel, with an amendment. And they have passed bills of the following titles: An act granting certain privileges to the Ocean Steamship Company of New York; an act for the relief of Richard Smyth; and an act to provide for the building an addition to the custom-house now erecting in the city of New Orleans, for the use of the district court of the United States for the State of Louisiana. In which amendment and bills, they request the concurrence of this House.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to regulate the duties on imports.

A motion to strike out the first section of the bill (to reject it) being under consideration—

Mr. TYLER said, that he sincerely mingled his regrets with those which had been repeatedly expressed by others, that this all-important subject should be urged to a decision at this late period. The languor attendant on a long session rarely fails to produce a restlessness and impatience adverse to a full and free investigation. If we arrive, said he, to a precipitate conclusion, one adverse to the best interests of this nation, he meant not that any share of the responsibility should devolve on him. He considered that he had a high duty to discharge, and trusted the House would bear with him while he discharged it.

Some gentlemen have been pleased to consider the bill on the table a mere experiment. We should be cautious, Mr. Chairman, how we adopt experiments of a vague and uncertain character; but more especially ought we to be so, when the two great branches of national industry, commerce and agriculture, are materially interested in that experiment. Shall we make an hasty experiment on our best interests? Shall we precipitately adopt a system from which the most serious and destructive results may arise? I repeat, that great deliberation and reflection are required of us. And, sir, what is the character of the experiment which is about to be made? One which is to give a new direction to the capital and labor of the country. The clamor which has been raised in support of what is called national industry, has this for its object and nothing else. This is the inevitable consequence of the bill on your table should you adopt it. Are the present manufacturers in the United States really entitled to your aid? Where is the proof of it? We have asked for the proof, and the chairman of the committee frankly acknowledged that he did not possess it. All classes labor, at this time, under serious embarrassments. The gentlemen from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) has ascribed these embarrassments to the badness of our present system. Not so, said Mr. T., the causes are plain and obvious. The present extraordinary condition of the world, almost all Christendom being now at peace, is one of the great causes. The demand for the productions of our soil is diminished by the circumstance of the inhabitants of Europe being now permitted to pursue the walks of industry, uninterrupted by the turmoil of war. They are no longer dependent on us for those large supplies which they lately required. There is another cause equally operative, and it is to be found in that hot-bed banking system, which, like the present bill, when introduced, was made to promise us such potent blessings. I repeat, that all classes are greatly oppressed. For one, I wanted such information as would have enabled me fairly to contrast the condition of the manufacturing with the other interests of the country. I wanted to be informed whether that interest only suffered in the same ratio with the others, and whether its sufferings were produced by similar causes. In the absence of this information, I am left to conclude that it is now deemed expedient to hold out rewards for the purpose of giving a new direction to the capital and labor of the nation.

If gentlemen imagine that by this bill they are securing the permanent interests of the manufacturers; if they believe that this is all which will be required at the hands of the Legislature, they are most grossly deceived. This is but the incipient measure of a system. I venture to predict that, after the lapse of a very few years, we shall be assailed by as urgent petitions as those which have poured in on us at the present session.

What will be the effect of this measure? It proposes a rate of duties sufficiently high to enable our artists to undersell the foreign artist in the markets of this country. For a short time, it will have that effect, but it cannot long continue. It adds to the profits of those who at this time have their capitals invested in manufactories; and while other classes will labor under severe pecuniary embarrassments, they will enjoy comparative prosperity. What will be the consequence? Why, sir, there is no principle in political economy more universally true, than that capital will flow into those employments from which it can derive the greatest profits. This bill, then, will have the effect of causing new investitures of capital. Thus a spirit of competition will have been generated, and in the course of a few years, the profits of these capitalists will have settled down to their present level. The supply will always, after a short time, suit itself to the demand, and, from being at first deficient, will often exceed it. Again: The advocates of this system have attempted too much. They have clasped in their embrace too many favorites to yield a permanent benefit to any one. There will exist an inequality of profits in the various branches of manufacturing industry; and this circumstance will aid greatly in producing the result which I have deduced. To simplify my argument, let me present to you a supposititious case: Take the case of the tailor and shoemaker. If the tailor makes a greater profit in his trade, then you will have more tailors than shoemakers; more labor will be employed by the one than the other. The shoemaker, in order to retain his laborers in his employment, will be forced to give higher wages; and the tailor, in order to counteract this effect, will find himself compelled to increase the wages of his laborers. And thus, the competition between them will urge them on to the imposition of high prices on their different fabrics. While the wages of labor are continually advancing, they will find their profits constantly diminishing, and their resort to high prices for their products will resemble the desperate effort of the gambler, whose hopes are all staked on the last throw of the dice. The consequence is inevitable. This bill secures them not. The foreign competitor again enters your market, and again will our ears be deafened with cries for relief.

If any thing more was wanting to satisfy us of the truth of these deductions, the case of the manufacturers of bar iron would be conclusive. The gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. KINSEY,) the other day very candidly confessed that in 1816 he did believe that the duty then laid on that article would have been in all respects sufficient; but he then labored under a deception, and an additional duty is now proposed. How has this been produced? It may clearly be traced to the causes which have already been suggested. The manufacturer of bar iron had to go into a market for the purpose of procuring laborers, where he met with the farmer and merchant as his competitors. The competition operated disadvantageously to him, and he again presents himself to you for relief. In a country thickly populated, such effects would gradually and almost imperceptibly develop themselves. Where a surplus population exists, each branch of industry will be well supplied with laborers; the bidding is on the part of the laborer for employment, and not, as in a new country, by the undertaker for the laborer. But where you have an extensive wilderness yet to settle, where, from the paucity of hands, the wages of labor must necessarily be high, where the laborer feels and knows the value which is set on him, as sure as man is man, the effects which I have anticipated will result. If, then, you intend to stop here, you only hold out a false lure; one promising permanent benefit, but, unless pressed to prohibition, resulting in ruin. I take it, then, for granted that no gentleman will vote for this measure who is not prepared to go on to prohibition.

Let us, then, look to the effects of such a measure. Remember the history of your banks, and you will have the picture of the effects to flow from prohibitions. By such a measure the other interests of the community are thrown prostrate at the feet of the manufacturers. The dread of competition from abroad will no longer afford a check to unreasonable demands. It would be idle to expect that they would be satisfied with moderate profits. Such is not in the nature of man, nor do I venture to utter a complaint against it. Immense fortunes will be realized before such further investment of capital shall take place as to destroy the monopoly. But, sir, such investments will in time take place; large investments will be invited; we shall then have become a manufacturing nation, and fabrics to a greater amount than will be required for home consumption will be produced. Again, then, you will have to resort to expedients. Let us not disguise the fact. By the time you have reached this stage, that class of society will be too numerous to supplicate. No, they will speak in the tone of dictation. They will tell you that, invited by the legislation of Congress, they have invested millions. They will tell you that the home market is overstocked with their fabrics; that their surplus products are rotting on their hands; and that ruin awaits them, unless you extend further protection. They will enter no foreign market without your aid, for there they will come in competition with the artisans of other nations. What, then, could you do? You would have to encourage the exportations by bounties. This is the inevitable effect; and what would be the effect of the premium? Sir, it operates beneficially to the foreign consumer, and injuriously to your own citizen. One of the objects of a bounty is to keep up the home price. If the manufacturers cannot afford to make a yard of cloth for less than five dollars, and the supply should be greater than the demand, it is obvious that the cloth would fall below that price, and, without the interposition of the Government, ruin would await him. If, in the foreign market, operated on either by the tariff of duties there existing, or other causes, his cloth would not sell at a profit, the Government finds itself compelled to interpose, and make up by its bounty the difference between the market price and that at which the manufacturer can afford to sell at a reasonable profit. Thus, then, we shall supply the foreign at a less price than the domestic consumer. Every other class pays then a tax for the support of this class of citizens, for the bounty operates as a tax, and a heavy one often, on the citizens of the country. These demands, too, will be constantly undergoing a change, and will depend, not on yourselves, but on the regulations of foreign countries.

Thus, then, have we arrived at the land-end of this system. You have now reached the ultimate end of your journey. Let gentlemen now pause and reflect. If they shall have imagined it to be a voyage over an unruffled ocean, I tell them that they are deceived. In fitting out this new and favorite ship, do they forget that it is probable that those bottoms which have heretofore borne you on to happiness, advanced your wealth, afforded strength and security, are rotting and decaying on your hands? What becomes of agriculture? I contend that the first and inevitable effect of this bill is to reduce the value of land; to diminish the value of the capital of the farmer. Manufacturing labor and capital, or by far the greater portion, will be subducted from agriculture. Men will pursue their true interests, and you will have made it their interests to abandon their fields, and to invest their capital in manufacturing establishments. The advance of improvement will be in a great measure stopped. A portion of the soil will be thrown out of cultivation, and the result is obvious. This conclusion is drawn from principles so clear, that to press it further would be an unnecessary waste of time.

But, sir, what will be the effects while this transition of capital is taking place? It must be some time before society can accommodate itself to any sudden change. America is now the granary of the world; she supplies the wants of foreign nations as they arise. It is true that the foreign market at this moment is almost glutted; but shall we be denied the advantage of profiting by a change in that market? Do not all producers experience fluctuations in their markets? To-day, from the deficiency of the supply, high prices are obtained; to-morrow the market is better supplied, and a diminution in the value of the product takes place. These are calculations which all men must make, in whatever branch of industry they may be employed. Who can tell how long the causes which now operate to our injury may continue to exist? All human affairs are constantly undergoing a change; and even while I am now addressing you, new causes of disputes among the Powers of Europe may be unfolding themselves. The speck which is now scarcely discernible on the horizon, the next moment may swell into a cloud, dark and portentous. Will you not, by this system, deny to us all benefit from any change which may occur? Yes, sir, I contend that you will have done so. Society lives on exchanges; exchange constitutes the very soul of commerce. Under present circumstances the merchant purchases the products of the country, ships them abroad, and receives in exchange articles which the country furnishes to which he makes his shipment. But can you expect that foreign nations will buy of you for any length of time, unless you buy of them? You cannot be so visionary. But suppose they could, what would you receive in return? Gold and silver, articles of no value, but as a medium of exchange. Attempts have been made by some nations to retain all the gold and silver that flowed in upon them. The attempt has been regarded as indicative of the highest folly. So would also be a system which should look to a constant importation of the precious metals. I repeat, that the great use of money is to serve as a medium of exchange among nations and among men; and, to suppose an extreme case, if we could go on until we obtained all the money in the world, we should still be like the miser or a beggar in the midst of it. You would then, by this cruel system, have diminished the value of the land, the capital of the farmer, and have shut him out almost entirely from all foreign markets.

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are promised a home market for our products. Are gentlemen serious when they urge such arguments? Would you add by this bill to the number of consumers in the United States? I speak of the agricultural interest, as it now exists, before sufficient time shall have elapsed to enable the farmer to desert his field, and give a new direction to his labor. I ask, then, if your manufactures shall prosper; if you succeed, as you unquestionably will, in building up large manufacturing establishments, will you add to the number of consumers? Who will be found in them? Men who must be fed whether they are there or elsewhere—laborers. Will this be to furnish a new market? Take the case of large mercantile cities; they would furnish a parallel. By concentrating the population, you concentrate the number of purchasers, but you do not thereby increase their number. Whether your fifty merchants be in a city, or dispersed over the country, they do not lose their character of purchasers. They must, in either event, be fed. So too with the laborers employed in a manufactory. But look to the list of agricultural exports, and tell me how long it will take you to furnish a home market for them? They amounted last year, if I do not mistake, to something like $50,000,000, and this was made up of the portion of product which remained after satisfying the home demand. The proposition, sir, is futile; nay, a perfect mockery. Nor are we to be deceived by the apparent regard which the Committee of Manufactures has evinced in our behalf. The chairman (Mr. BALDWIN) has been pleased to report a duty on cotton and tobacco, imported into this country. Did he really imagine that the members from Georgia and South Carolina were to be entrapped by the first, or the members from Virginia by the last? I feel assured that my honorable friend did not intend to practise a deception upon us. He would spurn, with indignation, any such resort. But I ask him seriously to say whether he thinks that the South requires this tax on cotton, or Virginia this tax on tobacco? Look at the list of annual exports of cotton, and tell me if the cotton planter here has any thing to fear from foreign competition? And is it not well known that the Virginia tobacco planter fears no competition on earth? No other tobacco comes into competition with it. France admits none other than that raised in Virginia; and the anxiety of foreign purchasers to obtain our tobacco, is the best evidence of its decided superiority over the similar production of any other country. As well might the gentleman, if he had been legislating for Newcastle, to use a familiar illustration, have laid a high duty on coal thereinto imported.

But, sir, we must moreover be taxed, and highly taxed, to support this system. Do you require proof of the truth of this assertion? The bill on your table furnishes the evidence. Sir, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for having addressed us in a plain and intelligible manner. Aware that the high duties imposed by the bill on the greater number of articles, would produce a deficit in the revenue, he has proposed to remedy this evil by exacting higher duties on articles of the first necessity. On sugar, coffee, molasses, and salt, a large revenue is proposed to be raised. Who will have to pay it? Inasmuch as the agricultural class is the most numerous, they will have to pay the greater portion of it. Sir, it operates as a direct tax on them.

You extort for a time from their necessities, but they cannot long bear the exaction, and if you do not experience a large deficiency of revenue this year, you will the next. Although these articles enter into the general consumption of the country, yet an increase of prices will have the effect of diminishing their consumption. The poorer classes will be forced to resort to cheap substitutes. It is not a time to be loading the country with additional burdens; it is already sufficiently oppressed. We should administer relief to the people, as far as practicable, by retrenching the expenses of the Government; and, sir, if the gentleman had looked over the whole report of the Committee of Ways and Means, he would have discovered that, so far from that committee deeming it necessary to resort to a system of internal revenue, strong reasons were urged by them against such a course. The gentleman has called the present system of revenue a rotten system. And how does he propose to get rid of it? By adopting a system of excises. And when does he propose to resort to that system? Dare you resort to it until you have reached prohibitions? Would it not do away the effect of high duties? The manufacturer would have to impose the amount of the excise on the price of his fabrics, and thus the effect of the duty would be completely neutralized. You can only adopt a system of direct and heavy taxation. And shall all other classes be taxed to uphold this favorite—manufacturers? When the gentleman talked of a rotten system, I had hoped that he would have given us something of a purer and more healthy character. However despicable it may be, I, for one, shall cling to it with the most persevering obstinacy. So far, under its influence, we have gone on prosperously and happily. The weight of government has not been felt by the citizen. He has been left, as far as possible, what God created him, a free agent. The revenue has been raised by his voluntary subscriptions, and, in its greatest extent, from his imaginary wants. The system, as it now exists, may be esteemed the legitimate source of revenue for this Government. The States passed over to us this the most productive source of income, and retained only the right to resort to direct taxes. Although they conferred on this Government the power, under circumstances of urgent necessity, of taxing the same articles with themselves, yet the policy of the Government heretofore has been to avoid, in time of peace, a resort to the exercise of such a power. But the gentleman is exceedingly dissatisfied with this system, because of the fluctuation which takes place in the amount of the revenue; and what is his ultimatum? Excises. And are they less liable to fluctuation in amount? No, sir. When we shall have become a great manufacturing people; when we shall have attained this great desideratum, will not the state of foreign markets produce a similar condition of things with that which now exists? The amount of your bounties on exportation will be constantly fluctuating, and an increase of revenue during one year could not be relied on for the ensuing year. The gentleman has been pleased, also, to complain of the necessity which we are now under to resort to a loan of $2,000,000. What is the fact in reference to this loan? It does not add to the debt of the nation. During this year, two-thirds of the Mississippi stock becomes redeemable. The bill from the committee authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to accept subscriptions of that stock in satisfaction of the loan. If subscribed, that debt will be postponed for a limited time; and if not subscribed, a new debt will be created in its place, and it redeemed. So that it is obvious the engagements of the Government are not augmented, but merely postponed.

I think, then, Mr. Chairman, that I have rendered in some measure the effects which will flow from this bill manifest. It will diminish the value of our land; it will shut us out from the foreign market; it cannot substitute a home market, as is erroneously contended; and, finally, it subjects us to a heavy burden of taxation. Is it necessary that I should go on to show its effects on commerce? Agriculture and commerce are twin sisters. You cannot inflict a wound on the one without injuring the other. Our foreign trade, I have already attempted to show, would be greatly and most seriously curtailed. And, sir, when the gentleman excepts from duty copper used for sheathing of ships, he takes care to limit this application of that article by striking a destructive blow at the vessel itself. That noble spirit of enterprise which has heretofore been our chief boast, will be in a great measure destroyed, and your navigation will be confined to your own bays and creeks. Tell me not, then, of the embarrassments which now prevail in this land. Go on with this Chinese system; carry this strange fallacy into effect, and we shall present a contrast as striking, between our present and our then situation, as that which is exhibited in the case of a child who has lost his plaything, and of the man whose house is wrapt in flames, and the fruits of a long life of industry in a moment destroyed.

Man is never satisfied, from his cradle to his grave. When in his infancy, he sighs to attain the years of manhood; and when old age overtakes him, he casts "a longing, lingering look" behind him, and weeps for the return of the days of his youth. So is it, too, with nations. Wisdom would admonish them of the folly attendant on their wishes; but, sir, they often press on with too much solicitude to the attainment of maturity, and thereby bring on themselves a premature old age. Shall we adopt this wicked and injurious course of policy? Have we any reason to be dissatisfied with our condition? Look to the past: a wilderness has been reclaimed; and, notwithstanding the difficulties and embarrassment attendant on our early history, we have now a fair and extensive garden spread before us, abounding in the choicest gifts of a bountiful Providence, and inhabited by upwards of ten millions of souls. Our march has been most rapid; but are we not still in our infancy? Does there exist any necessity for us to resort to artificial means to hasten our growth? Do we require the nostrums of gentlemen to secure our health? No, sir, I do still hope that we shall not resort to expedients which bloat the body politic, and, in the end, enervate and destroy.

To show the fallacy of such a course, let me imagine that a gentleman should rise in his place and propose to you forthwith to build up a navy equal to that of England, what would you think of him? And yet he might appeal to your national pride; he might point to the security which it would afford to the nation in the event of conflicts with foreign nations. But you would not hesitate to say to him, "Sir, be not so impatient; wait the process of time, and in its fulness, all your wishes will be accomplished." So, too, will I say to the advocates of the present bill—suffer things to take their own course, and the time will arrive when manufactures will flourish without the factitious aid of the Government. Natural causes will produce this result. Nature governs man by no principle more fixed than that which leads him to pursue his interest. When it shall correspond with the interest of this nation to become a manufacturing nation, such will it become. I will venture, however, the opinion that such will not be the case while we have a wilderness to people. What is the object of all labor; to obtain the means of sustaining life in comfort, and securing for one's posterity an independence? The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) has told us of the great importance of converting sand into glass and old rags into paper; of rendering that which is unproductive, productive. But can the labor of society be directed with greater benefit to the nation, to the world at large, or to the laborer, than in rendering the useless forest lands of this country productive and fertile? How much does this process add to the comforts and conveniences of civilized man! How extensive and how variously supplied a table does it not present! Regarded in a national point of view, no process can add more rapidly to the wealth of society; regarded as affecting the laborer and capitalist, the same result takes place. Ask yourselves if you are parents, if every principle of parental love would not invite you to expend your surplus capital in an inheritance for your children, which war cannot destroy or fire consume? And yet this bill proposes a new direction to the capital and industry of your citizens. By holding out a douceur you are attempting to arrest this tide of things and turn it into a channel dug by yourselves. Again, I ask, why are we to do this? Can we hope, or could we wish, to advance more rapidly in the road of national wealth than we have done? Our population doubles in every twenty-five years, and our resources keep a proper pace with our population.

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

Sir, gentlemen may tell me what they please about their rotten manufactories; but I call upon them to compare the advance of our nation with that of any other that ever existed, under like circumstances, and to deduce, if they can, an unfavorable conclusion towards us. True, a cloud now rests over us, but it is one arising from causes plain and palpable. It would be unreasonable to expect that we should always experience sunshine. I tell the gentleman, then, that we want no change, and least of all the change that he would give us. To expose still further this fallacy, suffer me to ask you what would have been thought by intelligent men, if our early settlers at Jamestown, at Plymouth, and elsewhere, had adopted this system, and resolved to have erected manufactories among them? The attempt would have been esteemed prosperous and idle. And what is our situation in comparison to the old nations of Europe, taking into the estimate the undefined boundaries of this mighty empire? I will not occupy the time of the Committee by answering the question. All may draw the deduction.

But, sir, we must become independent of foreign nations. This is the basis of this theory; a theory which aims to subvert the ordinances of Heaven itself. I was near pronouncing it an impious theory.

Mr. Chairman, man is dependent on man and nation on nation. Nature has written this truth in characters that cannot be misunderstood. Over one portion of the globe the seasons are genial and mild, and the earth pours forth its most abundant productions; over another, Winter maintains its reign. One produces cotton and breadstuffs, while another is only inhabited by graziers. Would you, to render Massachusetts independent of South Carolina, undertake there the culture of cotton? Yet this might be done in hot-beds, and by holding out high rewards. Or would South Carolina be so blind to her interest as to abandon the culture of cotton, and attempt to rival Massachusetts in raising stock? It would be folly for her to do so, and yet it might possibly be accomplished. But, in neglecting to do so, she would proceed on the true principle that she could purchase much cheaper than she could raise. And yet we, the legislators of this great nation, proceed on a different principle, and assume it to be correct to manufacture articles which might be obtained on much better terms from abroad. But press this idea of national independence still further, and what are the consequences? Suppose every nation on the face of the earth should adopt this notion, what would shortly become the condition of the world? The advance to literary attainment would be without a scaffolding to support it. Each, instead of drawing from a common stock, would have to rely alone on its own capacity. Those arts which improve and embellish life would gradually decay, and the world would relapse into another state of vandalism. But, sir, whatever may be the direction of your industry, this cannot be the case. The intercourse with foreign nations will be carried on to a certain extent, as I have before shown; and it remains to be inquired whether a manufacturing or an agricultural nation be, in truth, the most independent of others? I contend that the latter, in this point of view, has the decided advantage. A manufacturing nation is, in every sense of the word, dependent on others. Look to England! Cut off from the markets of the world, and misery and ruin await her. Threaten to close your ports against her, and she becomes forthwith alarmed. Close them, and a great portion of her population are thrown out of employment and reduced to beggary. How is it with an agricultural nation? Other nations are, in a great measure, dependent on it for food. They may dispense with your silks and gewgaws, but bread they must have. And when its foreign trade is destroyed, that very circumstance operates beneficially to the poorer classes, for they are then enabled to obtain the necessities of life in greater abundance, on much cheaper and much better terms. This imaginary good, then, cannot be obtained without warring with the fiat of Omnipotence itself, and, if obtained, would be productive of crying evils. Nor do you, in any manner, benefit a nation by converting it from an agricultural into a manufacturing nation.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania made a strong appeal to our honor; he said that that honor required us to meet France and England with their own weapons; whenever the honor of this nation shall be implicated, I trust I shall require no prompter to tell me my duty. But what grievance have we to complain of? Why, sir, we commenced the war by laying high duties on English fabrics, and what enormous offence has she been guilty of? Why, to counteract the effect of our duty, she has imposed a duty on our cotton. Is this any thing more than a measure of self-preservation? Have we any cause to quarrel with her for so doing? But the gentleman complains also of her bounties on her exports, and informed us that the bounty had the effect of enabling our merchants to sell some of her fabrics in this country at first cost. Now, sir, if the gentleman is disposed to go to war with England for this, I am not. And why should we make war on France through this bill? Why, because France lays a higher duty on our cotton than on the Turkey cotton? And why does she do so? The gentleman himself gave the reason; our cotton is indispensable to the French manufactures; not so with the Turkey cotton; the one yields a greater and more certain revenue than the other. The one may be taxed high for the purpose of revenue, whereas a high tax on the other would keep it out of the market. She resorts to the duty then for a legitimate object, and we have no right to complain. But what does the gentleman propose as a remedy for this evil? Why, sir, he proposes an almost entire loss of the French markets. Will the cotton planters thank him for this manifestation of his friendship? No, sir, if that be his friendship, they will most ardently supplicate to be delivered from it. Sir, it is a friendship which, while it smiles in the face, strikes to the vitals; a friendship which, instead of upholding, prostrates in the dust; a friendship which bears the port and attitude of the most inveterate hostility.

On what then, Mr. Chairman, is this system founded? Gentlemen will pardon me for saying that it is based on narrow and contracted principles; it is founded on a desire to engross all wealth to ourselves, and to beggar others; it looks not abroad through the world of man, but confines itself to home, and even there it blights and destroys; it overlooks the plainest principles of political economy. For one, I should be pleased to see all the nations of the earth prosperous, and happy, and rich; for it would furnish to me the best evidence of the prosperity of my native land. Were you a merchant would you settle yourself in a rich or poor neighborhood? Sir, you would not be so blind as to locate yourself among persons who would not be able to purchase your goods. So with nations with whom we trade. Let us then not run after bubbles; let us learn contentment, and not deceive ourselves; let us then not rudely and heedlessly throw from us the rich blessings which Providence has bestowed upon us; let other nations press on, if they please, to that point when they will lose their agricultural, and assume a manufacturing character; so much the better for us; our market will thus be increased for the products of our soil, and wealth and happiness will await us.

I thank the Committee for their attention; and although I might urge many more considerations upon them, yet an anxiety to see the session terminate, and knowing that others have to follow me who will embrace in their different views all that is important to bring us to a correct conclusion, I shall add nothing more than the expression of an anxious desire that we may not now lay the cornerstone of this ruinous system of policy.

Mr. STORRS delivered a speech of about an hour's length, in reply.

Mr. GROSS said, that the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) must have originated in a conviction, on his part, of the impolicy of the bill, considered in relation to the principles upon which it has been framed, and not in a mere dissatisfaction with its details. In the latter case, candor and patriotism would have concurred in pointing the honorable gentleman to a course very different from the one he had adopted. He would have proposed amendments rather than have submitted a motion to destroy the bill. What reasons does he offer to induce us to support his motion? I confess, said Mr. G., that I should think him in favor of the bill, did I take his remarks instead of his motion, as the test of his sentiments. He acknowledges that the general pacification of Europe, and the consequent loss of a market for our agricultural productions, is the cause of the present distress. The honorable gentleman, sir, is perfectly right. We may talk about banks and extravagance as much as we please; but they are not the cause of our misfortunes. They are rather the evidences of our former prosperity. When every thing which our soil produced commanded a high price in the European markets, and when we were the carriers for all nations, we could afford to be extravagant. Industry, sir, simple industry, was sufficient to secure to every individual the necessities and conveniences of life. The mechanic found abundant employment; the planter and farmer enjoyed a ready market for their produce; and the merchant became wealthy. The case is altered now, sir. The mechanic is without business, the farmer finds no market, and the capitalist, instead of growing rich by the interest of his money, is forced to live upon the principal, unless he choose to fatten on the misfortunes of his neighbors. Can all this, sir, be the effect of luxury? Extravagance makes money change its owners, but does not banish it from a country, if that country be otherwise in a flourishing condition. We must abandon, it is true, our habits of show and parade, in order to accommodate ourselves to our present reduced condition; but if there be no market for the produce of our soil, and no demand for our labor, our efforts will barely enable us to subsist. To arrest the progress of this evil, and to prevent the enormous exportation of specie, it seems to me that we should furnish ourselves with those articles for which we have heretofore sent our money across the Atlantic.

But let us inquire, said Mr. G., what remedy the honorable gentleman proposes for the evils which oppress us. Why, sir, he seems to have discovered a "speck of war" in the European horizon, a little cloud, no bigger at present than a man's hand, but which he devoutly hopes and believes will increase and overshadow the whole eastern continent. Has it indeed, sir, come to this? Are we to confine ourselves exclusively to the cultivation of the soil, even when its produce will not procure us the refuse trash of Europe? Are we to wait in our present situation until a war in Europe shall work our deliverance? The hope of such an event is impious. But suppose it should actually happen, where is our security for its continuance? Must our prosperity forever depend on the misfortunes of Europe? Shall we be condemned to mourn whenever peace shall bless her shores? Where is the representative who is prepared to leave his country in such a state of vassalage and dependence? We have, sir, at a vast expense of blood and treasure, established and maintained our political independence; but if the present state of things be without remedy, or, if we have not spirit enough to adopt a plan of reform in our internal policy, we may as well renew our allegiance to the British Crown, and save the trouble and expense of governing ourselves.

The honorable gentleman, said Mr. G., seems to concur with the celebrated Dr. Smith, that we ought not to accommodate our pursuits to our circumstances. What else can he mean by warning us not to change the direction of the national capital? The learned doctor informs his readers that "the tailor does not attempt to make his own shoes, but buys them of the shoemaker. The shoemaker does not attempt to make his own clothes, but employs the tailor. The farmer," he continues, "attempts to make neither the one nor the other, but employs those different artificers." And what is the reason which the doctor gives for all this? It is, according to him, because "all these find it for their interest to employ their whole industry in a way in which they have some advantage over their neighbors, and to purchase with a part of its produce, or, what is the same thing, with the price of a part of it, whatever else they may have occasion for." Will any one deny the correctness of these remarks? Yet, sir, if they be designed as an argument against the present bill, there are not more sophistical and jesuitical sentences in the English language. They are founded on the assumed fact that the tailor, the shoemaker, and the farmer, depend mutually on each other for the particular articles which their industry produces. But let us suppose, for a moment, that the farmer has no longer any "advantage over his neighbor," the tailor, by the cultivation of the soil. Let us take it for granted that he cannot dispose of his provisions; that the shoemaker is supplied from another quarter, and that the tailor supplies himself. Let us imagine, moreover, a very probable case, that, for the want of a market, he cannot purchase, with the price of a part of his produce, the shoes and coats of his neighbors; what shall he do under these circumstances? Shall he remain unclothed and unshod for fear of interfering with Dr. Smith's system of economy? Shall he prefer the cultivation of the soil, naked as he is, which can yield him no profit, to those mechanical arts which will, at least, secure him from the inclemency of the weather, and preserve him from debt?

The honorable gentleman, said Mr. G., informs us that manufactures are no more depressed than other classes of the community. True, sir; but shall we, for this reason, abandon the country to its fate? Yes, says the honorable gentleman, let every thing regulate itself, and manufactures will gradually be introduced from necessity. I am satisfied, said Mr. G., that they will be established, whether we pass this bill or not; for, by permitting things to take their natural course, whilst every other nation is intermeddling with commercial matters, we are reduced to the necessity of suspending almost entirely our foreign importations. We are compelled to provide a home market for our provisions and raw materials. For my part, sir, I am willing to aid the effects of our foolish policy, while they tend to work their own remedy. The good sense of the community is awake. A spirit of inquiry has gone forth, and the progress of public opinion in favor of a change of policy is not to be arrested; but, if the Government does nothing, years of suffering and embarrassment may pass away before the evil will be completely cured. Let us not permit the distresses of our fellow-citizens to be the sole cause of reformation; the skilful physician follows the indications of nature, and assists all its operations in throwing off the disease. Let us follow the example, and afford a seasonable encouragement to the manufacturing interest, which is now struggling between hope and despair.

But the honorable gentleman, said Mr. G., foresees an excise duty, if we pass this bill. After proving that such will be the result, I cannot see that he will have gained much ground. What has his own system produced? A deficit of five millions, and a yearly decrease of revenue. As to the revenue, the two systems are the same; but in regard to the internal prosperity of the country, the advantage is decidedly in favor of the new plan of economy. The old policy has ruined the revenue by impoverishing the people; the present bill proposes to exclude a portion of foreign commodities, in order to encourage the industry of our own citizens. Let us look back to the late war, and to the measures of Government at its close. At the commencement of the contest we experienced the evils of a want of manufacturing establishments in the most sensible manner; the capitalist began to turn his attention to the subject; but, before a supply could be furnished, the Government was compelled to submit to the disgrace of conniving at a violation of its own laws, and of countenancing smuggling, for the sake of clothing the army. The youth of our establishments, their small number, and the consequent want of competition, caused the high prices for which our manufacturers have been so often reproached. A few years would have remedied the evil. The lesson taught us at that time ought not so soon to have been forgotten. We ought to have learned that it was essential to our independence to be able, at all times, to furnish ourselves with many of the articles which we now import from abroad.

But, on the receipt of the news of peace, the country seemed mad with joy. Without reflecting on the altered situation of Europe, and not considering that our produce could no longer be disposed of in that quarter, Congress formed a tariff on the honorable gentleman's plan. They enacted a treasury tariff, a revenue tariff, without the least regard to the situation of the country. Need I mention the result? The low duties which were imposed brought upon the nation a perfect deluge of foreign articles. Our infant manufacturing establishments were prostrated; but the individual distress of their proprietors was unnoticed amidst the general joy at seeing the National Treasury filled to overflowing. What is the result? This system has operated like an exhilarating poison, which, at first, increased the animal powers, but finally sinks them to the grave. This system has been pursued to the present time. Will any one, at this day, call it a revenue system? It deserves a different title. We have purchased foreign commodities until the country is reduced to the utmost distress. We can purchase them no longer. The revenue has declined, and will continue to decline. Even now we have a bill upon our tables to provide for a part of the Treasury deficit by a loan, and, for the balance, the Lord knows how; and yet the honorable gentleman warns us against a change of policy, for fear of affecting the revenue; that miserable remnant, I suppose he means, which our blessed revenue system has not destroyed. Can that policy be wise which renders war a blessing? I appeal to the recollection of every member of this House, if the last war, with all its taxes, pressed so heavily on the country as the present peace?

I believe, said Mr. G., that the honorable gentleman will find it difficult to prove, what he seems to have no hesitation in asserting, that this bill will lessen our exportations. What do England and France purchase of us at present, which they can possibly do without? If, therefore, we should encourage the industry of our citizens by manufacturing a portion of our own raw materials, it will by no means interfere with the sale of the remainder.

It is insisted by the honorable gentleman, said Mr. G., that this bill will induce capitalists to engage in manufacturing, and that the result will be a competition at home, which will reduce the prices of manufactured articles to a level with those of foreign nations. He even predicts that the time may come when the introduction of foreign commodities of a certain description will be prohibited. Does the honorable gentleman believe this? Does the House believe it? Sir, I should hail such an event as the era of the complete independence of this country. The example of England is continually presented to our view. We are told of her continual wars, of her immense debt, and of the starving condition of the lower class of her citizens. Sir, said Mr. G., I am not an advocate for the principles by which she has been governed. The honorable gentleman says that her vast population has compelled her to resort to the manufacturing system for their support; but I say, sir, that her manufacturing system has produced her vast population. By manufacturing for exportation, she has subjected herself to the same inconveniences to which we are liable, by not manufacturing at all. She has rendered herself dependent on a foreign market for the sale, not of the produce of her husbandmen, but of her mechanics. To preserve this foreign market, she has for a century kept Europe involved in war. She has oppressed Ireland, enslaved India, and cheated the rest of the world. The only difference between her and ourselves is, that we are dependent on foreign countries for the purchase, and she for the sale of manufactured articles. But is there no medium between being dependent on foreigners for the purchase or the sale of the necessities of life? Could we permit our industrious citizens to furnish a supply for home consumption, we should be dependent on neither the one nor the other. Must we of course manufacture for exportation, if we encourage the system at all? By no means. The effect of a judicious encouragement of the mechanical arts will be to retain in the country the cash which is now paid to foreigners. Will this be nothing, sir? Is it nothing to prevent the annual exportation of thirty millions of specie? This bill will enable us, in peace and in war, to set at defiance the worst possible state of the European markets, and leave us free to profit by every change in our favor. I am not disposed, said Mr. G., to sound an alarm on every trifling occasion; but I cannot help believing that if we pursue our present course of policy, it will require no prophet to foretell the extensive ruin which awaits us. A moneyed aristocracy, the most odious of all the forms of tyranny, is making rapid strides to universal dominion. The late prosperity of our affairs, and the present state of our resources, have enabled the capitalist to reap an extensive harvest of gain.

I am well satisfied, said Mr. G., that there is a decided majority in the House who approve of the principles upon which this bill has been framed. They all acknowledge that our policy must be changed. It is, evident, however, that certain items of its detail are unsatisfactory to some of its friends. For myself, sir, I can assure the House that no private consideration shall induce me to vote against the passage of the bill. It has a national object in view, and individual considerations should be laid aside. We have heard much wrangling from a quarter whence it should have been least expected. The very people who are most interested in the passage of this bill, and whose demands for the encouragement of their peculiar industry have almost uniformly been complied with, are clamorous about a miserable tax of five cents the gallon on molasses. My immediate constituents, sir, are deeply interested in the proposed increase of duty on bar iron; but I am proud to believe that, should it be stricken out, I should forfeit their confidence by voting against the bill. I trust, sir, that the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia will be rejected.

The question was then taken on striking out the first section of the bill, and decided in the negative, 73 votes to 48.

The Committee of the Whole then took up the other bill referred to it, by the title of "A bill regulating the payment of duties on merchandise imported, and for other purposes."

[This bill provides, that, from and after a certain date, the duties laid on all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, except dying drugs, and materials for composing dyes, gum arabic, gum senegal, and all other articles used solely for medicinal purposes, cassia, cinnamon, cloves, chocolate, cocoa, coffee, indigo, mace, molasses, nutmegs, pepper, pimento, salt, ochre, sugar, tea, shall be paid before a permit shall be granted for landing the same, unless entered for exportation or deposited in public store houses. On the excepted articles, duties not exceeding one hundred dollars in amount to be paid in cash; and, if exceeding that sum, shall be allowed a credit, on one half for three months, and on the other half for six months—except tea, the duties on which are to be payable, in equal payments, at three, six, and nine months.]

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

Mr. BALDWIN rose and addressed the Chair as follows :

In commencing its operations, our Government justly deemed it of great importance to give every facility to the commerce of our country. There was then peace in Europe. Commerce was principally in the hands of two nations, whose capital was so abundant that, in Holland, it was said not to be a bad business for a merchant, by his labors and the employment of his money, to realize 6 per cent. In England, an unequivocal evidence of the extent of unemployed capital was, that their 3 per cent. stocks were in the market at 93 per cent. It was no part of the policy of these nations to give aid to commerce by affording credits at the custom-houses, on the importation of goods—it was not necessary. In this country the case was different. The period which immediately succeeded the Revolution, was one of unexampled embarrassment, from which we were just recovering when the Government was organized. There was but little capital in the country. Its commerce was mostly carried on by foreigners, whose superior capital gave them great advantages in their competition with our citizens—it thus became necessary to divert trade from its accustomed channels, by every possible facility. Imposts were the principal source of revenue—merchants the agents to collect from the people. Credits for the duties were allowed them, not only to give time to collect from consumers, but as a means of increasing their capital, by retaining, and having the use of the money, until their bonds became due. In 1789, the credit allowed on goods from the West Indies, was four months; on Madeira wines, twelve months; on all other goods, six months. In 1790, a credit was given on teas from China, of twelve months. In 1795, the credit on goods from the West Indies was altered to three and six months; from Europe to eight, ten, and twelve months. In 1799, a general system was adopted; from the West Indies, half in three, half in six months; salt, nine months; wines, twelve months; from Europe, one-third each in eight, ten, and twelve months; other than from Europe, half in six and one-fourth, each in nine and twelve months; teas, as other goods, or, at the option of the importer, to be deposited, and bonds given at two years, and to be sold for the duties, if the bonds were not duly paid. In 1805, all importations from the eastern coast of America, north of the equator, were allowed the same credits as those from the West Indies. In 1818, the credit on such importations was extended to six and nine months; on those from other countries than Europe and the West Indies, (salt, wines, and teas excepted,) to eight, ten, and eighteen months, one-third being payable at each of these periods. No alteration has since been made, so that the credits now are:

On the duties on importations from the West Indies and north of the equator, (excepting Europe,) half in six and half in nine months.

From Europe, one-third in eight, one-third in ten, and one-third in twelve months.

From the East Indies, one-third in eight, one-third in ten, and one-third in eighteen months.

Of wines, twelve months.

Of salt, nine months.

Of teas, one-third in eight, one-third in ten, and one-third in twelve months; or, if deposited, twenty-four months.

While our commerce was struggling to compete with that of other nations, there were good reasons for allowing liberal credits on the duties; but, when the French revolution threw the commerce of the world into our hands; when the capital of foreigners was employed by our merchants, the use of it being amply compensated by the protection of our flag, there would seem to have been no very powerful reasons for taxing the consumers to create or enlarge the capital of merchants; for such is the immediate effect of custom-house credits. It is understood to be the custom of merchants to calculate their profits on the aggregate cost of goods, including charges and duties. The amount of duties is, in effect, a loan from the Government to the merchant, without interest, which becomes a part of his capital, and is as productive as the money he has actually remitted in payment for his goods. It would seem then to be as reasonable that he should furnish this, as that he should furnish the other portion of his capital. When the credit on the duties exceeds that allowed on sales to retailers, it affords to the importer the further advantage of the active use of the money which has been drawn from those who really pay the duties.

It would have seemed more consistent with general principles, if, in the infancy and during the hard struggle of our commerce, liberal credits had been given, and they had been gradually diminished, as there was less occasion for them. The reverse, however, has been our policy. Though, during the period of short credits, our commerce was constantly and rapidly increasing, and not content with a fair division with other nations, was attaining a monopoly, yet the credits were extended in proportion as the real necessity for them diminished. Even so late as 1818, when our East India merchants had acquired vast wealth, abundant capital, and were without foreign competition, their credits were in part extended to eighteen months—a longer period, I will venture to say, than they give their customers. The consequence of this system is, that, by selling at auction for cash, or on short credit, for notes which can be discounted at bank, the amount of duties thus loaned may be invested in a new voyage. Generally one, and often two adventures, may be completed before the duties on the first are due.

We have lately heard much of the favorite commercial maxim: "Let us alone, let trade regulate itself." The practical application of this maxim is developed by this custom-house system. Our legislation upon this subject has been uniformly progressive. Regulation has indeed followed regulation; but it has been to give additional facilities to commerce. The credits at the custom-house have been often altered; but in every case they have increased. Our statute book does not contain a solitary instance of a credit diminished. This system having been coeval with our Government, followed up by a uniform series of acts for thirty years, is now viewed as the natural and established order of things; as a matter of right, not of favor. Extending the credit means, "let us alone;" to reduce it to the old terms is to destroy the commerce of the country. It is worth while to look at the practical illustration of this rule in the act of 1818, the last law on the subject, passed on the last day of the session. The East India credits were extended to eighteen months, in the last line of the last clause in the last section of a bill for the deposite of wines and spirits, and for other purposes. It might be well to inquire into the evidence on which this measure was reported. It is at least to be hoped that, from whatever other quarter it may come, the doctrine of "letting things regulate themselves" will not again be heard from those who owe so much to regulation.

In speaking thus plainly of these credits, I must not be understood as objecting so much to their expediency at the time of their adoption, as to their being continued and enlarged after the reasons for which they were granted have ceased, and when their effects have become injurious to all parts of the country. They were granted for the benefit of American commerce, and as facilities to American merchants; but they now operate to the destruction of the one and the impoverishment of the other. From a careful examination of the weekly abstracts of merchandise entered at the custom-house in New York, in the year 1819, it appears that there were entered 32,958 packages of dry goods, of which 24,659 were on foreign, and 8,299 only on American account. Thus, in the proud emporium of our commerce, where capital is abundant, and in vain seeking profitable employment, three-fourths of the importations appear to be on foreign account, the sales of which, for the most part, are by auction. This is no forced, but the plain and evident effect of obvious causes. The nations of Europe, to whom England allied herself, and whom she subsidized to destroy the continental system, having accomplished the object of putting down its author, retained or readopted the system itself. That nation, who fought the common battles of herself and other nations, and who paid them for fighting for themselves, now finds her manufactures mostly excluded from the Continent; her merchants and manufacturers seeking rather for some market than for a good one. Few nations will buy from them at all; none but this will furnish them with a capital without interest on a long credit. Other nations regulate this matter; they require prompt payment of duties, or deposite of goods. We leave things to regulate themselves, and allow foreigners to avail themselves of three-fourths of the benefits of our credits. Depressed at home for the want of a market as well as of capital, they eagerly look to us as affording both. During the wars in Europe they could not improve these facilities; but now they hold out inducements and offer temptations which will lead to a great increase, and a final monopoly of our trade in such hands. An ordinary trading voyage to England may be completed, the goods sold by means of auctions, notes discounted, and the proceeds ready to be remitted back in four months. By the Liverpool packets much less time will suffice. But, allowing three operations in a year, I find that our custom-house credits on cottons and woollens will double the capital employed in the first year, and increase 135 per centum at the end of the second year. In this mode a loan, perpetual and increasing in a steady ratio, is made by our Government to the foreign merchant; who, while he thus obtains it without interest, is enabled to continue his operations; and, to avoid the notary he looks more to his credit than to his profits, and will continue his business though it may be a losing one. What to the American merchant would be a losing is to him a gainful trade. The American importer becomes a mere caterer to the foreign manufacturer. The orders sent out by him indicate the quantity, kind, and quality of goods required at our different ports. The manufacturer, thus advised of the demand, sends similar articles to the same market. If, after deducting charges, he can receive in New York the price at his manufactory, he has the usual profit and an increase to his capital by the custom-house credits. The American merchant pays the manufacturer his price in England, and must sell here at an advance, or decline business. It is therefore not a matter of surprise that so large a proportion of importations should be on foreign account, but rather that there should be any other.

This at once accounts for the cries of distress which assail us from the commercial cities, imploring us to abolish credits on imports, and impose heavy duties on auction sales. The operation of these two causes on all the great interests of the country, shows their intimate connexion, their mutual dependence. I hope all will unite in affording a remedy. It will be truly unexpected if gentlemen shall be found willing to have the revenue, commerce, and agriculture, abandoned to their fate, because the only measure which can save them will likewise benefit manufactures. The occasion is now fairly presented to the House. This bill has been called for from the seaports. It has been reported, published in the counting-rooms of merchants for three months, and not a solitary petition against it from individuals has been presented. Called for by all, and I may almost say opposed by no part of the country, necessary to correct existing, not fancied, evils; evils which are felt, and threaten to be greater in future, I cannot but feel some confidence that even the opponents of the tariff will be in favor of this bill. For the revenue it is almost indispensable, as well for security as for convenience. On the first of January of the present year the amount of revenue bonds actually in suit exceeded three millions of dollars. On the first of this month (April) it was considerably increased—say to $3,120,000. On the first of January, 1819, it was only $1,740,000.

That the increase of custom-house delinquencies has kept pace with the increase of importations on foreign account, is not only apparent from the nature of the case, but from this document,* which in itself contains the most conclusive evidence of the fact. Salem, one of our proudest commercial towns, owns one-fourth of the East India shipping of the United States. The longest credits are on East India goods, and the security for the duties is most liable to be impaired by the casualties of trade. Salem has, probably, a greater amount of commerce, in proportion to its population, than any other town in the Union; but it is prosecuted on American account. The bonds in suit there, at the last returns, amounted only to $4,366; in Boston, the amount was $174,000; in New York, $844,000; in Philadelphia, $471,000; Baltimore, $445,000; Norfolk, 251,000; Charleston, 210,000; Savannah, $251,000. These are, as to revenue, the effects of a change of the imports of the country to foreigners. American merchants are idle; they offer to loan you their money at five per centum on a long loan. They are fixed in the country—their property and character are security for the payment of duties due from them. It is not so with the transient foreigner. His cargo gives him credit, and makes him a good man at the custom-house. One is surety for another. They sell their goods at auction, and go off and leave their bonds unpaid. The money is lost to the Treasury, but is taken from the pockets of our citizens. Thus, this credit system tends strongly to the exhaustion of our resources, to the oppression of our own, and the encouragement of foreign industry. When, in addition to these credits, the importations of foreigners are sold by auctioneers, and one man does the business of one hundred, we have only to calculate the effects on the merchant, the mechanic, all the inhabitants of a seaport, and the farmers of the surrounding country; one hundred houses, one hundred stores unoccupied; one hundred sets of clerks and servants unemployed; one hundred families less to feed and clothe, to pay general and local taxes, to contribute to the support of the Government, and the defence of the country. To this list, and to embrace all classes of society, I hope I may add the manufacturer, in whose favor import duties cease to be discriminating, the credit having the effect of a positive bounty on the importation of foreign fabrics. The credit, averaging twelve months, is equal to six per centum to the needy foreign manufacturer, who, in hope of better times, is willing to keep up his credit at any loss. The loan thus obtained, may be worth the whole amount of duties, the highest rate of which is but thirty per centum, say two and a half per cent. a month—a rate of interest not unheard of in times of commercial embarrassment, even in this country.

*An official return of the amount in suit in the different ports in the United States.

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

To guard against these general and increasing evils, and to combine, as much as possible, the protection of all the great interests of the country, the bill proposes to allow on drugs, dye stuffs, and what are generally called groceries, except wines and ardent spirits, a credit of three and six months; on teas, three, six, and nine months; manufactured articles to pay the duties on their arrival, or to be deposited in warehouses for six months, and then to be sold by auction, if the duties are not paid. Though all the petitions on the subject (and the House will remark that most of them are from merchants,) prayed for an indiscriminate abolition of credits, the committee apprehended that this would cause a change in the commerce of the country, which, in its present depressed state, it could not bear. Strange as it may seem, and little as I well know they will be credited, even for the existence of the motive, the Committee of Manufactures did anxiously desire, and took great pains to shape this bill so as to answer all the common objects, and yet save the merchants from the ill effects of granting the entire prayer of their own petitions. Had we done that, we should have been justly exposed to the imputation of attending to only one, and not considering the other matters referred to us by the House. The West India trade was in the hands of American merchants, and did not operate injuriously to the principal manufactures; we did not intend to touch these credits, and, I think, by sound construction of the law, we do not. This requires explanation. In 1799, these credits were enlarged from four to three and six months. In 1805, the importations from countries north of the equator, on the eastern coast of America, and the islands adjacent, were allowed the same credit as importations from the West Indies; thus making two distinct descriptions of places or countries, the one not including the other. In the famous law of 1818, the credits on importations from north of the equator (using the same words as the law of 1805,) were extended to six and nine months. The construction given to this act at the custom-houses has been, that it extends to the West India credits. Believing this to be erroneous, and that neither the intention nor the words of the act will embrace the case, we feel satisfied that they remain as fixed in 1799. If we are mistaken, it at least shows the necessity of watching provisions of this kind, which have any important bearing on the revenue, and the impropriety of inserting them in laws, the title of which would not lead the House, on the last day of a session, to examine all its details. On the importation of goods imported from the East Indies, it has not been thought necessary to give a longer credit than on the same when imported in the West Indies; our views having a reference rather to the articles imported than to the place whence derived.

No good reasons presented themselves for giving facilities to importations from countries with which our trade was a losing one, and which afforded no market for our produce. It appears that, in the years 1817 and 1818, our exports to China alone amounted to $7,240,000; of which $5,600,000 were in specie, $1,512,000 in foreign, and only $74,896 in American produce. The exports of products to Asia were, American $61,000, foreign $511,000; amount of specie not known. In 1818 and 1819, the amount of specie exported to China exceeded $7,000,000. Desirous not to bear too hard upon, and unwilling to encourage this trade, the credits were reduced to such a term that a new voyage could not be completed on the capital furnished by the duties on a former one. This was carried on mostly, if not wholly, by men of great wealth, who could require no facilities except in regard to importation; and these, it is believed, are liberally provided for by the third section of this bill. But there were imperious reasons for abolishing the credits on manufactured goods, especially from Europe. The security of the revenue, the protection of American commerce and industry, seemed to concur in demanding such a change in the system, that the goods should not come into the market till the duties were paid. It was much wished to discriminate between importations on foreign and domestic account; but the objection seems to be insuperable against refusing to the foreigner a right to deposit on the same credits we were willing to allow to our own merchants. A refusal in the first case would have destroyed the little that remains to us of the carrying trade in Europe. France and England allow us to deposit all articles, even those which are not admitted to entry, until an eligible market can be found. They would refuse us what we denied to their subjects. In the other case, a refusal would violate our convention with England; for, though the rates of duty be nominally the same, yet the difference in time would make the difference in effect. I consider that convention so important and beneficial to the commerce of this country, that from interest alone we ought to observe it with the most scrupulous good faith, as a means of preserving our navigation. Without it you would be called on for protection, as you now are in relation to France. Though it is now not only presumptuous, but almost criminal, for Western men to interfere in the regulation of commerce, I beg those in that interest to reflect what would be the state of their trade with England if, as in the case of that with France, it had been left to "regulate itself?" I speak it with pride, it was not only regulated, but saved by Western men.

A very obvious defect in our present system of credits is, that it makes no difference between importations for home consumption and for re-exportation. In reducing the credit on some, and abolishing it on others, the committee foresaw that their plan would operate severely on that kind of commerce which they thought deserving of protection and every facility, unless a discrimination was made. The bill provides for that in a manner which will effectually repel every imputation of hostility to commerce. It leaves it to the option of the importer to avail himself of the present system of drawbacks, by giving his bond for the duties and taking the debenture on exportation; or to declare his intention at the time of entry, giving his bond with security, to export and not reland the goods; or, in lieu of such surety, to deposit them in a warehouse. [The time of exportation is left blank in the form of the bond.] No bond for the duties is required. It is only for his integrity, that the revenue may not be defrauded. He may deposit, and take three months within which to make his election whether to try the domestic or a foreign market, without making a declaration of his intention to export. The section in relation to deposits contains substantially the same provisions as are in the existing laws respecting the deposit of teas—varied only so as best to connect the convenience of the merchant with the security of the revenue. On examining it, the House will perceive that, in the whole, it leaves the credits substantially as they were in 1790; that it is not so much an alteration as a restoration of the old system. The changes which have been made are indispensable.

The credit on manufactured goods tends so strongly to do away all discrimination in our present tariff, between imported and domestic articles, that efficient encouragement cannot be given without abolishing them. We have used our endeavors to do it in the manner least injurious to commerce.

It is not without much surprise that I have heard the various objections to this bill. Not that an alarm should have been raised about revenue, commerce, and smuggling; these are always expected, when any measure is proposed which tends to the benefit of manufactures. It is a matter of course to hear them. Local and personal reflections have been made on the committee who have reported it. Gentlemen seem to forget that a majority of that committee represent commercial places, and ought to be as much alive to their interest as those who represent districts which have no commerce, and who seem so much alarmed by the injury with which this bill threatens it. It is strange that merchants are not only easy on this subject, but desirous of its adoption; that it has been reported on their petitions, and by their immediate representatives. But it seems that they do not know their own interest; that their friends and new allies, in the fervor of their zeal and friendship, must take them under their guardianship. I think I can duly appreciate the reason. It is not because they are so friendly to commerce, but unfriendly to manufactures. This bill combines, with the other objects, the protection of this great interest, and hence arises their great hostility to it. I am not insensible of the impression made in the House by the powerful opposition it has met with, and that I am put on the defensive. You must allow me to answer the objections, to have it understood. The Committee are charged with attempting to destroy the settled system of commerce, which has been so long in operation, and under which this country has attained to its present greatness; and gentlemen speak of those long credits as coeval with the Government, when they well know they have been the work of later days. It is, at any rate, a singular objection that the Committee of Manufactures, in framing this bill, are charged with having consulted the interests of the wealthy merchants. This, from capitalists, is certainly unexpected. They must be hard to please, when their great opposition to this measure arises from its tendency to promote their interest. If this is true, it ought to please all. The small dealers do not complain; they are satisfied, nay, desirous of its adoption; chambers of commerce and East India merchants are its only opponents, and that because it does too much for them. They must excuse me, if I attribute their disposition to a much less disinterested motive. The craft is in danger; the charm is about to be dispelled by which the people and Government of this country have been led to believe that foreign importations are the sources of revenue and wealth. The Treasury is empty, the people are impoverished; the cause is seen and felt to be the prostration of national industry, the encouragement of foreign.

This objection was not urged by the same gentleman a few days ago, when you made a total and complete change of the system for the sale of the public lands. It had been tried for twenty years, had never been changed or altered, and was attended with no inconvenience—not a cent had been or could be lost. You had profited by it—had, by forfeitures, made a clear profit of $400,000. There was not a petition in favor of its abolition. But these were fancied evils; you apprehended danger; you thought a change would be useful, and, by almost an unanimous vote, have passed a law by which a poor man, desirous of securing to himself and family the means of support, must pay all cash for his title to eighty acres of land. Now we find the advocates of this measure so wonderfully attached to the system of impost and enormous credits, that they will not consent even to reduce them; and, while they affect so much fear for agriculture, commerce, and revenue, are willing to permit the foreign merchant to have his twelve and eighteen months credit on his cargo of half a million of manufactured goods, the poor farmer must pay cash for his land—the foreigner may not only have a credit on his goods without interest, but be allowed to double his capital by the loan thus obtained from our own citizens. You see by this system that one-fifth of your revenue is at this moment in suit. You know that the greatest portion of delinquencies is by foreigners; that much of it will be lost; that the duties are taken from the pockets of the consumer, which do not and never will go into the public Treasury, but to foreign countries; that this evil is increasing most rapidly; that the amount in suit has doubled in the last year, and is at this moment greater than ever. You must borrow money to make up the deficiency thus caused, and yet listen to the cry of “you will destroy the revenue”—you are attacking ancient and venerable systems. Trace these credits through your laws, and you will find that this bill is, in substance, coming back to the old system of 1790—that it only does away innovations of later years. Much is said about the small losses in the revenue for thirty years; this only proves that the bonds of our merchants are good; but will any one say that their bond is better or safer than their money? But, though the bonds of the American merchant are safe, you have here official evidence that those of foreigners are not. Suits increase with foreign importations, and you must not be surprised if the losses of the last two years are more than all the preceding ones. Fancied evils made you take away the credit on the public lands, but realized ones do not induce you to reduce them on importations. Commerce is, it seems, in danger—yet it is well known that these credits have been the means of throwing it into the hands of foreigners. Ask the American merchant if this bill will injure him—the merchant, the house owner of the seaport, who suffers by long credits and auction sales. Let the rate of rents, the price of labor, the unemployed houses, stores, clerks, laborers, and shipping, answer. We have been told that, if foreign importations do not give employment to labor, value to property, and markets for provisions and materials here, they do in some other countries. Here I understand the gentleman who has made this remark, and thus points out the difference between his principles and mine. I do not profess those broad and comprehensive principles of philanthropy which enable me to look unmoved at the general distress which pervades our whole country, and find consolation in the reflection that, though our policy destroys the industry and prospects of our own, it encourages that of other nations. We are sent here to legislate for our own citizens; their interests should be our peculiar care—let others take care of themselves; their legislators do not leave things to regulate themselves. When they are called on for protection to any of their great interests, other Governments do not say, if you have no employment here, if your manufactures are abandoned, your seaports depopulated, your farmers without markets, and your revenue in suit—it is better somewhere else. No member of this House can be ignorant of the fact, that our commerce is rapidly declining, and by means of these credits; the friends of the mercantile interest are certainly liberal in the extreme in insisting on their continuance, when not a nation in the civilized world gives a credit but ours. Is it sound policy thus to impart to others benefits ruinous to ourselves, when there is no reciprocity?

It has been said that other Governments encourage importations, and that this bill contains less liberal principles than their codes. The commercial experience of the gentleman has taught him better; he must think us strangely ignorant of their regulations, not to know the total incorrectness of the remark. He knows it, that all other nations discourage importations for home consumption; they encourage them for deposit, as auxiliary to the carrying trade. We afford the solitary exception of the reverse; not a prohibited article in our tariff, no discrimination between imports for consumption or export, except the drawback of duties. This bill makes it; it gives facilities for export which were never offered before; it will aid American commerce, which is worth pursuing; it will take it from foreigners, who now almost monopolize it. I am not tenacious of the details of this bill; the great object is the reduction of the credits on manufactured goods; if too much is asked, let gentlemen say what will suit their ideas. Will they agree to any modifications, will they give up a little, or do they insist on retaining the whole—willing that commerce may be destroyed, if manufactures are not benefited? It would have much better suited my ideas, if we had endeavored so to modify the bill as to answer our common objects. But it seems that we have been mistaken in our expectations of conciliation; nothing will satisfy the gentleman, but, by striking out the first section, the total defeat of the bill; there must be no modification, no alteration, no reduction of credits. Not satisfied with what they call the old system, they cling to the memorable act of 1818, as eagerly as if the whole commerce of the country depended on it. True to the commercial maxim, "keep what you have got, and get what you can," while regulations are progressive, adding to your benefits, call that the natural order of things; but when the least attempt is made to touch even a skirt of your system, fold up your hands and say, "let us alone," let us regulate ourselves. If we adopt your maxim, and offer to divest commerce of even the ruinous trappings of its regulations, then the cry "revenue and smuggling," comes to your aid, and keeps off this most odious thing called regulation. I understand it; it will be understood by the country; we are always regulating commerce—you will this session: it is necessary to save it, if the petitions for navigation acts are to be believed.

Let the House not forget one celebrated regulation in the late war, when goods to an immense amount had been imported, in violation of your non-intercourse acts; when the merchants had given bonds to the amount of twelve millions of dollars, which were forfeited, which they added to the price of their goods, and received from the people of the country, the consumers, on the ground that they were obliged to pay them to the Government. You, by one "regulation," remitted them; and, at the expense of the treasury and the nation, put the money in the pockets of men who now say—"let us alone." When half as much is done for manufactures, I will admit that they may regulate themselves. I do not urge these matters from hostility to commerce, but to let its friends see that not the want, but the excess, of regulation has now made it necessary even for them to do away some part of their system, to induce them to make a common cause with the other great interests of the country, to save themselves. Our export of produce, and import of goods for home consumption, has ever been unprofitable; the only valuable part of our commerce, the carrying trade, is now leaving us; it can only be brought back by regulations. It is not denied that the importations are now mostly on foreign account. Importers will be exporters; those who bring you goods, will take away your produce; if there is a surplus of imports, foreigners will take them to other markets. Merchants must see this; they now feel it; the situation of your seaports abundantly proves the fact. The pride of opinion must be abandoned. Commerce is no longer what it was—the change in the relations of the civilized world has been the cause—measures must be changed with the times; and, when we can trace to a definite source a great portion of all the embarrassments of the treasury and the people, we are called on by every motive which ought to influence a national Legislature to join in the remedy. In asking for the abolition of credits on manufactured goods, it is not any bounty or even encouragement of domestic manufactures. It is only that you take away the bounty, the premiums on imported, the inducements, the temptations that the needy foreigner cannot resist—that you shall not take money from the people of this country, and lend it, without interest, and often without security, to the foreign importer. Apply the favorite commercial maxim, not as practised on, but according to its real meaning; take away the credits, rescind the regulations which give them; then things will regulate themselves; now your laws regulate them.

The duties imposed by the existing laws are said to be sufficient protection; and so they might be, if the operation of the system made them, to the amount, a discrimination between the foreign and domestic fabrics. When impelled by the general distress, the prostration of all sources of national industry, to complain of its insufficiency, and propose remedies, one gentleman charges the committee with obtaining their object by indirect means, and tells us to increase the rate of duty; another tells us this will be unavailing by the increase of smuggling. I had thought that the last charge brought against the Committee of Manufactures would have been that their objects were indirect. If the bills they have reported do not on their face explain their objects, the observations of their chairman have not left their views a matter of conjecture. If the bills pass, there will not be much doubt about their direct effect; at any rate, they are meant to be efficient. I think it not very honorable to the mercantile character of this country to be told by experienced merchants, we will smuggle if you touch our system; raise a duty or diminish a credit, we will violate your laws. Let me entreat them to put too high a value on their reputation to hold out to this House threats of this kind.

As to high duties, the gentleman and I understand each other very well; but neither on this, or his resolution calling for evidence, is the committee to be caught. High duties are not the efficient means of protecting our industry; had we proposed them, we should have defeated our own measures; the triumph would have been the greater, as we should have destroyed ourselves, by falling in the snares of our opponents. Moderate duties, but so imposed as to be collected, so as to afford a real and not a mere nominal preference to our industry, are what we aim at. At present, they are merely a tax on the consumer, and operate in a very small degree for any other purpose.

Calculate the bounties, premiums, and drawbacks of other Governments, on the exportation of goods, our custom-house credits, and sales at auction, it will be found there is little, if any, discrimination in favor of our manufactures; the duties are balanced by these advantages. It has been more our object to remove these premiums on importations than to raise the rate of duties. We are told that one-third of the shipping of the United States is idle—it is certainly true. I will thank the gentleman to give us the reason—he knows it is not the prosperity of our manufactures; that the trade of the country is passing from our merchants; if ours is idle, foreign shipping is employed—that the custom-house credits are the main cause; yet he will not agree to the change. I am bound to hope it is not because this bill aids other interests as well as commerce. Had it been reported by another committee, had the provisions of the third section been offered by any other than the Goths and Vandals of the West, I think they would have been retained; it is not impossible that even the European credits would have been reduced. But nothing from the Committee of Manufactures will be accepted; even favors from them will be rejected. I am glad that I voted against the separation of the Committees of Commerce and Manufactures. I well knew that it would hold out to the House and the country the idea that their interests were opposed; it was my belief then, and is now, that they are the same; experience will show it; both are declining, not only going, but gone; the same measures are necessary to redeem both.

The committee well knew that they were undertaking an ungracious task in acting on all the subjects referred to them. How far they have acted impartially can best be judged, not by professions, but their acts. I am willing it should be tested by this bill, confident that when this excitement shall pass away, it will remain as evidence of our disposition to do as much for commerce as for manufactures—equally confident that the time will come when its loss will be regretted by those who now oppose it, not only as to parts, but the whole—who will now agree to no amendment, no modification, but hold on to the old system in all its changes. All seem to admit that the commerce of the country is rapidly declining, but we are promised a change in 1822. I would be indeed thankful for the information on which this prediction is made, happy to know the means by which it is to be realized. Does the gentleman judge by experience, from facts, or does he rely on the chapter of accidents? Let me warn him not to indulge in delusive hopes; to look to causes and effects, and, while there is a commerce to protect, not to delay the means of its restoration. Above all, let him beware how he presses on us his favorite maxim—of let things regulate themselves.—This nation may not always apply it exclusively to manufactures; even here equality may be equity, and this favored child of legislation may be left to regulate itself. When 1822 arrives, and the gentleman's predictions turn out dreams, we shall perhaps have learned that Government is instituted to protect more than one interest; that laws to favor commerce are not to be claimed as matters of right; for manufactures, to be implored as charities, gratuitous favors flowing from your good grace; that one part of the nation is not to claim a monopoly of protection and protest against its being granted to another, as an usurpation of its prerogatives. How will he like to hear, to the prayers of commerce supplicating aid against foreign laws, and competition, and domestic indifference, the appalling answer of “regulate yourselves!”—if you are not doing well, commerce is doing well somewhere else; your relief will injure manufactures, the revenue, and lead to smuggling; we have adopted another child, and leave you in the enjoyment of your own principles. This day may come, but it is not our fault; we have held out our hands in friendship, but have met with a cold repulse. If commerce is now left to itself by a repeal of all our regulations in its favor—the bounties on fisheries, navigation acts, coasting trade, tonnage duties, discrimination on imposts, light money—how would its friends like this “being let alone?” Let them then think how we feel at receiving this answer when asking for some portion of the benefits of Government, by a measure which is called for by all parts of the nation, and is necessary for the security of the revenue. To prepare for the reception of the tariff in this House, you adopted a resolution calling on the Treasury Department for information as to its effects; those who are now so alarmed about the revenue had better call to know the effect of long custom-house credits, and the propriety of a change. They seem unwilling to do it; it is not for us to ask it, but we can easily judge from the amount of revenue bonds. On the first of January last, those outstanding, not due, were $16,100,000; if the same amount should be in suit this, as was the last year, after deducting the expenses of collection and drawbacks, you can calculate the state of the Treasury from imposts, and decide whether it is better to take the money or trust to the bonds of foreigners. You will not trust your own citizens one day for any portion of the purchase money for their pittance of land—how will you answer to them for trusting to foreigners millions of your revenue after you find, by experience, that they do not pay? How will you answer to the nation for the continuance of a system which is confessedly ruinous to agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and revenue; which* is daily adding to the distresses of all the country, and the embarrassments of the Treasury, which are increasing, and must increase, during European peace, can only be checked by some such measure as is now proposed.

I am sorry to hear it still repeated, that commerce provides all the resources of the Government. Those who ring this in our ears must surely think us very simple; that the people are so easily duped as not to know that the duty, with accumulated profits, is added to the price of every article, and paid by the consumer; that the merchant is only the collector, and is well paid for collecting the taxes;* the people pay them on every foreign article they eat, drink, wear, or use.

But, sir, this bill is totally misapprehended; it does not change the system of imports, it only makes it effectual by preventing losses; it aids your Treasury by bringing to it the money instead of bonds on long credit; it makes your system in some measure uniform and consistent, applying the same rule to purchasers of land and goods. If the bill proposed a total abolition of credits, it would be justly exposed to the attacks I am endeavoring to repel; but it goes no further than to make the duties payable in cash or the articles to be deposited, which interfere with our national industry, and principally affects that part of our trade which is in the hands of foreigners. It is objected, that it will tend still further to produce that effect, and to exclude small capitalists from importations on their own account. These objections have long since been anticipated; they have, in my mind, been completely answered by the letters in my hand from the most intelligent merchants of New York and Baltimore. The foreign merchant and manufacturer, who send their goods here, are generally needy; the regular course of trade does not give them a market, or they would not force their way to one here by auction sales; our credits operate as a loan, and increase their capital to carry on their operations at home: this is a great temptation to continuing the trade; the loan is perpetually increasing; every new consignment adds to the amount; it is unlimited as to time, and thus it will progress till you depend on foreigners, not only for supply and defence, but revenue. As one old bond is paid off, a new credit is given for an increased sum. No other nation affords these facilities; hence our market is resorted to. But take them away, take from any consignment twenty-five per cent. for duties, instead of adding that amount by a loan; compel the consigner to send the money for duties, or pay a short bill, it would effect such a total change in his business that he could not continue it; then he must take from his capital at home to pay his way abroad; now you add to it by lending him money to use for twelve months. It is the difference between a premium and a tax—a bounty and a burden.

There is no mystery in this: even the back-woodsmen can understand it. It would indeed be mysterious, if long credits encourage foreign consignments, that short ones should increase them. Cash payments give them the monopoly. I cannot dwell long on reasoning of this kind; it is much like the other objection, that capitalists will engross all the trade. This deserves some examination; if true, it presents a serious objection to the bill—if not true, the House will be able to decide on the character of the opposition. This and the auction bill are necessarily and closely connected, the one an auxiliary to the other; the petitions for both mostly from merchants and mercantile towns—whether from large or small capitalists, can best be judged by those who know the signers, and will examine the number of those petitioners. Here is a petition from New York, praying for the auction bill; there are more than seven thousand names to it. It must be a wealthy place indeed, if these are all capitalists. Here is one praying for a general abolition of all credits on all importations, signed by near five hundred merchants of that city. No one will pretend they are capitalists—no one has a right to say they do not understand their own interest. They have asked for this bill, as essential to their protection; they have made common cause with the friends of manufactures, to check an evil destructive to both. Merchants of all classes have united in its favor, small as well as large dealers. It has been opposed by no individual petitions—no small capitalist has objected, or now objects, to its passage. The only opposition has been from your chambers of commerce, some of whom have sent and directed their memorials to us; others have sent, but not directed them—circulated secretly—their effect felt, but the power not tangible. I can hear of it, but it is not on our tables—we cannot examine it. These bodies, it seems, are the guardians of commerce. Merchants undertake to judge for themselves, and ask us for a measure—a chamber of commerce remonstrates against it, as injurious. I do not well understand who these chambers of commerce are; they are generally understood to be men who are to settle disputes among merchants. In New York, I find, they are incorporated for charitable purposes—that they received the thanks of the Assembly of that State for their patriotic conduct in importing no goods from Great Britain, until she would repeal the stamp act. I would rejoice now to find chambers of commerce leaning against foreign, and encouraging domestic, industry and commerce; and in times past it would have been gratifying if some of our citizens would not have carried on commercial intercourse with England during embargo, non-intercourse, and war. I believe the members of these bodies are not generally composed of small capitalists of the first respectability—they are of the most wealthy. It is matter of some suspicion to find them guarding the small trader with so much care, and so fearful that the trade of the country will be thrown into their own hands—a suspicion that is not diminished, when I find the merchants of Salem laboring under the same fears as to benefits which this bill will give to the large capitalists, and dwell so much on the injury to the young and enterprising. Here is something unaccountable to me. In 1818, the last extension of credits was made on the petition of the East India merchants of Boston and Salem, headed by William Gray and others, the greatest capitalists of the country. There were no petitions from any other place; small dealers did not ask for eighteen months' credit, and small dealers are not much concerned in the East India trade. This law, it seems, was thus passed on the petition, and for the benefit, of the wealthiest merchants in the Union. I must be allowed to ask, how the extension and shortening of credits will produce the same effects? I think too well of the gentlemen whose names were to those petitions, to believe they did not understand their own interests, or would designedly impose on you. The gentleman who so ably represents one of these towns, must permit me to say, that, while he is contending that this bill will injure the small trader, he is contradicting the petition presented by himself, praying for long credits. Two short years cannot have made such a change in the principles of commerce. What would benefit capitalists in 1818, will do so now. Long credits will produce the same effects now as then. When objections are made to short ones, they must be tangible. I must know where to find our opponents—they must not now play thus fast and loose. If short credits were injurious to capitalists in 1818, they will not give them a monopoly now. We are not to be thus amused with reasons which can be adapted to suit any measure—they are sure pretexts to defeat this bill, not because it will injure the small merchants, but because it will benefit the manufacturer. It will take the bounty from importations, keep the money of the Government at home, prevent loans to merchants from producing new importations on the capital furnished by the duties on the old. We have given the reasons and the evidence on which this bill has been reported. I would thank the then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means for the evidence on which he extended the credits to eighteen months. In examining the effects of this change, I cannot see the injurious effects on the small trader; he can as easily pay the duties on a small importation as the large trader on a large one. Merchants adventure in proportion to their capital and credit; the duties are in proportion to what they import; the small dealer can often procure a small loan when a large one could not be obtained. The American merchant has a credit in bank, when the foreigner has none; we may, therefore, feel ourselves safe in acceding to the petitions of those who have asked for this measure, that they have not asked chambers of commerce or East India merchants to become their guardians.

Let it be remembered, too, that the small dealers are mostly in the West India trade, which is not affected by this bill—the East India and European trade, which will be deprived of one of its facilities, is in the hands of capitalists and foreigners—this accounts for their alarm, and a desire to guard their exclusive interests under the pretext of protection to the small dealers. When the latter complain, I will then think the objection may have some weight—till then, it will be considered as a pretext to cover opposition to a system indispensable for all the great objects of Government, merely because it comes in aid of manufactures. I must not be blamed for indulging this belief when there is such a settled determination evinced not to touch any part of the present credits, when the same cry is raised whether we offer to touch the act of 1818, or to abolish the whole. It is at all times amusing to hear these same alarms rung on every occasion. The tariff brought them out—this bill has increased them—"it will ruin commerce, agriculture, revenue," and even the country itself! They must be weak indeed when they rest on European and East India credits; we got along very well before 1818; there were no very imperious calls on us to extend them then; if they were shortened now, I think the sun would still shine, and water run! This is not the first time this country and all its interests have been ruined. The proclamation of neutrality, the British treaty, the French war, ruined us forever; the embargo and non-intercourse law were death; so was the late war: yet the country has survived all; it bears a great deal of ruin, and bears it very well, for one who has been ruined so often. After surviving such shocks, I think the little ruin which will be added by employing our own labor, our own materials, giving a value to our own property, carrying on our own commerce, and receiving into the Treasury all the money that the people pay for taxes, will not be too much to bear! If this is ruin it is of the kind which will restore us to prosperity. There must be a striking analogy between two opposite systems, agreeing in no one feature, yet producing the same effects—each attended with ruin absolute and irretrievable. You have tried imposts till your revenue has left you five millions short of your expenses; credits till one-fifth is in suit; importations on foreign accounts, till your commerce is destroyed; auction sales, till your merchants are idle (their hopes resting in a bankrupt law); foreign goods, till your manufactures are abandoned; foreign markets, till your farmers find their produce rotting on their hands: and yet it is contended that the continuance of this condition of the country is necessary for its welfare; that a change will be ruinous. I hope gentlemen will ask themselves if ever there was a time when there was such a scene of universal distress. If it cannot be easily traced and satisfactorily accounted for, when called on, as you have been this session, by the people of the country, they will expect some better answer to their petitions than these alarms, which are always raised whenever there has been any attempt to adopt measures of vital importance. When you urge them you must give reasons; show how the present system will restore, how the proposed one will injure us; show how internal industry will injure internal prosperity; how idleness promotes national strength or individual wealth; and, above all, satisfy the farmer for whose interest there is so much anxiety, how he is to be injured by buying his clothing from those who will purchase his produce. Now the surplus of his farm will not clothe his family and procure him his utensils; now he understands what is meant by buying cheap: that it does not consist in the price of the article he wants, so much as in the price of the article with which he is to make payment. When cloth is at ten dollars a yard, and flour at ten dollars a barrel, one pays for the other—cloth at six dollars and flour at three, the cloth to the farmer has doubled in price; the barrel of flour procures but half a yard of cloth. These things will be understood; there is no mystery in political economy; it is a plain simple calculation of what is bought by the least labor and the smallest quantity of produce.

That article is the cheapest which the consumer pays for the easiest. What encouragement does the importer or retailer of foreign goods now give the farmer; what injury has a manufacturer in his neighborhood, or a market at his own door, ever done him? Is it better for him to seek it by navigation of three thousand miles, when found glutted by supplies from other sources, the price less than at home; the home market destroyed by the eagerness for a foreign; shall all competition be destroyed, our produce left at the mercy of other nations, who have agricultural interests of their own to protect?

APRIL, 1820.

Are they better friends to the American farmer than even our own Government; theirs than our own citizens? These are questions which must be answered in some other way than "you will ruin the country." Sir, the country is ruined if you persevere in your present policy. It must and will be changed. Such radical and fatal errors will be checked by the general voice of the country, if not here. It had better be done while moderate measures will be sufficient—such as are proposed by this bill, which does not increase the duties, imposes no burden on commerce; but, merely taking away the bounty and premium on foreign manufactures, so as to leave the duties which are laid on importation a discrimination in favor of our own industry, and the trade of the country in the hands of our own merchants.

Mr. SILSBEE, of Massachusetts, addressed the Committee as follows—

Mr. Chairman: Being an inhabitant of a commercial district of the United States, I feel compelled, by a sense of duty to my constituents, to make a few remarks upon the bill now under consideration.

It seems to be generally admitted, sir, that every interest of the country is depressed at this time; and what does this bill propose—measures for the relief and benefit of all? No, sir; its object seems to be, to impose new restrictions and additional burdens upon that interest which, at this moment, is more depressed than any other. I mean the commercial and navigating interest. In the course of the past year a loss has been sustained by the merchants of this country, of at least twenty-five per cent. of the whole capital employed in foreign trade, and the prospects of the present year are not more flattering than those of the past. There will not be so much capital employed this year as there was last, because there is not so much to employ; but in that which is employed the loss (judging from present appearances) will be as great, or greater, than it was the last year. If gentlemen have attended to the memorials which have been read in this House, from the manufacturing interest, they will have learnt from them something of the present state of our navigation and commerce. We have been informed by these memorials that our ships are rotting at the wharves; that they are not worth half their cost; that a large portion of the merchants are already bankrupts; and that others are almost daily added to the list. If this be true, (and no one who has recently visited our seaports will be inclined to doubt it)—if this be true, I say, is it wise, or is it just, further to depress this interest at this time?

The bill under consideration proposes the abolition of the present system of credits on revenue bonds, and the adoption of an entire new system. The present system has been in operation, with some alterations, from the commencement of the present Government. By the act of the 4th of August, 1790; the credits for duties on imports were fixed as follows, On goods from the West Indies, at four months; on teas from China, at twelve months; on Madeira wine, at twelve months; on all other goods, at six months. At this time sales of goods were generally made for cash, or at very short credits; but, as the business of the country increased, longer credits to purchasers became usual; and it cannot be doubted that it was the encouragement of this increase of trade which induced the Government to extend these credits, as they have done at different periods since 1790.

By the act of May, 1792, the credit for duties on salt was fixed at nine months; on other West India goods, at four months; on all other goods, (except wines and teas,) half in six, a quarter in nine, and a quarter in twelve, months. By the act of January 29th, 1795, the credit on importations from the West Indies was extended to three and six months; and on importations from Europe, the credit was fixed at eight, ten, and twelve months; one-third cash. By the act of the 3d of March, 1799, the credits were fixed as follows: on West India products, (except salt,) half in three, and half in six months; on salt, in nine months; on wines, in twelve months; on teas from China or Europe, the same as other goods from those countries, unless deposited in Government stores, in which case the credit not to exceed two years; on articles from Europe, one-third in eight, one-third in ten, and one-third in twelve months; on all goods from any other place than Europe and the West Indies, (other than salt, teas, and wines,) half in six, a quarter in nine, and a quarter in twelve months. These credits have not been changed since March, 1799, except that, by the act of April 20, 1818, the credit on West India products was extended from three and six, to five and nine months; and on articles from the East Indies, South America, &c., from half in six, quarter in nine, and a quarter in twelve months, to one-third in eight, one-third in ten, and one-third in eighteen months.

These credits are given on bonds, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the collector, in double the amount of duties; or, in lieu of the sureties, the collector may accept a deposit of so much of the goods as shall, in his opinion, be a sufficient security for the amount of the duties, (not the whole goods, as is required by the bill now under consideration,) which deposit is to be held till the bonds become due, at which time, if the bonds are not previously paid, the goods are to be sold, and the surplus, after paying the bonds and charges, to be paid over to the importer of the goods. This is the substance of our present system of credits, which to this time has been found as satisfactory and sufficient as it is simple.

The system proposed by the bill under consideration, if I understand it, is this: On the arrival of goods liable to the payment of duty, the importer may elect whether to enter them for exportation or for consumption; if he enters them for exportation, he is to give bond, with sufficient sureties, to the whole amount of the goods, that they shall be exported, and not relanded in the United States. It is, however, provided that the importer may, subsequently, re-enter his goods for consumption; but this indulgence is extended only to three months from the date of importation, and on condition that the duties are all paid before the expiration of that time. If the goods are, at the time of importation, entered for consumption, and are such as named, as excepted, in the first section of the bill, they are to be entitled to a credit on one-half the amount for three months, and on the other half for six months, except teas, on which the credit is to be three, six, and nine months; one-third cash. On all other goods, of every description, the duty is to be paid in cash; or, in default of such payment, the goods (not merely enough to secure the payment of the duty, as under the present system, but the whole goods) are to be deposited in stores selected by the collector, and retained in his custody for six months, when, if the duty is not previously paid, so much of the goods are to be sold as will pay the duty and charges. Now, sir, if the Government had large and convenient warehouses established in all our seaports, as is the case in most parts of Europe, to which access could readily be had during the usual hours of business, this might not be considered so great an inconvenience; but this is not the case—and, should importers generally store their goods instead of paying the duties, almost every store in our commercial towns would be converted into a government store, and unless the Government should forthwith appoint a host of storekeepers, it will be found extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to get along with this part of this new system. It will at least be found so inconvenient and perplexing that few, if any, who can pay the duties on importation, will submit to it. I must, therefore, consider the duties on all the non-excepted articles as liable to cash payment.

APRIL, 1820.

H. OF R.

The revenue from the customs, in 1818, (the last year for which returns have been made,) was $21,828,451; of which $5,410,320 accrued on articles which are to be entitled to a credit, according to the provisions of this bill; and $16,631,852 were derived from articles which are to be liable to cash payment of duties. So that less than one-fourth part of the amount of duties are to have the benefit of a credit of three and six months, and more than three-quarters of the duties are to be paid in cash.

Sir, the merchants of the United States are at this time, and at all times, under bonds to the Government for the payment of about twenty millions of dollars within a year. Should this bill pass, and not lessen the amount of duties that would otherwise accrue, it will require from the merchants a further payment of ten or fifteen millions more, making thirty to thirty-five millions within a year from the time this bill takes effect.

Now, can the commercial interest bear an additional assessment of fifty to seventy-five per cent., at a time when they find it all but impossible to comply with their present engagements? And if such requisition could be complied with, would any interest of the country, either public or private, be benefited by withdrawing from circulation such an additional sum, when a considerable portion of it, at least, would lay dormant in the Treasury, or in the bank, for the greater part of a year? It would, to be sure, give us an overflowing Treasury for the first year, but a very impoverished one for several succeeding years.

I have heard it said, on this floor, that credits for duties are not allowed by any of the commercial nations of Europe. This, if apparently, is not really, the case. Entrepots, or public warehouses, are established, I believe, by every commercial nation in Europe; certainly by most of them, and most goods may remain in entrepot until they are sold for consumption, before the payment of duties is required; even goods prohibited for consumption may remain in depot until some foreign market offers a demand for them.

The English, French, and Dutch, may be considered the principal commercial nations of Europe.

In England, I believe, all goods may remain some months, and most of them may remain from two to five years, in the public warehouses, without bond, except such as are liable to excise, which must be bonded when put into the warehouses, and on prohibited goods, bonds must be given to export them; the payment of duties may be delayed until the goods are taken out of the warehouses for consumption. In France, goods may remain in entrepot twelve months, with the privilege of further time, by special permission; on taking them out for consumption, the duties must be paid, either in cash or by bond with sureties at four months; but goods are generally sold, in France, in entrepot, and the duty paid by the purchaser, as he takes them out for consumption.

In Holland, goods may remain twelve months in entrepot, on bond, after which prohibited goods must be exported, but other goods must remain longer, by permission of the board of licenses.

In Spain, the payment of duties is required when goods are taken from the custom-house, but I don't know how long they are permitted to remain there.

In the ports of Italy, all goods are sold in entrepot; the duties are paid by the purchaser when taken out for consumption.

In Denmark, the duties are not paid until the goods are sold to the consumer.

It will therefore be seen, that, although the European systems differ from ours, yet, that those systems afford, really, even longer credits than are allowed by our Government; with this difference, however, that there, in most cases, the goods themselves afford the security for the payment of the duties, and if the goods, by any casualty, are lost to the owner, the duty is lost to the Government. With us, instead of holding the goods, bonds with sureties are taken, and, although goods are lost by any casualty whatever, (which not unfrequently happens) yet the duties are paid to the Government. And I am confident that, to this time, the Government have been great gainers by the adoption of our own system in preference to any of the European ones. Under our present system the merchants know when their payments to Government become due, and prepare to make them; but, under the system contemplated by this bill, they cannot be so prepared; their ships may arrive two or three months earlier than expected, at a moment when they have just used so much of their means and so much of their credit, upon some new adventure, as to be unable to raise twenty, thirty, or one hundred thousand dollars at short notice; but if their ships should not arrive so soon, by two or three months, as may be expected, the funds which they may have provided for the payment of duties will, in such case, remain unproductive. A large portion of our imports are made in the Spring months of March and April, consequently the cash payments required at this time will be so large as to cause a pressure in the money market, at that time, and, as the banks will be apprized of this, they will rather lessen than increase their accommodations, at a time when they will be most wanted. There is already much complaint of the scarcity of money; the passage of this bill will not lessen this complaint.

This bill discourages importations generally; this policy is the reverse of every thing seen in Europe. It is the policy of other nations to encourage the importation of almost every article, even if prohibited for consumption; this is done, not solely with a view to benefit the revenue, and to keep down prices, but also for the further purpose of sustaining the carrying trade; and we ought to do the same, at least so far as respects articles with which we cannot supply ourselves.

It has also been said on this floor that the credits now given operate as a loan to the merchants. It will not be denied but this may be the case in some instances, but equally true that in many, and I believe I may say in most cases, the duty is paid to the Government before it is received from the consumer; and I think it may be said, without fear of contradiction, that, on an average, the duties are paid before they are realized from the sales of goods. So far as my own experience has enabled me to judge, this has certainly been the case. I have some goods now on hand, the duties on which have been paid more than three years. If merchants are compelled to pay the duties before they can realize them from the proceeds of the goods, it must be seen that the effect will be to lessen their business, and, consequently, to lessen the revenue.

It has also been said, that great losses must have been sustained by the Government, in consequence of these credits on revenue bonds. Have we ever heard any such complaints, even from the Treasury Department or elsewhere? No, sir, we have not heard any such complaint, because no such losses have happened. The revenue which has accrued from the customs, from the 4th of March, 1799, (the commencement of the present revenue system) to the end of the year 1819, is $351,329,799, upon which there has been a loss of $1,037,355, and a further sum of $540,969 which may be lost, in whole or in part; but, supposing the whole to be lost, the amount of losses will be $1,578,324—a little short of 45-100ths of one per cent. In the district in which I live, although the trade from that district is such as is entitled to the longest credits given by our laws, the losses have, I believe, been less than 1-100th part of a per cent.; and in the district of Boston, in which immense sums have been bonded, the losses have not, I think, exceeded 1-10th of a per cent. The official report from the Treasury Department shows that the whole losses throughout the United States have been less than half a per cent. Now, I ask, if another instance can probably be found in the world of a Government, or even an individual, having sustained so small a loss upon its, or upon his credits, or upon any class of credits, for a space of thirty years, in the course of which, it should also be noticed, that a foreign war, embargoes, and other restrictive measure have taken place, which have essentially affected the interest of those people who have had these payments to make? There is, I think, no hazard, in saying, that in no country on earth has the revenue from customs been so promptly paid as in this.

Under the present system, the officer at the head of the Treasury Department is, at all times, enabled to make his calculations with great accuracy, and without fear of disappointment, of the amount to be received into the Treasury for any ensuing year, by estimating the amount of bonds on hand; and we are thereby enabled to limit our expenditures accordingly; but how can he, or how can any man, under a system of cash payments, form any correct estimate as to future receipts? He cannot do it—it is impossible. And in the event of a war with a powerful maritime nation, the revenue from commerce would almost instantly stop, under the system contemplated by this bill; whereas, under the existing system, the Government will always have bonds in hand for the amount of about $20,000,000, to be paid within a year after such an event should take place.

It is said that some mercantile people are advocates for cash payments of duties, and that memorials to this effect have been presented to us. This is true, sir, and it is also true that our own capitalists, as well as the agents of foreign capitalists, would be benefited by such a measure; but the less wealthy merchant will be injured by it, and all the young and enterprising ones, of small property and limited means, will be driven from their business, or their business will be driven from them into the monopolizing hands of the capitalists; and if we are disposed to gratify them, at the expense of the great bulk of the mercantile people, and at the expense also of the consumers, we shall pass this bill, but if we look to the good of the many, in preference to that of the few, we shall not pass it.

Amongst the signatures to the memorials against discontinuing credits, we find the names of many capitalists, who would be benefited by such discontinuance as is contemplated; but, to their great credit, they are willing to yield such advantages to the public good.

If these credits had been productive of heavy losses to the Government, this would be a strong and sufficient reason for discontinuing them; but this has not been the case.

If the object of this bill is to aid the manufacturing interest, I must say that, in my humble opinion, that aid ought to be sought in some other way than by coercing people to abandon commerce (by making it more unprofitable to them) for the purpose of inducing them to devote a portion of their capital to manufacturing purposes; and really it is only in this way that I can perceive any benefit will be afforded to the manufacturing interest by this bill. It will not have much if any effect upon the importation of European manufactures, because, if the greater part of those importations are made by the agents of foreign establishments, as we have been repeatedly assured is the case, those agents, on the arrival of their goods, have only to sell a bill of exchange on their principal in Europe for as much money as is needed to pay their duties; and these bills of exchange are always a cash article in the market. This description of importations will therefore be less affected by the provisions of this bill than any other.

APRIL, 1820.

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

If I know myself I am a friend to manufacturing establishments, and am disposed to afford to that interest every aid and encouragement that can be given, consistently with due regard to the other great interests of the country. The other day I gave my vote freely and satisfactorily in favor of clothing the army with our own manufactures, without restriction as to price; but, at a time of general depression, I cannot consent to build up any one interest of the country upon the ruins of another.

If higher duties are necessary for the protection of our domestic manufactures, I have no objection to a reasonable increase of such duties, but I have always considered the imposition of duties upon a minimum price, to be an incorrect way of assessing them; it is a mode which has not, I believe, ever been adopted by any other nation. I was therefore induced the other day to move that the proviso, in the contemplated tariff, relative to coarse cotton goods, be stricken out; not however with a view of lessening the duty on such goods, but for the purpose, as I then stated, of changing the manner of assessing that duty from a nominal to an actual per centage; and whether this had been fixed at 50 or 150 per cent. I should not have objected to it.

I am unwilling to believe that the framers of this bill are so unfriendly to commerce as its provisions seem to indicate; and if, under an impression that we yet have too much commerce and too much navigation, they think that a further reduction would be beneficial, I ask them to look at the Treasury report of the district tonnage for the last year, and see if the reduction there exhibited is not sufficiently rapid, either for public or private good. That report will show a reduction of over one-fourth part of the tonnage of the United States, employed in foreign trade, within a year; and the report of next year will, I apprehend, show a still farther reduction; if it does not, it will be because we can neither sell nor give away our ships. In consequence of this reduced and depressed state of our foreign trade, the wages of our seamen have declined to one half what they were a year or two since; and should this and the tariff bill pass, they must decline still further; and shall we, Mr. Chairman, deprive of their daily bread, shall we drive to our poor-houses those brave men whose recent and I may add renowned achievements have given such imperishable fame to our country? I hope not.

Sir, we are now called upon to decide whether we will, at this moment of general depression and distress, abandon a system which has been in successful operation for more than thirty years; a system which has been productive of immense wealth to the nation, and been universally acquiesced in until this time, and adopt a new one of untried operation and effect, one which imposes such conditions as are not imposed by any other commercial nation, and such as ought not to be imposed by this, unless we are disposed to aid the nations of Europe to build up their commerce and navigation, upon the downfall of our own.

The passage of this bill will make the foreign trade of the country a monopoly in the hands of the capitalists and foreign agents, will injure if not ruin all the young and enterprising merchants of moderate property, will enhance the price of foreign articles to the consumer, not only by lessening the importations, but by placing them in the hands of capitalists who can and who will hold them for high prices, will have a tendency to lessen the price of our own products by lessening the number of purchasers for exportation, will lessen the revenue at least for several years to come; and what is worse than this, it would be productive of smuggling and other fraudulent practices, the temptations to which ought to be more cautiously avoided in this country than in any other, because our extensive seacoast and innumerable rivers, bays, and creeks, afford greater facilities for these practices than are found in any other country.

Engaged as I am in commercial pursuits, it may, and probably will, be supposed that I am induced by motives of self-interest to oppose the passage of this bill; for the purpose, therefore, of preventing the effect of such a supposition, I assure the Committee that, as an individual, I feel rather indifferent than hostile to the provisions of the bill. My own private interest would, I think, be rather benefited than injured by the passage of it; but knowing as I think I do that it will be productive of much public as well as private injury, and that the present state of commerce will not bear it, I feel it to be my duty to oppose it.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard much about the "balance of trade," which is said to have been very much against this country for a number of years past; and gentlemen seem to have made up their opinions on this subject from the custom-house returns of imports and exports, and to have concluded that the excess of the latter over the former, proves a balance to this amount against us. In the first place, these returns are very imperfect, and, if they were otherwise, would not (as they are now made) afford a correct means whereby to ascertain the balance of trade of this country; these returns might guide us to a tolerably correct conclusion, if our exports were sold and our imports purchased on our own shores. But these alone, however correctly made, are not sufficient for a commercial nation. We are the carriers of the greater part of our own exports and imports; therefore, all the advantage of freight and profit (when there is any) is to be brought into the calculation. Until the late embarrassments of commerce we had upwards of eight hundred tons of shipping employed in the foreign trade; the freight of which tonnage alone, at twenty-five dollars per annum, (which is the lowest price at which, in ordinary times, the vessels can be supported,) would amount to twenty millions of dollars, and would pay that apparent balance of trade against us; and I will endeavor to show that the imports may exceed the exports, even much beyond this, without creating a balance against us. To illustrate this, let us suppose the amount of exports for the present year to be one hundred millions of dollars, which, in consequence of bad markets abroad, produces only eighty millions, and that this eighty millions, invested abroad in foreign articles, produces, on return to the United States, in consequence of other bad markets, only sixty millions. This, according to the theory of some gentlemen, would be a very profitable trade, because the imports, according to the custom-house returns, would be less than the exports. But, I ask, how long could we sustain such a profitable trade as this? Why, sir, in the short space of two years and a half we should sink the whole amount of our annual exports.

Now, let us further suppose the same amount of one hundred millions of dollars to be exported the next year, which, owing to better foreign markets, produces one hundred and twenty millions, and that one hundred millions of this are invested in merchandise and twenty millions in specie; and that this one hundred millions, on return to this country, in consequence of more favorable markets, is worth one hundred and twenty millions, which, with the twenty millions in specie, would give us one hundred and forty millions for the one hundred millions exported. This, according to the same theory, would be a very destructive business, because, according to the custom-house returns, (as these returns are now made,) it would leave a "balance of trade" of twenty millions against us; and if those returns were made to include the specie, the balance would appear to be forty millions against us. But who, I ask, do we owe for this? Is it not so much gained by domestic industry and enterprise? Most assuredly it is. And this is such a balance of trade as I should always be willing to be concerned in; and I am inclined to think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) would have no objection to a share of it, the custom-house reports to the contrary notwithstanding.

The accounts of the Treasury Department show that the exchange has been, almost universally, in favor of this country for the last twenty years, and that a large gain has been realized on the public remittances to Europe within that time; and this alone is sufficient to refute the doctrine which has been advanced by some gentlemen on this subject.

The East India trade has also been spoken of, and by some gentlemen who are not perfectly acquainted with it. They seem to think that the importations from thence are principally manufactured articles, which is not the case. It is true, that large importations of coarse cottons were formerly made; but the present duty has operated as a prohibitory one upon that article for home consumption, and the very small parcels that are now brought are for exportation. There have been large importations of silk goods from China, and some nankeens are yet brought from thence; and these may be said to be almost the only manufactured articles now imported from beyond the Cape of Good Hope. Our cargoes from thence are principally of sugar, coffee, tea, pepper, and other spices. A year or two past, raw cotton was brought from thence for the European markets; but I presume there was not a single bale imported the last year. These articles are paid for chiefly, though not entirely, with specie. Some investments made in Bengal, Java, and China, are paid for in skins, copper, sandal wood, and other articles from the Pacific ocean; in wines and other liquors; quicksilver, opium, and other articles from this and other countries; and by drafts on Europe and the United States. And of the specie annually sent to India and China, it may be estimated that one-third to two-fifths of it is procured in and shipped from Europe. And no inconsiderable portion of this specie is raised from the proceeds of our own products which are shipped to Europe for that purpose. And it may be added that a part—and a very considerable part, too—of the specie shipped from the United States, is imported specially for that purpose.

I believe that the annual sales of India and China goods in Europe usually exceed the amount of specie taken from this country, and sometimes exceed the whole amount taken by our vessels from Europe to this country. A part of these goods which are sold in Europe are taken directly there from India and China, but the larger part are first brought to this country, and such as are not wanted in our markets are subsequently shipped to Europe. So that this trade is neither so destructive or injurious as some gentlemen seem to imagine; if it were, it must and would have terminated long since.

But for this trade, we should have had to pay much higher prices for sugar, coffee, tea, and many other articles of common consumption in this country.

This trade produces a large revenue to the Government; it employs from three to four thousand seamen; is the best nursery for that class of men, and the very best one for officers of any branch of our foreign trade, and has tended more than any other branch to improve the structure of our ships and the skill of our navigators.

Although this trade, like every other, is depressed at this time, yet it is more safe than any other now pursued from the United States. And if it is wished to paralyze the commerce and commercial enterprise of the country, it cannot so effectually be done in any other way as by restraints upon the India trade.

It was my intention to have explained more fully my views in relation to this trade, but I find myself too unwell to proceed. Before I resume my seat, however, I move you, sir, to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. LOWNDES also assigned the reasons why he also was opposed to the bill, and particularly to the provisions which contemplate restrictions on the East India trade.

Mr. CLAY spoke in reply to Mr. SILSBEE and Mr. LOWNDES, and urged the adoption of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LOWNDES again spoke; and Mr. CLAY rejoined.

Mr. BALDWIN was speaking earnestly in support of the bill; when an alarm of fire, in the city, induced the Committee to rise (at four o'clock) and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 25.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish additional land offices in the State of Alabama," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and concurred in by the House, and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN, the Committee on Foreign Relations were instructed to inquire into the expediency of imposing a duty on plaster of Paris imported from certain parts of the province of New Brunswick, to countervail a duty lately imposed by the legislature of that province on that article when exported from certain other parts of the same province.

On motion of Mr. TYLER, the Committee of Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the law establishing a collection district at Richmond, in the State of Virginia, as to cause said district to include all the waters, &c., from the mouth of Chicahomony river up to the mouth of Apomattox river, or its junction with James river.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: 1. "An act granting certain privileges to the Ocean Steamship Company, of New York;" and 2. "An act for the relief of Richard Smyth;" were severally read twice and referred, the former to the Committee of Commerce, and the latter to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the building an addition to the custom-house now erecting in the city of New Orleans, for the use of the district court of the United States for the State of Louisiana," was read the first time.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Steele," was read, and concurred in by the House.

Ordered, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and Richard O'Brien, late American Consul at Algiers," and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bills concerning the duties on imports and the mode of their collection.

The bill now under consideration, is the bill regulating the payment of duties on merchandise imported, and for other purposes.

The question immediately before the House being on Mr. SILSBEE's motion to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. BALDWIN resumed and concluded the speech which he yesterday began, in support of the principles of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, followed in decided opposition to the bill.

Mr. WHITMAN, of Massachusetts, said, he was opposed to this bill. I am opposed, said he, to the whole of this grand scheme of the Committee on Manufactures, constituting, as their chairman (Mr. BALDWIN) has declared, a great system for the encouragement of national industry. That gentleman has distinctly announced that this, together with the tariff bill, now laid aside for the moment, and a bill laying duties on sales at auction, constitute this grand system. And, sir, they are all from the same standing committee, and are all referred to the same Committee of the whole House, and all tend manifestly to one object, as has been distinctly avowed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is, indeed, impossible not to see that the arguments which will apply to the principle, that is, to the main scope and design of one bill, will apply equally to that of the other two. I shall therefore follow the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and consider the subject at large.

It is not a little singular that we should, at this period of our Government, for the first time have a standing Committee on Manufactures. What originated the Government of the United States? Was it constituted with a view to manufactures? Is there any specific delegation of power in our Constitution for this object? Have we even any direct control over manufacturing establishments? Can we legislate directly in regard to them? Have not the individual States exclusive and absolute control over every establishment of this kind within its own limits? Hitherto we conducted the affairs of this nation with some view to the original design of this Government. We have been content generally to do that which we were distinctly and explicitly authorized to do, viz., to regulate commerce—external commerce and commerce between the States. This was the primum mobile which pushed the Constitution into existence; and, while we have been content to pursue this object, the effects have been singularly fortunate.

If we look back to the period anterior to the adoption of the Constitution, and contrast it with that which has succeeded it, shall we find that there ever was an instance of any thing like this contrast in any period or in any nation in the world besides? From the most abject national poverty and distress; from a total inability to pay any portion of a Revolutionary debt—the price of our independence—of one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty millions of dollars; with a scarcity of circulating medium, which rendered it impossible for the citizens in our States to pay even the paltry taxes levied upon them for the support of the State governments, and, in some instances, insurrections existing on account of it; from this miserable and degraded condition we have, by the mere force of commercial regulations, authorized by the Constitution, become wealthy, powerful, and happy.

From commerce we have derived nearly all the revenue for our great national purposes. In the short period of thirty years, we have derived from it $318,731,161, which has preserved our credit, and enabled us to pay the principal and interest of our national debt, to the amount of $260,450,022 75. And all this almost without being perceptible to the people.

The individuals of the community have, at the same time, kept pace with the Government in the acquisition of wealth, in the increase of agriculture, in the extension of our settlements, in the enlargement of our cities, and in the embellishment of our country.

And now we are about to condemn commerce, to cripple and oppress it, and, if possible, destroy it—and for what? It is for the purpose of aiding a premature and unnatural growth of certain large manufacturing establishments.

I, sir, am in favor of manufactures to a reasonable extent, and would go any legitimate lengths for their encouragement. But I would not sacrifice other great and leading interests, and those especially which are, by the Constitution, confided to our guardianship and protection, to that of any other interest whatever. "Live and let live," it has been well remarked, is the maxim of our Government. All the great interests are to be equally protected and encouraged.

Manufactures must and will flourish in New England, when they will flourish any where in the Union. Our habits of industry, the ruggedness of our soil, the severity of our climate, and the compactness of our population, peculiarly fit us for becoming a manufacturing people.

If there be any portion of industry deserving of encouragement, it is that employed in agriculture. It is that which, with the mechanic arts attached to it, and growing with it, insures us a plenty of the necessities of life, and without which we cannot even subsist. It will secure us against famine, and prepare us to encounter the severest reverses of fortune. It is that in which nine-tenths of the people of this country are solely interested. Whatever, then, will subserve the purposes of this great leading interest, must not be neglected. In fact, every other interest should lean towards the support of this, and should have no encouragement whatever when it has, in any degree, a contrary tendency.

For the promotion of agriculture and the ordinary mechanic arts, there is nothing to be compared to commerce. The life of these depend on finding a market for their surplus products. Commerce furnishes this market. The great manufacturing scheme can never do it to an extent in any degree comparable.

Our great seaports are wholly dependent on commerce; and the country is not less dependent on seaports to furnish a ready market. The merchant contributes most effectually to general industry, and the activity of the circulating medium, and to the life and spirit of business. He sets to work more mechanics than the largest manufacturer ever can. He has in his train those who raise, cut, and procure the wooden materials for building his ships; his ship carpenters, his blacksmiths, his ropemakers, his riggers, his caulkers and gravers, his sailors and laborers—a train oftentimes amounting to from one hundred to one thousand men, constantly employed at very advantageous rates. All these are furnished with, and consume the agricultural products. Besides all this, the exports to foreign countries, annually, of agricultural products, is very large. For the last year, ending on the 31st day of December last, the authentic documents from the Treasury show the amount to have been over $46,000,000. These exports cannot be made unless we can import at the same time, and we cannot import if duties are so high that we cannot sell but at a loss. No nation will take our products without we will take theirs in return.

If this anti-commercial project should succeed, the agriculturist is to have, here and there, a large manufacturing establishment, which, at its own price, will take from him, possibly, a quarter part as much as those depending on a single merchant, and without any chance for the exportation of the residue, or of that which would otherwise be exported. Thus it is that this scheme is entirely to ruin one class of men and impoverish another of infinitely more importance than all others to the nation.

Who are these manufacturers that are so clamorous for protection? Not those now established and doing well; they are silent. Nor the mechanics, viz., the blacksmiths, the shoemakers, the tailors, the shipwrights, the joiners, the masons, the tanners, &c., &c., that have grown with the growth of commerce and agriculture. The interests of these are to be sacrificed.

The number that calls for this sacrifice of commerce is comparatively small; they are but the dust in the balance. And what do they require of us? It is, that we should consent to pay from one-fifth to one-third more for many of the great necessities of life than we otherwise should, and, at the same time, to depress the price of labor and of the native products of our country, exclusively, for their benefit. Do not our people understand that this is to render one portion, and a thousand times the largest portion of our people, tributary to the other?

I had believed that every country, understanding its true interests, had considered it most for the interest of the citizens generally, that labor should have a destination to that species of employment which is naturally the most productive. If any one species of industry needs a contribution, and, in that way, a subduction from that of another, or of all others, it is very clear that it is, excepting in a few instances, unworthy of encouragement; and that those engaged in it should be left to change their occupations.

It is certainly not for the interest of this nation to make any one class of men a privileged order, and allow them to live by extracting assistance from the hard earnings of others. There may be a description of manufactures, which it may be necessary we should, at all events, manufacture. They are those which cannot be procured in a time of peace, preparatory to a time of war, if any such there be. Fire-arms and implements of war have been considered as of this description. We, therefore, manufacture our small arms at an expense, perhaps, double of that at which we could import them. There may be other descriptions of manufactures which it may be wise and politic to encourage by bounties, or, which is the same thing, by laying high duties on the imported article. They are such as we cannot, at once, carry on for want of competent skill, and which, with a little encouragement, we would, in a short time, acquire. A temporary encouragement in such cases would be wise. But it can never be wise to force the growth of manufactures that will always require extraordinary aid to keep them in operation, and which are not essential to our defence in time of war. The labor employed in such manufactories would be more productive if employed elsewhere; and we have no interest in diverting the natural and most productive course of industry to that which is less so.

Whatever is reasonable and politic I am willing to do in aid of manufactures. Yet, I have no desire to see the energies of this Government wielded solely in aid of great manufacturing establishments. I have no desire to see that kind of encouragement given here, at present, which is given in Europe. There is no reason for it. The different situations of two countries demand a different course of policy. England, which we are so triumphantly called upon to imitate, furnishes no similitude in this particular; she has a population which is her strength, and with which she cannot part but with her existence, and which cannot be there employed in agriculture. Hence she is under the necessity of giving extraordinary encouragement to manufactures, in order to retain her people, constituting her physical strength, at home. Had she uncultivated lands without limit, and of the most extraordinary fertility, can we believe that she would, or that it would be wise for her, to afford these extraordinary encouragements to large manufacturing establishments?

Great manufacturing establishments are not desirable in our country. They would have an influence over the people that is to be dreaded, especially in a country like ours. Ours is a Government of sentiment. Whatever the people will, at any particular moment, must be done. These great manufacturing establishments have but one interest. It is an interest adverse to commerce, and oppressive to agriculture. The owners of these establishments can instantly unite, and will unite, from one extreme of the country to the other to accomplish any favorite purpose; and even in monarchies, in strong Governments, we have seen that they are with difficulty kept from an undue influence.

In this country we have a specimen, even now, in their infancy, of what they can do here. An association in Philadelphia, calling itself a Society for the Promotion of National Industry, has its branches in every part of the Union, with which it corresponds, and which it directs, and instigates, and sets in motion, by the means of pamphlets and newspaper essays. Its inflammatory and unfounded statements have pervaded every part of the Union. Each member of the present Congress has been favored with enough to make two large volumes at least. And these have, for a moment, deluded the people, and made them believe it is wise to annihilate commerce, in order to build up great manufactories. "If they can do this in the gristle, what will they do in the bone?" The more you grant, the more they will require. Avarice is never satisfied. If you yield to them now, it will but furnish motives to come again.

After destroying commerce, you must resort to direct taxation. But you must not tax the great manufacturer. This would be against the encouragement of national industry. The farmer and the common mechanic must defray all charges. Your twenty millions of dollars annually must be levied on agriculture or agricultural products. If we should yield any thing like what is so much desired; if we should plant large manufacturing establishments all over our country, and assimilate our policy to that of England, we shall find out, when it is too late, that we have reared, in a hot-bed, an engine that can and will be brought to bear upon us, and will be wielded in a way that we do not dream of. This wide-spread combination, guided by the dictates of a common interest, will do as they have done—they will move heaven and earth to accomplish their designs. I beg leave to quote a book which has been written by one of the most ingenious and critical observers of men and things in his own, or, perhaps, in any other country. Speaking of the manufacturers in England, he says: "They are aware of their own numbers. The moral feeling which, in the peasant, is only blunted, is, in these men, debauched. A manufacturing population is always ripe for rioting. The direction which it may take is accidental. In 1780 it was against the Catholics; in 1790, against the Dissenters. Governments who found their prosperity upon manufactures sleep upon gunpowder."

It has been remarked by the honorable Speaker, that "merchants have been the pet of this country." It is true that we have done much in relation to them; but, sir, we have only done what the Constitution required. But have we not derived from this pet ample remuneration for all our care and pains? From what other class of citizens could we have derived three hundred and eighteen millions of revenue in the short space of thirty years? Would the manufacturers have consented to have been thus exclusively taxed? Could we even have derived such a revenue from the agriculturists, numerous as that body is? But it will be said that the consumer pays this tax. That is true, and the same would be the case if it were assessed upon manufacturers. They must sell proportionably higher, according to the tax levied; and the farmer must, in order to derive the regular profit from his land and labor, in case he is taxed, add to his products in proportion to the tax. In relation to either of these three classes, in proportion as you tax them, you deprive them of ability to make a profit. If you tax the products of the merchant high, his ability to grow rich is diminished also; because the articles taxed must become dearer, and dearness diminishes consumption. The same is the case with all other classes. If you require high taxes of the farmer, his products must become proportionably dear, and no more will be consumed than is absolutely necessary for sustenance, and none will be exported. The farmer, indeed, has the advantage of the other classes. What he raises consists almost wholly of the necessities of life, and must be had to a certain extent, be the prices what they may. It is otherwise with the products of the merchant. They are almost wholly of articles which people can subsist without. High taxes upon him, therefore, are more certain to work his ruin. Yet almost all our revenue has been derived from the products of the merchant; and it has been derived in a manner that nobody complained of, in a form in nowise oppressive or burdensome; and, indeed, almost without knowing that we paid any tax at all.

In levying our tax upon the merchant, we have been guided by scarcely any other consideration than that of deriving from him the most we could get. We have asked ourselves but this question, "How much would the article bear without amounting to a prohibition, and without furnishing such an inducement to smuggling as would defeat the collection of the tax?" And by this rule, until lately, have we been governed. We have had experience enough of the inconveniences of any other mode of collecting a revenue. We have collected, since the formation of the Government, $12,560,130 from land taxes, and but $21,715,967 from excise. Yet the difficulties of collecting these sums have been extremely embarrassing and perplexing. The collection of the whole $318,731,161, derived from imports, has been attended with no difficulties or perplexities whatever to the public, however it may have been to the importer, in comparison with what has been experienced from the land tax alone. Yet, this wild scheme of high duties, for the purpose of excluding importations, will inevitably drive us to land taxes and to excises.

Trade is extremely depressed, as well as every thing else. The merchants have been losing continually for several years. The changes in foreign affairs has affected them extremely; and, through them, all the other classes of the community. It certainly does not become us now to add to their depression. All the gentlemen advocating this manufacturing scheme have spoken of this extreme depressed state of trade—of the numerous failures and distresses among the merchants, and some of them, I am sorry to say it, with seeming delight. We should have expected rather that something would have been done for their relief; that their sufferings would have been commiserated; and least of all should we expect that the manufacturers would pounce upon them at this moment, and endeavor to complete their ruin. It savors too much of what we too frequently meet with in common life. It is an old saying that, "when a man gets to going down hill, every one stands ready to hit him a kick." We have, surely, something like it here.

If the merchants have been the pet of this country, it is in a way that no other class of the community would like to be its pet. Whenever we have had occasion to collect revenue, it has been from the merchant, to the utmost that he could bear. Whenever we have had occasion to make sacrifices, it has been of the interest of the merchant. Look at the restrictive system, continued from 1807 to 1812, with occasional intermissions. Look at the condition of the merchant during the war. The merchant is brought up in such a manner as to be unfit for any other calling. He lays himself out to the extent of his means in wharves, stores, ships, and their cargoes. Thus situated, the restrictive system was enforced with the utmost rigor; and the merchant was cut up root and branch; and not only his personal exertions were at a stand, but his property, of the most perishing nature, was left, everywhere, to rot upon his hands. After a perseverance in this course of policy for almost five years, a war was declared, the disasters of which fell almost exclusively upon the merchant. But more yet; the Government has not only in this way made the merchants a pet, as the honorable Speaker would have it, but, after spoiliations had been committed by the French, to the amount of many millions, the Government relinquished the whole, in part payment for Louisiana; not a dollar of which, notwithstanding the numerous petitions that have been presented, has ever been paid to the merchant. And, again, the spoiliations which were committed by Spain, amounting, as is supposed, to at least fifteen millions, has been agreed to be relinquished for the Floridas; five millions alone of the consideration for which, did we agree to pay over to the individual sufferers.

And now, after suffering every disaster, and bearing every burden, and after such a change in the affairs of the world, as has subverted the former calculations of merchants, and overwhelmed them in a wide-spread ruin, you will now, I suppose, by way of continuing them to be your pet, superadd insufferable duties, and instant cash payments.

The credit heretofore extended to them for duties, is complained of as a favor. You first required of them, almost exclusively, to submit to be taxed for the entire support of Government—a tax as heavy as it was in any degree practicable to collect of them, and now complain that they were allowed any time to pay it; and now will exact cash payments, excepting on a few articles, on which you graciously condescend to give a very short credit. You will now assail the merchant just at a time when he can scarcely keep his head above water, by adding new burdens, and demanding payment in cash, instantly. When the credit system was formed, it was predicated upon an idea that it would enable the merchant to pay more, and the amount levied was proportionably increased. The honorable Speaker says, that the merchants alone have reaped the benefit of this credit. This is a mistake. The merchants, having a credit from Government for the duties, have, not only for the duties, but for the whole amount of the articles, given an equally extended credit to the retailer, and the retailer, in his turn, to the consumer. All classes, therefore, have reaped the advantage, and equally, too, with the merchant. I know this to have been the case in the town in which the honorable Speaker lives. I once spent some time there; and the traders there purchased large quantities of goods, and brought them there from Philadelphia, wholly on credit.

It is of no inconsiderable importance for us to maintain some degree of steadiness in our commercial regulations. An old regulation to which we are accustomed, is, oftentimes, much better than a novel regulation, however good it may be, to which we have not been accustomed. The present system of giving credit has been practised upon for thirty years; it is well understood; all the arrangements of the merchants are adapted to it. The proposed regulation, in this point of view, if it were a good one, which it is far from being, is extremely odious.

But gentlemen have undertaken to assert that commerce is wholly cut up; and allege that we must not look to it any longer as a source of employment, and as affording a system of revenue. One gentleman (Mr. STORRS) has called it a rotten system. We have here a prediction, I suppose, the fulfilment of which the proposed course of measures is intended to secure. Some men will predict evil, and are so anxious to justify their pretensions to the gift of prophecy that they use their endeavors to verify the prediction. But I trust the people will consider, whatever gentlemen here may do, that what has taken place will afford no warrant for their predictions.

The Secretary of the Treasury has calculated on sixteen millions of revenue from commerce alone for the year to come; and his expectations will be realized if gentlemen here, by their mad projects, in order to secure the fulfilment of their predictions, should not succeed in their schemes. A commerce which will secure sixteen millions of revenue, is not to be despised by the Government of this or any other country.

Gentlemen have indulged themselves in many philippics against the India trade. Ignorance is often full of evil surmises. It is said it drains the country of specie. True it is, that much specie is employed in this trade; but we do not so distinctly see how much specie this trade ultimately restores to us. One thing we know; and that is, that the India merchants have accumulated immense capitals, and have seldom or never failed in business; and whenever they choose to retire from business, have the largest command of specie of any description of merchants. If we understood the nature of the India trade, we should not, except in hostility to merchants and commerce generally, cry out against it. There is no branch of trade that ever has enriched the country like the influx of this wealth of the Indies; and, at the same time, no branch of trade that has ever paid a higher revenue to Government. These are certainly very desirable objects.

The course of the India trade is misconceived. Gentlemen merely know that immediately after the war five or six millions of specie were exported, to be employed in the India trade, and they do not see in what way this is ever to return. They do not consider that this was the capital of the India merchants, which they had before employed in this very trade, and which had, in consequence of the restrictive system and war, been accumulating on their hands in this country for seven or eight years; and that, as soon as the war was over, and the freedom of trade restored, they re-employed their capital as before. If their business were again to meet with a similar check, their specie would again resume its inactivity, and be found to have augmented very considerably during the time it had been employed. While inactive, it would be in the country, and would gratify the eye of a miser, but it would be making no augmentations. Like every other species of capital, it must be employed, in order to be productive.

The India trade is carried on in various ways. No inconsiderable portion of our large ships, with comparatively no specie, and with an equipment consisting of gewgaws and trinkets, visit the Northwest coast of America, and there traffic with the natives, and furnish themselves with peltries and things valuable in China, to which they proceed, and ultimately bring home large cargoes of teas, spices, sugars, coffee, &c. Others carry out cargoes to Europe, and there trade with European products, and proceed from thence to India. But some carry out specie almost entirely, direct to India, and return with cargoes. But gentlemen do not understand that the greater part of these India cargoes are not sold in the United States, but they are reshipped to various quarters of the globe. Not probably more than one-third of all that is imported from India has been consumed in the United States, and that third at least has been the earnings of the ships and capital employed. The amount of capital in the United States is thereby ultimately increased.

A trade that enriches all concerned can never be a bad trade. The ship-builder, the iron manufacturer, the cordage-maker, and hemp-grower, the producer of the ship-timber, the sailmaker, the mariner, and the merchant, are all enriched by it. And who is injured? Certainly no one. The consumer is not injured, because he would otherwise have to pay dearer for the same articles. If a trade, then, which injures nobody, and benefits such vast numbers, and produces such a vast portion of revenue to Government, be not a good trade, I know not what is.

I take it for granted that no man is wild enough to deny that individual wealth is public wealth and a public blessing: that, to have large capitals in the hands of individuals is to make the country powerful; and that it increases its resources in time of danger.

The merchants are depended upon by the Government, almost exclusively, in time of distress, for loans; and none have loaned more than have the India merchants. The town in which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SILSBEE) resides, affords the most plenary proof of the advantages of the India trade, of the resources it produces, and of the value of these resources to Government. That town has been more engaged than any other of its size in this trade. The consequence is, that it has the most wealth, according to its population, of any in the United States; and in the same proportion has it afforded its aid to Government.

There is one part of the scheme of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I would assent to. If the auction sales can be regulated by an excise, so as to prevent frauds and impositions upon the revenue, I should cheerfully vote for it. But as to his mad schemes for depressing commerce, and ruining the merchants, and burdening agriculture, I can but abhor them. He says these schemes have not come from Pittsburg. I care not where they come from. He says, too, that his proposed cash payments for duties have been recommended by the merchants. A few capitalists—men desirous of engrossing the whole of the mercantile business, to the exclusion of all the young, the active, and the enterprising, who depend on their personal resources for their success—men who are base enough to regard nothing but their own mercenary views, I grant him, have recommended his scheme. But the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. SILSBEE,) who is in a situation to derive as much benefit from cash payments as any man in the United States, has honestly disclosed what will be the effects of such a system; and every honorable merchant will tell you the same. No man can fail to see the effects of this scheme who will, for a moment, look at the subject. I had supposed it to be the policy of every Government, and especially of ours, to cherish enterprise, to encourage the active, to enable the poor to become rich, and not guard the rich so that the means of acquiring wealth should be exclusively with them. Have we not, in this country, an aversion to aristocracy? And yet, here is to be erected a moneyed aristocracy—the worst of all aristocracies.

I deprecate this monstrous stride in favor of manufactures on another account. If I know my own heart, I am a friend to the reasonable and healthful growth of manufactures in our country, but not that bloated growth which tends to apoplexy. It is in the nature of all extremes to vibrate. If we now give manufactures a premature growth, the wind will change and they will be overwhelmed in utter ruin. We are now running into one extreme. The people of the country will understand, ere long, that they are taxed, and taxed, too, not for their own benefit, but for the benefit of a privileged class; that their earnings are taken from them and given to the manufacturer. The people now, some of them at least, are deluded with the notion, that it is a fine thing to have our manufactories among ourselves. But they will awake from this dream, when they not only find that they have to pay, but to pay dearly, for this whistle. The consequence will be, that we shall be set to work to retrace our steps, and, when set to going, we shall go to the other extreme, and undo all that has been done for manufactures. We are very apt, in this country, to be running mad after some ignis fatuus or other. We are now running mad after manufactures; we shall next be running mad against them. Let there be an excise laid on whiskey for the support of manufactures, and then see what the constituents of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will say.

In setting ourselves to work for the encouragement of manufacturers, we should carefully feel our way. We should go no farther than we can go with a prospect of being steady in our support. Reliance upon the permanency of our encouragement will be more valuable than any increase of our favor without such reliance. A versatile policy is always destructive. We had better be content as we are, than seek for that which we cannot retain. It is an old saying, that "Better is the enemy of Well." We are always uneasy; always thinking we can do better; and always letting go our hold upon "Well," and looking for "Better;" and in this way working our own ruin. The manufactories of New England now have a moderate, but a reasonable, encouragement. We are, nevertheless, as is natural, uneasy, and want something better. We may obtain what we presently wish. But I beg to be permitted to warn my friends against their delusive hopes. It will subvert the purposes of their rivals, and bring them prematurely into competition, and finally overwhelm both us and them in one irretrievable ruin.

Mr. TRIMBLE then delivered his sentiments in favor of the bill.

There was then some conversation on the propriety of reporting the bill for increasing the duties on imports forthwith, that it might be finally acted on, and, if it passed this House, that it might be before the Senate whilst the discussion was going on here on the bill now under consideration, for requiring cash payments on certain duties, and on the other bill before the same committee, for imposing a duty of ten per cent. on the amount of sales at auction. Nothing, however, was finally settled on this head.

WEDNESDAY, April 26.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Philadelphia, praying that, for the present, real estate may be exempted from taxation, and that an excise may be levied on domestic distilled spirits, both as a source of revenue to the nation, and as a protection to public morality; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of Richard Smyth," reported the same, without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act entitled "An act making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements," passed the 3d of March, 1819, reported that it would be inexpedient to repeal the said act. Laid on the table.

Mr. McCoy, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of John H. Piatt," reported the same, without amendment; and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Joshua Newsom, Peter Crook, and James Rabb; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. MACLAY, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Leiper," reported the same, without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SILSBEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act authorizing the building of a certain number of small vessels of war," reported the same, with an amendment; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of an additional naval force."

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act to provide for building an addition to the custom-house now erecting in the city of New Orleans, for the use of the district court of the United States for the State of Louisiana," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act confirming the proceedings of the inhabitants of the village of Cahokia, in the State of Illinois, in laying out a town on the commons of said village," reported the same, without amendment; and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

OHIO AND MICHIGAN BOUNDARY.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Land Committee, reported, without amendment, the joint resolution, referred to them, for establishing the boundary line between the State of Ohio and the Territory of Michigan. The question being stated on ordering the resolve to be engrossed—

Mr. BRUSH moved to lay the resolve on the table, desiring time to examine it, not having been, from accident, present when the resolve was first moved.

This motion gave rise to a short debate, in which it was opposed by Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. WOODBRIDGE, and Mr. SLOAN, on the ground of the lateness of the session, and the improbability that, if laid on the table, it would be again taken up at the present session. It was supported by Mr. ROSS and Mr. BRUSH, on the ground that the line proposed by the resolve was not the proper line, but would be injurious to the interests of the State of Ohio, without being at all beneficial to Michigan. It was important, it was admitted, that the line should now be established; but it was equally important, that, when it is established, it should be the proper line.

The resolve was ordered to lie on the table, by a vote of 60 to 44.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

The House then again resumed the consideration of the bill regulating the mode of collecting the duties on imports, &c. Mr. SILSBEE's motion to strike out the first section of the bill being yet under consideration.

Mr. ALEXANDER said, he hoped he should claim the indulgence of the Committee for a short time, while he expressed the reasons that would influence his mind in the decision of the subject then before it. He was aware of the disadvantages under which he labored, and trusted that he might be pardoned in assuming to himself any part of the discussion on so important a question. His apology, however, in throwing himself upon the patience of the Committee would be found in the very brief remarks that he should submit to its consideration.

I cannot permit myself, said Mr. A., to remain satisfied that the present is merely "a bill to regulate the duties on imports," which would have justified my silence on the occasion, but that it is something more, as clearly appears from the latter part of its title, and it would more properly be entitled, "a bill for the encouragement of domestic manufactures," the avowed object of its advocates. Nor can I persuade myself, continued he, notwithstanding the ingenious and imposing manner in which the subject has been placed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BALDWIN,) who opened the debate, that the other great interests of the country have been associated and identified with it in principle, while all due regard has likewise been paid to the revenue of the Government, no less important. Here we find ourselves unfortunately at issue, and it becomes us calmly to deliberate and weigh well the effects, before we yield our assent to the truth of a position, which, to say the least of it, is extremely problematical. The gentleman who was first in the debate (Mr. B.) has openly denounced the present system of revenue, (derivable, by much the greatest part, from duties,) as unsound and inadequate for the purposes of Government; and he declares his readiness to adopt a more permanent one, operating directly as a tax upon the people. In this opinion, he fortifies himself under the Message of the President upon the opening of the session of Congress, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances. So far as these can add strength to his argument, (and no one, I am persuaded, is more disposed to give weight to their character than myself,) he is fully entitled to their benefit. But, if a negative can any wise grow out of an affirmative expression, I think it may be fairly-inferred in both cases.

In the one, the President informs us that "it is deemed of great importance to encourage domestic manufactures; but how far it may be practicable, paying due regard to the other great interests of the nation, is submitted to the wisdom of Congress." In the other, the Secretary observes: "It is believed that the present is a favorable moment for affording efficient protection to that increasing and important interest, (meaning manufactures,) if it can be done consistently with the general interest of the nation." Now, as far as my "wisdom" is concerned in the consideration, I am for affording them no further encouragement, "paying due regard to the other great interests of the nation;" nor do I think "it can be done consistently with the general interests of the nation." And as they use terms corresponding so precisely to express their opinions upon the subject, it is but fair to presume they must entertain corresponding ideas as to the effects of the system.

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury further remarks: "It is not probable that any modification of the existing tariff can supersede the necessity of resorting to internal taxation, if the expenditure is not diminished." This, I believe, has not been done in any case, saving the Yellow Stone expedition, and the little item that seems to have been considered as the paraphernalia of the Attorney General. "Should Congress," continues he, "deem it expedient to modify the present rate of duties, with a view to afford that protection to our cotton, woollen, and iron manufactures, which is necessary to secure to them the domestic market, the necessity of resorting to a system of internal taxation will be augmented."

Surely the President did not intend to recommend a measure that would result in a system of internal taxation, without recommending it likewise, who, upon its repeal, professed his readiness to propose its adoption again, whenever a proper occasion should occur. The opinion of the Secretary, then, may be regarded as opposed to the argument employed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BALDWIN,) to show that the revenue would suffer no diminution in consequence of a modification of the existing duties, so as to give additional aid to the domestic industry of the country.

But, said Mr. A., it has lately been discovered that the present mode of supplying a revenue for the Government, is unwise, impolitic, and was never a favorite, although it has existed ever since its commencement. If any thing were wanting to disprove an argument so entirely fallacious in itself, it is furnished by the very circumstance of the long duration of the system, which is the best evidence of its popularity, and least objectionable character. That system which can carry on the operations of Government with the least expense to the nation, while it promotes its industry, must be preferable to one where all its efforts are paralyzed, by being attended with excessive burdens.

The situation of Holland may be adduced in support of the fact, that, while the capital of the country has been employed in the profits of stock, instead of increasing the productive labor of the nation, she has suffered her trade to decay, and her manufactures to become annihilated, by a ruinous and oppressive taxation, even upon the necessities of life. The same cause may be traced to the Alcala in Spain, whose attention being more directed to the protection of her colonies, and the working of her mines, than to the improved condition of the wealth of her society, by a total neglect of agriculture, she presents at this time a poor, slavish, and degraded people, without commerce, without manufactures, without industry.

It will be perceived, then, said Mr. A., that I assume, as the basis of my argument, that the branch of industry which is capable of supporting the greatest quantity of capital, is most advantageous to the community, and consequently to the nation, and should remain unfettered, unrestrained, in exclusion of the claim of any other towards encouragement; or, in other words, that nations, like individuals, might be permitted to pursue their own interests in their own way. Leaving the channel of trade perfectly free and natural, there can remain but little doubt but that, like the fluid which gives health to the system, it will seek its proper level, and contribute to the mutual benefit of each branch; and wherever the wealth of individuals has been promoted, that of the society will be augmented in an equal degree. But depress it by force of causes, and it immediately becomes like the stagnation of blood in the body, and there is danger of an apoplexy.

Statesmen, Mr. A. said, were never more uselessly employed than in attempting to direct the avenues of trade, by producing an equal division of labor among them. These depend upon circumstances as variable and undefinable as the causes that operate upon the circulating medium of a country, which, since no human ingenuity, law, or punishment, has ever yet been able to regulate, so neither are they within the control of any power, without detriment to the public interest. But it has been said, that national pride should induce us to adopt a policy countervailing that of foreign Powers, by which we throw off a state of dependency altogether in favor of the citizen, to become subjected to a greater and more intolerable degree of servitude.

Sir, said Mr. A., I should be extremely sorry to see our pride so far get the better of our judgments, as to lead to a course ruinous to the best interests of the country; little else, in fact, I humbly conceive, than an act of political infanticide, and for the encouragement of manufactures, which, like false pride, always places true beauty in the back ground. That cases may arise where it becomes necessary to resort to retaliatory measures I shall not pretend to deny, but mean only to say, that this is not one of that character; and even then they should not be adopted without proper caution and deliberation, and where there was a probability of removing the evil complained of, because their efforts are felt in a greater or less degree at home.

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

Even England herself, whose policy is always made the fatal example of reasoning, (and, unless we depart somewhat from the track she has marked out, I fear we shall find ourselves at last in the same wretched condition of poverty and distress which she at present exhibits, groaning under a burden of excessive taxation, which is but oppression under the best of governments,) has not found it to her advantage to exclude entirely foreign articles, many of which she is capable of producing to a high degree of perfection. Although high duties are imposed, both by England and France, upon the respective manufactures of each, dictated, not so much from a spirit of national aggrandizement as national animosity, goaded on by the clamors and insatiable avarice of monopolizing merchants and manufacturers, yet, trade is still carried on between them, under the most odious and demoralizing of all traffics. And when we call the worst passions of men into action, it is reasonable to apprehend like consequences in our Government, whose basis rests on the moral character of its citizens. It may be said that the same effect will not be produced here, because they are not intended to be prohibitory. I shall, however, consider them presently in this point of view, and endeavor to show, unless they are so to a certain degree, no advantage can be derived from the increase, but it must operate entirely as a tax upon the consumption of the country. The wines of France are permitted to be imported into England, although it is well known that certain parts of her kingdom might be made favorable to the growth of the grape; and with equal propriety, under the idea of encouraging domestic industry, ought you to extend this benefit to the inhabitants of Vevay, or any other portion of our Southern country, whose soil and climate are peculiarly suited to the cultivation of the vine, because you have it in your power to supply the whole United States. China, (who treats the commerce of the rest of the world as beggarly, and where the laborer exalts his situation little less than that of the Mandarin himself, in claiming a portion of the soil as his own,) is not shut out from the markets of England with her rich fabrics, although many of them are successfully promoted within her own dominions. Yet, even these people, for the want of a more liberal foreign intercourse, present the most abject state of poverty, ignorance, and barbarism; and, in truth, it may be said, that the laborer here is not always "worthy of his hire."

The policy cannot be otherwise than founded in the best of all possible reasons: that there can be no justice in causing fifty or an hundred times as much capital and labor to be employed at home, in the production of an article, that would be required to purchase the same of foreign manufacture. There are advantages possessed by some countries in a greater degree than others; so much so, that it would be dangerous to come in competition with them, and folly in the extreme to prosecute a policy, where would be seen failure in the very attempt, and total annihilation in the end.

This brings me to consider the situation of our country with regard to England in such a contest, where she would occupy entirely the "vantage ground." I take it to be a correct principle for the interest of a nation, to augment as much as possible its rude products, and to exchange them for foreign commodities; and that which is good economy among private families, can hardly be bad among nations, to buy of others what we cannot make so cheaply ourselves. For, if a Government can increase the quantity of its annual exports, whatever is gained in the way of exchange is so much added to the capital of the society, and, of course, to its own wealth; and it is not correct to say, that, whatever is purchased abroad when it can be made at home, is one man's loss and another's gain; the difference of price in bringing the articles to market forming the difference in value, which may relatively be in favor of each.

Such is the very purpose for which society was established, and what would be the use of trade among individuals, were they to manufacture within themselves all that their wants might require? The mechanic of one description finds it to his advantage to buy of that of another, and thus, by the combined exertions of each, society becomes, as it were, a machine to carry on all the various operations of labor, too great for the power of any one individual to accomplish; and if nations were governed by the same selfish and contracted views, the trade and commerce of the world would soon be at an end, and all the advantages arising from them be entirely destroyed.

But it is as essential to the prosperity of a nation to encourage foreign trade, as it is for individuals the industry of each other, by a proper division of labor. Considering the rest of the world as a manufacturing people, it is more important to us that our capital should be employed in the channel through which it at present flows, in the improvement of agriculture, than that of any other. Nor do I conceive the argument of my honorable colleague, (Mr. TYLER,) to prove that we stood, in relation to the rest of the world, as a granary, which Egypt once was to Europe, and Sicily to Italy, at all shaken by that employed by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORAS,) to show that, if it were a granary, it was that sort of granary which permitted all our grain to remain upon our hands. For, let me ask the honorable gentleman, if we were cut off from the extensive market that is now opened for the reception of our produce, and confined to the limits of the United States, would we not be more properly a granary in the sense in which he used it? England, possessing advantages peculiar to herself in this respect, where her population is dense, and wages of labor are comparatively small, find it to her interest to manufacture for the greater part of the world; whereas, on the other hand, we, whose population is sparse, and price of labor is high, find that greater profits are derived from agriculture. Such is the fair and honest course of trade that should exist among nations, that, while one should be manufacturers, the other should become the growers of the raw material; and thus, the competition of the whole world being brought to a particular market for the rude products of the soil, a monopoly to a certain extent is obtained in the one case, while it is diminished in the other. The trade which is carried on in this way, consists in an exchange of the rude for the manufactured article, and the smaller the quantity of one which is required to purchase a greater quantity of the other, will be the proportionate value of the two. Whatever tends to diminish the value of the former, by high duties or prohibitions, operates injuriously in two ways: firstly, by enhancing the value of the foreign commodity, the price of the surplus produce of the land is diminished, and a monopoly is given to the home manufacturer and artificer, at the expense of the landed interest, by diverting a portion of its capital to another employment. And it would be an absurdity to say, the market of the world is open to you, when it must be manifest, unless you export something, you can bring nothing in return.

This, then, I take to be the case, said Mr. A., which is intended to be produced by the present measure; and, let me ask if it is just, if it is desirable, that the most valuable branch of industry should suffer, or be made to contribute to the protection of any other, than in the natural way? For one, I am prepared to say that it is not, generally speaking; and as agriculture was the first among the Greeks and Romans in their best days, who regarded all others as menial, from being unfavorable to the exercises of the Gymnasium and Campus Martius, so should it be the last to be forsaken by us. For, if such be not the effect of the system, I take it for granted the expected result will not take place. If the duty be not so high as to diminish the revenue of the country, the enhanced value of the foreign will only give an equal advance to the home manufacture; and, standing precisely in the same relation to each other, the superior quality of the former will give it a preference over the latter, and it can operate only as a tax upon the industry, without a corresponding benefit. I take the fact to be, said Mr. A., that the manufacturing interests of this country require a greater quantity of capital, in order to carry on their operations, than it is within their power to command.

It then follows, that all the capital of the nation is employed in the most natural and advantageous way in which it can be used. The deficiency can be supplied in only one of two ways—either by diverting a portion of it from one branch of trade to another, or suffering all the sources to remain uninterrupted and free, until they are filled, and then the surplus will turn itself to that employment which brings in the next greatest revenue, and will afford the proper encouragement to industry. I am disposed to adopt the latter expedient, because it is not forced, and no unnatural convulsions are likely to arise out of it to the commercial world, and to avoid the former as altogether in favor of the producer and against the consumer. And I must confess, that I do not understand this way of taxing the right hand to support the left. Let nature have her course, and she will work out her own safety. For, I lay it down as an incontrovertible position, said Mr. A., that the general industry of a society can never exceed the capital which it employs, and increases in proportion to the increase of its capital. Whenever this takes place, it immediately seeks and finds out new and different objects, to which it is directed, and adds to the productive labor of the country.

If the fixed capital of the existing manufactures be sufficient to sustain them, I contend that they require no further support, as they possess superior advantages over any foreign, and much greater than can be expected to be enjoyed by new ones coming in competition with them; and if it be intended to raise up new manufactures, not by the creation of new, but by the diversion of old capital, it must operate as a tax upon the consumption of the country, amounting to a prohibition of all foreign productions.

It is in vain for the friends of the system to say that such is not their design; when we reason from cause to effect, and view the interests, passions, and prejudices, that lead men to action, we cannot but distrust the consequences, and look to the ultimatum of which it is capable. Suppose, for a moment, that it should succeed, to the admiration of its advocates. Can it be expected to bring the manufactures of our country (which of all other trades requires the most extensive circulation) in competition with those of foreign Powers, where labor is cheap, and who are many centuries before us, or is it intended to confine their circulation to the home market? If the former be the intent, it cannot be executed; and the latter must equally fail, since, for all valuable purposes, the agricultural part of the community are a manufacturing class, and want only those richer and finer fabrics, which it is impossible for us, within any short time, if ever, to bring to any sort of perfection. And then will the American tar, the honest defender of "free trade and sailors' rights," become, like the Chinese boatman, without a hovel to breast him from the storms of the ocean, lying upon his oars, in the bed of his own waters.

But, sir, said Mr. A., there is a point of view in which this subject excites more than ordinary concern; and I tell you, and I tell the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Gross,) there is a state of dependency more intolerable, "more unprincipled," approaching very nearly to that colonial bondage which our fathers, in the majesty of their strength, resolved to put off. It is that interest which will be created in society as powerful and ungovernable as the waves of the sea, whose very scowl, we are told, like the rude tempest, carries terror to the heart, and holds a British Parliament in duress. And whenever that interest shall predominate, the little liberty that we now breathe becomes as the taper of life—"out, out, brief candle!" You tax them; they make the people pay it.

[Here Mr. A. read a passage from 1st vol., p. 182, of Smith's Wealth of Nations, to show its influence on Governments.]

I speak not of those, either here or elsewhere, who advocate the system, but of the system itself. I will pursue the subject no further; but, it is my last hope, never to see that interest reared up, a the expense of the rest, which is likely to rule the destinies of my country.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said, that the whole merits of the bill being presented by the motion under consideration, he would offer himself, for a short period, to the notice of the Committee. He had no design of abusing the patience he solicited, by going at large into the discussion of the question, which was one of the most extensive in the science of political economy. His purpose was limited to the narrow object of a brief exposition of some of the more considerable of those views of the question, and topics connected with it, which appeared to him to be the best entitled to claim attention, or the most calculated to attract it.

The first objection to the bill related to its apparent inefficacy in reference to its avowed object. The augmentation of the duties on imports which had been made when the subject had been last under the consideration of Congress, in 1816, amounted, Mr. A. believed, to an average of about twenty-five per cent. The additional augmentation contemplated by the present bill would amount, he had been informed—he had not himself made the estimate—to an average of not more than seven or eight per cent. Had the former augmentation produced, in any degree, the effect which was now designed of protection to domestic manufactures? No. We were told by the friends of the protecting system that our manufacturing establishments have gone to absolute ruin, under the protection which had been heretofore afforded them. If this representation were correct, could the increase of duties now proposed be considered sufficient for the retrieval from ruin, and efficient protection of, these establishments? If it could, the imposition which it created must be regarded as unreasonably high and oppressive, in relation to all classes of the community other than that which was intended to be protected. But if this increase could not be considered adequate to the effect which had been stated, then the imposition was nugatory to its alleged object. Take it either way, and this imposition would either be excessive, or else inadequate. In either character it was equally indefensible. Mr. A. was aware that an object larger than the alleged object of the bill, had been imputed to the framers and supporters of it. It had, he knew, been supposed, that their design extended to the inception of a system, which was to be rendered gradually progressive to positive prohibition on the admission of foreign manufactured articles, or to a rate of duties so high as to be tantamount to prohibition in its effects. It was alleged, in evidence of the entertainment and possible success of such a design, that the same topics of argument derived from the supposed advantage and propriety of the protective policy, which were employed in recommendation of the augmentation of duties now proposed, would be of equal, and greater, efficacy in the recommendation of further augmentations which might hereafter be demanded, from the force of the obvious connected consideration (which would not fail to be relied on) of the necessity of these further impositions to prevent the cost and effect of the former from being thrown away. Mr. A. was himself far from imputing any such view as had been stated; nor, if such a system of policy ever should be proposed, could he have any fear of its success, founded, as he conceived it to be, in an obvious principle of injustice and inequality, as respected its operation on the different interests of the community, and condemned, as it unquestionably was, by an uniform experience of fruits of mischief and suffering in every country in which an experiment had been made of it. Without connecting the bill under consideration with any odious policy of this sort, it stood sufficiently divested of title to support, by reference to the demerit of its real objects and proper operations.

While upon this topic, the objects of the bill, frankness required Mr. A. to state, that he did not consider it as directed to the attainment of any object of public policy at all. He considered it as one of the instances of that practice of appeal to public authority for the relief of private distress, the remarkable prevalence of which was the unhappy characteristic of the period in which we were called upon to deliberate. A general depression and distress affected all classes of the community, the result, as was conceived, of commercial over-action, and the operation of that system of paper currency, of which some species of necromancy must have dragged us into the adoption.

The manufacturing class was supposed to partake, in a peculiar degree, of this distress, and the present bill was a project for the relief of their private adversity, through the medium of a legislative intervention. Mr. A. considered himself justified in regarding the subject in this view, both from the inadequacy of the bill to any purpose of public policy, (which had already been adverted to,) and the nature of the representations employed in its support. What were these representations? Did they relate to any inherent disadvantage, or incapacity, affecting domestic fabrics, in maintaining competition with the imported for the domestic market? Not at all. The depression affecting domestic manufacturing establishments, which was made the foundation of the demand for relief, was referred to causes accidental entirely in their access, or temporary in their operation. Excessive importations of foreign manufactured articles, the unusual reduction of their price, and of that of the labor employed in preparing them; the undue extension of domestic business, disproportionate investments of capital in a fixed form, (buildings, machinery, &c.,) the effects of a general restoration of peace, and the operation of the paper system on markets and industry: these were the causes assigned as the sources of manufacturing distress, and the grounds of legislative interposition for its remedy. But did these grounds disclose any object of general permanent policy, requiring the adoption of the measure which was pressed for adoption? Mr. A. could not perceive that they did. He considered the present bill as belonging to the same class of character with the bankrupt bill. The distinction, indeed, was to the disadvantage of the present bill, in the comparison. A bankrupt act operated only a particular injustice. The sacrifice of interest which it involved affected only a peculiar class, (the creditors of bankrupts.) It might be considered too, as a contingent, and was not a continuing sacrifice. But the imposition which the present bill, if it passed, would create, would not only be a general burden on the community, for the benefit of a peculiar class of it, but would be a certain, and was designed to be a permanent, imposition.

The impairment of manufacturing capital, furnished no sufficient reason for the adoption of the bill. The preservation of manufacturing, could not be more important than of commercial capital. The fund which supplied consumption could not be considered of greater consequence than that which afforded the means of disposal for production. No person, however, would think of a measure of the character of that now proposed for the relief of commercial distress. If the commercial capital of the country were entirely annihilated, no factitious incitement or aid to the operation of capital, in this direction, would be thought of. And why? Because occasions for the employment of capital were known always to attract capital, or create it, in pretty nearly the exact proportion of the exigency of these occasions. An occasion so essential as the disposal of the productions of a country which were elsewhere in demand, could not fail of finding means for its discharge. Even could a state of circumstances be imagined, in which there was no subsisting accumulation of capital, and no description of public currency, yet credit, or an artificial substitute of some kind, would be found to supply their place, in ministering to the operations of commerce. The remark was not less inevitably true in relation to the occasions of a country for manufactures. No fear was to be entertained of any serious or lasting defect of the essential facilities for their supply. The capital for this purpose might not indeed be derived from domestic sources; but this circumstance did not present a consideration with which the community were in any material degree concerned. It was the certainty, not the source of supply, which formed the principal subject of their interest, and was entitled to claim the chief exercise of their solicitude.

We had come to realize, in our public conduct, the justice of an expression used in reference to another and more important subject of human interest. We confessed truth with our lips, but in practice we denied it. There was scarce any person, perhaps, who did not admit the abstract proposition, that capital, in the pursuit of the modes of employment most productive of profits to its proprietors, fell, unassisted, into those which were calculated to produce the most beneficial results to the community. This was one of the principles the least liable to controversy or qualification, which were presented by the theory of a just political economy. Yet, it was in the direct contravention and overthrow of this indisputable principle, that the foundations of the policy, which was at present recommended to us, were laid.

The reason, too, which explained this principle, it was material to understand, both on account of its own illustration, and the importance of the deductions to which it led in the discussion. The reason was to be found in the tendency of capital, uninfluenced by public authority, to be determined, as respected the modes of its employment, by demand, which furnished the standard at the same time of the utility of its employment. The expenditure of capital was directed by obvious considerations (relative to the interest of its proprietors) to subjects of the greatest and most general request; and these were the subjects and the employments of labor and capital which procured them the employments which had, in a general view, the strongest presumptions of utility in their favor. Demand was the index of the beneficial, as it was of the unbiassed, direction of capital.

The inference from this proposition was of singular importance. It was, that no direction of capital, relatively useful, could require adventitious encouragement. Why? Because this character of utility was the infallible source of adequate demand for the productions of capital employed in this direction, and adequate demand for the productions of any employment, dispensed from the necessity of its adventitious encouragement. The converse of the last proposition was equally true, that no employment, requiring factitious encouragement could be relatively useful. Why? Because this occasion for encouragement demonstrated a defect of adequate demand for its productions; and the defect of adequate demand for its productions was evidence of its want of relative utility. The force of these conclusions, in their application to domestic manufacturing establishments, was in no degree obviated by the suggestion, that the existence of adequate demand for their productions was prevented by the interchange of foreign competition; because this suggestion only proved that, although in a different condition of circumstances, in which a deficiency in the supply of foreign manufactured articles was experienced, the establishments in question would be useful; yet, under existing circumstances, in which no such deficiency was experienced, they could assert no pretension to this character of utility.

The proposition which had been stated, of the voluntary tendency of capital in a course of unbiassed distribution, to conform to the order of employment which public utility would prescribe, was, in its general acceptance, perhaps the most familiar trash in the science of political economy. We were told, in every book of elements on the subject, that the natural and most advantageous course of the distribution of capital was, in a progressive succession, from agriculture to internal trade, and thence to a foreign trade of exportation; to manufactures, or to indirect foreign trade, as peculiar circumstances might determine. Could any adequate reason be assigned for the contravention, with a view to the peculiar encouragement of manufactures, of the general laws of the distribution of capital? The ground of such a proceeding was to be found, not in sound policy, but prepossession.

It was an evident proposition, that an employment which required factitious encouragement must, in a pecuniary view, be a losing one. If, therefore, encouragement was due to domestic manufactures, it could not be in an economical view, but from their supposed subserviency to some collateral object, regarded as important—as national independence, for example. The question, in this aspect, would present itself for examination in a succeeding part of the discussion.

The freedom which had been used, in speaking of the reasonings in opposition to the bill, authorized Mr. A. in indulging the frankness of saying, that the argument employed in its support appeared to him to be founded in a series of fallacies. It was irrelevant, as respected several of the principal propositions sought to be established. It was misconceived, as respected the time and circumstances to which it was applied. It was erroneous, as respected the topics of reasoning it employed. A person would be led to suppose, from the course of observation adopted on the other side, that the question related to the importance and necessity of adequate supplies of manufactured articles, or to the abstract advantage attending the possession of domestic establishments for the attainment of these supplies. But these were propositions not liable to controversy. The question related not to the necessity or value of supplies of manufactured articles, but to the relative advantages of different methods of procuring them—to the choice to be exerted between obtaining them at a cheaper rate from foreign, or at a higher price from domestic sources. Neither did the controversy refer to any abstract superiority of domestic over foreign sources of supply, but to the mode and time of their establishment—to the choice between an artificial introduction of domestic establishments at an earlier period, attended with the charge of a burdensome system of protective duties for their support, and a natural spontaneous growth of these establishments, at a more advanced period, unattended with any system of regulation, or charge for their encouragement.

But there was no part of the argument employed in recommendation of the proposed system, which appeared so egregiously exposed to criticism, as that in which the favorable character of the present period for its introduction was asserted. The condition of general distress which characterized the existing period was admitted, and yet it was conceived to present a favorable occasion for the experiments of a policy involving an addition to the ordinary and necessary sources of expense, by which all classes of the community would be affected. The peculiar characteristic of the distress complained of, related to the depression in the price of whatever there was to sell. One strong circumstance of relief, however, had been found, in the corresponding depression in the price of the most material articles we had to buy. In such a condition of things, what was the policy recommended? An operation, by which the only circumstance of relief which the situation of the country presented, was to be cut off—by which the prices of all the most essential articles of purchase would be enhanced, whilst those of our vendible commodities (to state the case in the most favorable view) were to remain unaltered. Beneath the picture of a policy of this sort, it could not be necessary to write the name. Mr. A. had been describing the operation of the bill, as tending to a mere purpose of private relief. But this description did not express the full character of its demerit. It was a bill against public relief.

The principal advantages anticipated from the success of the proposed system were referable to two general heads, the establishment of domestic sources of supply of manufactured articles, and the establishment or extension of a domestic market for the surplus of agricultural productions. The first of these advantages was, in the peculiar circumstances of our situation, rather nominal than real; or, in the most favorable statement of the case, far less important than had been represented. The point in which the public were interested in this respect, related principally to the character, not the source, of the supply of manufactured articles. Their interest required that this supply should be good, cheap, abundant, regular. But the supply from domestic would not be of better quality than from foreign sources. It would not be of cheaper, but, on the contrary, of dearer price, by the amount of the difference which would be created by the proposed increase of duties. It would not be more abundant or regular. In both these respects the supply from foreign sources, except in the contingency of a disturbed state of the foreign relations of the country, could be the subject of no complaint. The only real advantage, then, attending the possession of domestic establishments for the supply of manufactured articles, related to periods of war, which might be expected very rarely to occur. By the policy recommended, we were to be subjected to a constant, permanent monopoly-price of the most essential articles of consumption, for the purpose of being guarded against a price somewhat higher, in a contingent, remote, unfrequent event. A considerable enhancement of price was, in this respect, the sum of the evil which could be involved in the event of war; for the supply of no essential article was liable, in such a contingency, to be absolutely cut off. Nor was the evil consequence to be apprehended from war, liable to be incurred in any other than the single instance of a war with Great Britain. The concurring interests of the supplying countries, and the superiority of our public and commercial marine, would be a safeguard against the material obstruction of supply, from the effect of war with any other Power. The feeling of resentment prevailing against Great Britain, the result of the persevering and malignant character of her hostility, was strong and general in this country, but this feeling was not, it was to be hoped, of a nature to be susceptible of misdirection, to an unrequited and essential sacrifice of public interests. The abundance of the materials of manufacture, and the facility of conversion to a manufactured form, which the most important of them admitted, would preclude, even in a war with Great Britain, injury from the obstruction or enhanced price of supply, in any degree commensurate with the cost of the means, which were recommended as security against the chances of it. More injury, in disturbing the regularity of supply, was to be apprehended from the effect of the proposed policy, in impairing the regularity of our demand for that supply.

Arguments were rendered palpable by example. There were few articles of more essential necessity than salt. From this characteristic of it, and our habit of reliance on external sources for supply, there was, perhaps, no article liable, in a higher degree, to enhancement in price in time of war. But salt was susceptible of supply from domestic sources, to an indefinite amount. Would any man be found to recommend the protection of domestic establishments for the preparation of salt, by such a system of duties as would insure their operation in time of peace? Yet the supply of no article was more important. Why should the policy sur-rendered in relation to this article, be proper in relation to others? If the material, in the instance of any other article, were of indigenous growth, the same reliance might be had on the resource of domestic fabrication in time of war, with which we were content in case of salt. Or, if the material were not indigenous, then the supply of it would not be less liable to obstruction, in a season of war, than that of the wrought article. In either event, the resort to high protective duties for the encouragement or preservation of the domestic manufacture, appeared to be equally unadvisable. The argument derived from the different preparations of machinery or skill, required in different departments of manufacture, was not of sufficient force to obviate or impair the correctness of the conclusion.

The principal reliance, however, of the argument in favor of the protective system, rested on its tendency to the formation of a domestic market for agricultural productions. The great and enlarging amount of our agricultural labor and productions, might be expected in the lapse of a short period. It was said, to render these productions redundant, in relation to their present markets, and an obvious policy, therefore, required the immediate substitution, through the medium of manufacturing establishments, of a domestic market; which, by its progressive extension, might have the effect of obviating, or providing a remedy for, such a condition of affairs. The answer to this representation was attended with no difficulty. It was, that the remedy sought to be provided, in the mode proposed, would be found available without any occasion for legislative regulation, by the necessary ultimate operation of the very circumstances which were thought to call for this regulation.

The population of the country being progressive with its means of subsistence, would continue to observe the proportion which it now did, to production. Production, therefore, could be expected to exhibit, relatively to domestic demand, no greater redundancy than it did at present. The redundancy anticipated, must refer to foreign demand entirely.

But the labor and capital which it would be the effect of this supposed redundant state of agricultural productions to disengage from agricultural employment, must find some other mode of occupation. They could not remain unemployed; and in what direction could employment be found for them? Not in commerce, for the capacity of commerce to furnish occupation to labor and capital was determinable by the operation of foreign demand for their productions, and this demand, under the circumstances supposed, must be excluded. There was left but one resort for the employment of this disengaged labor and capital, and that was in manufactures. Not only without aid or direction, but by an impulse which could not be controlled, they must flow to fulfil this destination. The manufactures thus established, (it was to be further observed,) from the contiguity and abundance of materials, and the depressed price of these materials, which the hypothesis supposed, must of necessity be enabled to maintain, unassisted by positive encouragement, a successful competition with fabrics of foreign origin. Here, then, was the effect desired, realized, independently of any occasion for regulation. The object proposed was, through the medium of a complicated and burdensome system of duties, to provide a remedy for an anticipated contingency, and this contingency was found, upon inquiry, to introduce in its occurrence, the very remedy proposed, without necessity for any duty whatever. This effect was in consistency with the order of nature, in which evils, whether of physical or social character, resulting from her unforced operations, were invariably found to generate their proper remedies. It was the eternal effort of politicians to supersede this salutary order, which formed the source of half the mischiefs by which mankind were afflicted.

The attempt had been made to show, that the artificial introduction of a domestic market, through the medium of manufactures, was superfluous, as this market would, at the proper season, be introduced, without exertion or expense, by a spontaneous operation. But suppose the contrary to be the fact, still the advantage of the proposed policy was, to say the least of it, equivocal. There was no accession contemplated as the result of this policy, to the amount of capital or labor. The effect contemplated in this respect, was confined to a mere change of destination, as related to a portion of this amount. Nor was the diversion expected to be made to a more productive, but only (as was supposed,) to a more convenient, employment. This, however, was the slightest form of the objection. If it appertained to the scheme of our foreign policy to prosecute commercial intercourse at all with other nations, our account must be laid in the calculation of a general equality in the respective amounts of our foreign sales and purchases.

We had been accustomed to hear a great deal said on the subject of the importance of the preservation of a favorable, or at least of a just, balance of foreign trade. There was no topic connected with the knowledge of national economy so little perplexed and difficult in its nature, which appeared to be so inadequately understood as this.

of the degree of interference which was required, by good policy, to be exerted in adjusting the results of foreign commerce. The truth was, that the balance of trade, foreign or domestic, not only required no exertion of care for its preservation, but was not the subject of possible permanent derangement. Any temporary inclination which might be occasionally communicated to this balance, was liable to immediate and inevitable self-correction. The continuance, for any considerable period, of an unequal state of the foreign balance, (if such a condition of things were of possible continuance,) would operate as a mischief, instead of a benefit, to the nation in whose favor it prevailed, inasmuch as the ability of the countries against whom the balance was found, to discharge the debts created by their purchases, must, in such circumstances, become exhausted.

The supposed advantageous balance would be speedily ascertained to constitute a source of loss, and would inevitably derive its corrections not from the party to whose injury it promised to redound, but the party to whom it had been apparently fraught with advantage in the outset. A general unfavorable balance of trade could have a permanent existence against no other country than one placed in the condition of a colony; and the reason of its possible existence in the case of a colony was, that in this situation, the gain and loss of the operation were equalized and invalidated by the circumstance of their falling both on the same party, namely, the country which was the proprietor of the colony. So that this case of exception (as was the fact universally of exceptions to just rules,) tended not to the impeachment, but confirmation of the principle relied on. Although, however, the preservation of an enduring favorable balance of foreign trade was neither practicable nor desirable, there was nothing more easily practicable than the reduction, to any extent, of the amount of foreign commerce, or its total annihilation, as respected particular countries, provided regulations fraught with this result could be found susceptible of effectual execution. The first of these effects it was the tendency of the proposed policy to produce, nor did there appear any circumstance to forbid its being attended with the last of them. The reduction of demand for foreign fabrics, which it would be the effect of the introduction of domestic sources of supply to produce, must be attended with a correspondent diminution in the foreign demand for our productions, from the operation of the considerations which had been adverted to. So that, whatever might be the amount of the advantage expected to be realized from the operation of the contemplated system, in the establishment or extension of a domestic market, an equal amount of advantage must be estimated to be lost in the reduction of the extent of foreign markets consequent on the operation of the system.

Let the susceptibilities of development, attributable to our resources of production, be rated at what they might, the foreign market could not be retained in the same extent at the same time with the proposed establishment or extension of a domestic market, because the essential characteristic of the source of introduction or extension of the domestic market, was its effect to produce a proportionate impairment of the demand for foreign articles, the unreduced operation of which demand formed the condition of an unreduced extension of the foreign market. The sole advantage would consist in the introduction of a partial change as respected its location. In a consideration of acquisition, the relative amounts of gain and loss would be balanced. But an extension of the same view of the subject would materially vary this conclusion. When once we had embarked in this policy of driving the countries with which we enjoyed relations of commercial intercourse, by reduction of our demand for their exports, to a system of dependence on other sources than ourselves, for the supply of their occasions of importation, what was the security that it would not be eventually extended beyond the amount rendered necessary by our withdrawal of demand, so as to comprehend the whole mass of their occasions of importation?

A resort, in particular, to the cultivation of domestic resources of supply, was almost invariably found to present irresistible temptations to its extension. Resentment, produced by the pursuit of a supposed illiberal policy on the part of a former customer, was a motive of obvious occurrence in co-operation with inducements of this description. The result, then, of the policy recommended to us in relation to the introduction of a domestic market, through the medium of the encouragement of manufactures, besides involving the certainty of a loss in the extent of the foreign market, equivalent to the acquisition of domestic market, led to an exposure to the loss of a much larger proportion, or the whole, of the foreign market. In the best result of the policy, there could be no gain in the extent of market. In a different result, a great deal, of every thing, in this respect, might be lost. A course of policy of this character could set up no pretensions to the award of an impartial judgment in its favor.

Let, then, a fair account be stated of the relative amount of advantage or disadvantage to be anticipated from the proposed system, and how would the balance stand? In reference to the supposed importance of the introduction of domestic sources of supply of manufactured articles, the whole advantage had been shown to be contingent on a particular, and not probable or frequent event. In reference to the supposed importance of the introduction or extension of a domestic market, through the medium of manufacturing establishments, the advantage had been shown, in the most favorable view of it to be equivocal.

What were the items of offset to be stated? A considerable and permanent imposition on many of the articles of most essential consumption, in the amount of the proposed increase of duties; subduction from agricultural production to the amount of the accession to manufactures; deduction from the foreign, equivalent to the acquisition of domestic market; exposure to the hazard of greater and indefinite deduction from the extent of the same market; and, finally, the amount of the direct or other taxation, which would be rendered necessary, by the deficit in the revenue, which it would be the effect (as was admitted) of the adoption of the proposed system to occasion. How striking was the disproportion of objection to the system which this statement exhibited! Nor did this statement exhibit the whole objections.

It was to be observed further, that all the items of charge which the statement presented, were exclusive charges upon the agricultural, that is to say, upon the predominating interest of the community. The justice of the position would not be denied in relation to any other than the last of these charges—the addition which would be required to taxation; nor was it less incontrovertible in relation to this one. That no part of this addition could be derived from excise on the manufactures designed to be protected, was obvious, from the consideration that the effect of such an imposition would be to countervail, in the proportion of its amount, the operation of the protection. A resort to it, therefore, contemporaneously with the retention of the protecting duties, would be manifestly an exercise of preposterous legislation. Taxes of excise were not to be anticipated either from the genius of our legislation, which was entirely averse to them, nor, if resorted to, from the mode and place of imposition, which the same consideration would prescribe, could they fall elsewhere than on the class of consumers of the articles which were made the subjects of them. The taxation in question, therefore, would be found in no degree to affect the manufacturing interests of the country, but would operate as an exclusive burden on its other interests, for the benefit of this peculiar one. The most influential recommendation of a resort to protective duties, in any instance, had been invariably found, in its alleged tendency, to an ultimate reduction in the price of the articles in whose favor it was proposed. No indemnification of this kind, however, could be anticipated in the circumstances now under consideration. Reduction of price had but one source—augmentation in the proportion of the supply of its subject to the demand for it. In the case of the articles for which protection was proposed, the total amount of supply could experience no increase, but, on the contrary, must sustain diminution, if left to exclusive dependence and domestic resources. And in the fall, or in a greater proportion than the augmentation from domestic, the supply from foreign sources must be reduced. On this part of the subject, there was the argument of a fact which was conclusive. There were various articles comprehended in one subsisting tariff, on which, at a very early period in the history of our Government, duties so heavy had been charged as to have the effect of prohibition on their importation, as respected any purpose of a general supply. The articles alluded to were those which constituted the first class in the distribution of the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Dallas, in his report upon the subject laid before Congress in the year 1816, when the subsisting tariff had been under consideration. Had these articles (manufactures of which the principal material was leather or wood, for example,) undergone reduction of price at any time posterior to the imposition of the extraordinary duties for their protection? On the contrary, had they not maintained the disproportionately high price which they derived from the imposition of those duties, in a state continually progressive with their operation? These were articles, too, in relation to which it was to be observed that the materials were neither attended with any uncommon difficulty in the procurement, nor the preparatory acquisitions of skill, or implements, required for their manufacture, of any considerable importance. The argument of a fact like this, admitting no dispute, had no occasion for reinforcement, and left no room for the continuance of controversy.

There was a peculiar consideration affecting the condition of the larger portion of foreign manufactures, which rendered the error of attempting to substitute the supply of them from domestic sources, susceptible of being placed in a striking point of view. This consideration related to the necessary advantage which these manufactures enjoyed in comparison with the domestic, as respected the important characteristic of cheapness. The principal element in the price of any article was derived from the value of the labor employed in producing it. The principal circumstance determining the value of labor, was the value of the subsistence required for its support. The last value was determined, in its turn, by a consideration not merely of the kind and style of subsistence to which the classes employed in labor were accustomed.

But in these respects the operation of artificial social arrangements, and of their own disproportionate multiplication, in reference to the regular occasions of employment, had sunk the condition of the laboring classes, in the countries with which we enjoyed the largest share of commercial intercourse, to a very low point of depression. From the causes stated, and perhaps some others, their modes of subsistence, as respected both the quantity and description of its supply, had become, to the last degree, penurious. The amount of their pecuniary compensation had been of course proportionately affected. A laborer in those countries was in the practice of receiving scarcely a greater number of pence than one engaged in a similar mode of occupation in ours required shillings, in remuneration of his labor. The necessary result of the operation of these circumstances had been the depression of the real value, as well as pecuniary price, of the productions of labor in such countries, below the just standard of the value and price of productions of the same denomination and quality in our country. Here was a peculiarity, creating a source of recommendation of foreign manufactures, of which sound policy would teach us rather to endeavor to avail ourselves of the advantage, than obstinately to contend against it. A further source of similar advantage was found in the peculiar character and latitude of the commercial regulations, entirely inconsistent with the genius of our institutions, of which the forms of government and polity prevailing in other countries, admitted the adoption and enforcement; regulations, of which the policy was to keep down the price of the raw material of manufacture, (like that by which the price of wool was reduced fifty per cent. in Great Britain,) or of which the design was to force an extraordinary production of the raw material, like many of the regulations of France, were exemplifications of the remark. If the question related to the propriety of availing ourselves of the physical advantages of other countries in giving direction to our commercial policy, instead of engaging in an injurious competition with these advantages, there would be no diversity of opinion as to the course to be pursued. It could not be made a question, for example, whether there would be policy in availing ourselves of, or in contending with, the advantages of France for the growth of wines and olives (supposing that our soil and climate admitted of being forced to the growth of such products,) or of the West Indies, for the supply of tropical productions. What greater reason could there be for refusing to avail ourselves of the benefit of political or social peculiarities, presented by the circumstances of other countries, or for insisting on contending with them? It might be affirmed without difficulty that no adequate reasons for such a policy could be assigned.

The East India trade had been supposed to furnish conclusions opposed to those which had been stated. But, admitting the injurious character of this trade, it was indebted for this character to circumstances of peculiar operation in no degree affecting the general results of the reasoning which had been relied on. The India trade was injurious, because, from not taking our own immediate productions, it was in fact an indirect trade, and because it was unusually remote in its returns, and not in consequence of its supposed tendency to deprive us of specie, or because it was a losing trade, from creating an unfavorable balance.

The situation of this country, as respected its commercial relations, was peculiar, and extremely favorable. Our surplus resources of agricultural productions were extraordinary, and we enjoyed, in a large admission of our productions into foreign ports, the most advantageous facilities for the development of these resources. Were we possessed of any indefeasible security for the preservation of this advantageous situation from the peculiar character of our productions, rendering them the subjects of indispensable supply to foreign nations? This was so far from being the fact, that there was perhaps scarcely one of our products of exportation which the countries we were accustomed to furnish did not enjoy capacities of producing for themselves, to the full extent of their respective occasions of consumption. For the liberal opportunities allowed us of supplying them, we were indebted principally to a circumstance foreign altogether to any peculiar character, or indispensable occasion for the supply of our productions, namely, habits of commercial intercourse, generated from the original colonial relation of all American settlements to European countries. No eventual disavowance of connexion having been apprehended, the industry of the nations of Europe had taken its directions from a policy of precaution against interference with the productions of the colonies. It was the continuance of these directions of industry in European countries, produced chiefly by the characteristic reluctance of industry to change, as respected the modes of its employment, which formed the tenure by which we held our singular advantages in the commercial intercourse with Europe. This tenure was readily liable to rupture, and the tendency of the policy at present recommended to us was calculated to try its strength. And what was the character of the consideration for which the experiment of this perilous policy was required to be hazarded? The unattainable object of placing ourselves in a situation in which we should be enabled to supply our products to foreign nations, without proportionate purchases of their productions in return. Had an instance ever occurred in which advantages so considerable had been put to hazard on an issue so extravagant?

There was a single consideration which merited to be regarded as conclusive against the policy of contributing the proposed encouragement to manufactures, and that was derived from the fact of their inability to maintain themselves, independently of artificial support, in the neighborhood of the most abundant supply of their most essential materials. If they required further advantage in the competition with foreign fabrics, than was supplied by exemption from the multifarious expenses incident to the transport of the material, and re-transport of the wrought article between Europe and this country, the inference was irresistible against the claims which were set up, in their behalf, to extraordinary encouragement.

One of the most persuasive topics of argument employed in support of the system of encouragement, was derived from the alleged efficacy of this policy, in forwarding a condition of independence of other nations as respected all purposes of supply of essential commodity. This argument (as was the case of many others of influence in the world) derived its efficacy entirely from its vagueness. It had already been shown, that, if commercial intercourse were to be prosecuted at all with foreign nations, it could not be exempt from a condition of our receiving the productions of their soil or industry to an equal amount in value with those with which we supplied them. Absolute independence, therefore, of other nations, for purposes either of the vent of our productions, or of the supply of our wants, was an object unattainable, except by the annihilation of foreign commerce. There was no person, however, who designed a sacrifice of this extent, to the phantom which had been conjured up with the name of national independence. The peculiarities of physical and moral character and condition, which distinguished different countries and nations, bound them in an indissoluble chain of commercial intercourse, affording, at the same time, value to their various productions, and supply to their reciprocal wants, and exercise to their diversified capacities. Any considerable and designed obstruction of this intercourse would involve the grossest contravention of reason. Of the advantages of a contrary policy, the United States presented the most striking example in human history. It was to the singular freedom of circulation which had been permitted to the productions of their industry and soil, that their unparalleled prosperity was to be principally ascribed. How egregiously, then, did those persons appear to be misled who were disposed to convert to a Chinese stagnation the current of this liberal and beneficial policy. The fact was, however, that the policy in question was endowed with no tendency of the character of that imputed to it. Its real tendency was the reverse. An extended manufacturing system led directly to the most injurious condition of commercial dependence. The modes of the production of this effect were several. The most obvious was, the influence of the system in the abstraction of capital and labor from agricultural employment. A further medium of the same result was found in the influence of an extended manufacturing population, by the extraordinary demand it created for less essential articles of consumption, (meats, &c.,) to occasion an undue diversion of land from the production of corn, the principal element of subsistence, as well as many of the most important materials of manufactures. Capital, labor, and land, the sources of supply, were all diverted, in undue and injurious proportions, from the production of the most essential subjects of supply, by the operation of an extended system of manufacturing. Such a system was, therefore, in the highest degree, unfavorable to a condition of national independence, as respected occasions of importation. It was no less so as respected those of exportation. The natural advance of countries engaged in supplying others with agricultural productions, by the correspondent growth of population and domestic demand for these productions, which accompanied that advance, led to a progressive diminution in the amount of the supply for external purposes. The occasion and demand of these countries, too, for foreign products, must undergo reduction in proportion as the domestic was found available, and came to be relied on. Both the supply, then, of the subsistence and materials of industry, from such countries to the manufacturing countries depending on them, and their consumption of the manufactures of these last countries, must be liable to a declension perpetually progressive, as respected their amounts. The operation of this state of things on the manufacturing countries required no explanation. Let the occasional influence of unfavorable seasons on political vicissitudes, in affecting the regularity of commercial supply and demand, be regarded, in addition, and the true character of the policy under discussion, in the relation in which it was now examined, would be presented in a just point of view. The effects of this policy were not, indeed, susceptible of complete realization, as respected a country of the immense and almost boundless extent and capacity of production of the United States. The developement of its operation would, however, be complete as respected the different sections of the country, considered in their relations to each other. The sections in which the manufacturing system should come to prevail extensively, (the northern, &c.,) must be subjected to a dependence, such as had been described, on the quarter which would remain exclusively engaged in agriculture, (the southern section.) If the parts were destined to a disseverance of their present political confederacy, the disadvantage of such a state of things as had been described, to the northern section, would be aggravated beyond its effect in the case of an ordinary foreign nation, by the influence of inevitable political jealousies, and the feelings generated by the rivalry of neighborhood. If the confederacy were to continue, on the other hand, a predominating influence would be acquired to the southern section in the General Council and Administration. Such an inclination of the balance of influence would, (in the opinion of Mr. ARCHER,) be attended with far less hazard, of an abusive or injurious employment of the power it would convey, than an inclination in the contrary direction. Inclination in any direction, however, produced by artificial means, was no subject for approbation.

But the objection of greatest force to an extended manufacturing system related to the character of the population it had a tendency to form. What kind of population was it? A population distorted and decrepid, as respects both bodily and mental endowments, equally marked by imbecility and abasement. How unlike our ancestors achieving the Revolution, or meriting the splendid eulogy which described them as pursuing the objects of commercial enterprise, with equal intrepidity, sagacity, and perseverance, under every variety of difficulty and climate, beneath the equinoctial heats, or amid the tumbling mountains of ice, under the frozen serpent of the pole! In large manufacturing establishments, the worst evils, physical and moral, found their source or refuge. It was in such nurseries that pestilence was most accustomed to take its birth and collect its venom. It was in these armories that death best delighted to forge his arrows, and made the first and most effectual essay of their virtue. The moral evils derived from the same sources were of a character no less conspicuous. It was not less true of moral than it was of material subjects, that, when collected and kept in groups and masses, they were prone to undergo a fermentive process, and to assume a putrefactive condition. Among civilized nations, accordingly, the heated and surcharged atmosphere of extensive manufacturing establishments was found to present the situation most unfavorable to moral sanity.

It was in a political view, however, that the evil of an extended manufacturing population was the most striking. This portion of population was not to be excluded from political rights. And what was their qualification likely to prove for the exercise of such rights? In the most favorable general estimate, depending for the means of occupation and subsistence on the class of employers, they were to be regarded as liable to become the mere instruments of that class, in the discharge of political functions. This was no ordinary evil. But, let occasions of severe general distress, or political excitement, be taken into view, and in what light was this population then to be regarded? As an element of civil distemper, distributed through the State, liable, with the slightest incitement from accident or mismanagement, to be awakened into paroxysm. Nor were the disorders to which this description of population was prone by any means the most injurious of the evils attendant on it. A far worse characteristic was its tendency, through the medium of this liability to disorder, to give occasion to an arbitrary administration of Government, and, finally, to injurious modifications of the form of it. By the frequent recurrence of civil disorders, or manifestation of disposition to them, Government became supplied with incitements and opportunity for the exercise and permanent assumption of dangerous powers, and their subjects with inducements for submission to them, as a refuge against more intolerable calamities. These views were neither visionary nor questionable. They derived abundant confirmation from the suggestions both of reason and experience. Other nations, indeed, had not always had it in their power to avoid the admission of a manufacturing policy to a considerable extent. There were circumstances distinguishing the physical or political condition of some countries, and a stage in the progress of society, of which an extensive prevalence of the manufacturing system was to be considered the natural result or attendant. The peculiarity of the error of which we evinced a disposition to be guilty, would consist in the voluntary, artificial, and premature introduction of this system, which other nations had wanted, and we ourselves might eventually want, the power to escape from. With those, however, who entertained a different opinion as respected the value of the system, the objection to premature introduction ought to have an undiminished weight, as this mode of introduction could not fail to be attended with an impairment, both of its stability and advantages.

The true operation of this manufacturing policy was so clearly evinced, in the greater liability of the manufacturing classes to suffering in seasons of distress, that, if the question could be entirely disconnected from sympathy for subsisting or recent distress, the expectation was no unfair one, that the room for diversity of opinion would be materially diminished. In relation to this part of the subject, however, it was to be recollected, that the occasion furnished no proper scope for the indulgence of sympathy; and, in a juster view of the question, it could not be good policy to maintain, by the force of legislation, a system which it would not be good policy to originate.

On the view of the proposed policy which related to its probable operation on the revenue, (which, in its general results, was perhaps sufficiently obvious,) Mr. A. would only make the single remark, that when the interests of revenue and manufactures were both admitted to be suffering under severe depression, the policy must, to say the least of it, be questionable, which proposed the sacrifice of one, and that not the least important, of these interests, for the promotion of the other.

Upon the whole, Mr. A. regarded the bill as involving an imposition considerable in amount, and which was neither just in its principle nor equal in its operation. The beneficial results anticipated from its adoption he considered as illusory, and conceived, on the contrary, that its operation would be found fraught with no ordinary detriment to the most essential interests of the community. He could not but hope, therefore, that it would obtain the singular testimony to its merit which the chairman of the committee (Mr. BALDWIN) had spoken of as the most conclusive and unquestionable, viz: that of giving dissatisfaction to every part of the House. This praise it had already earned, as respected one quarter of the House; and it was attended by the hearty good wishes of Mr. A. for similar success in every other quarter. To the general principle of this measure, he could not express his objection more aptly than in the reason assigned by an ancient English patriot, when called to expiate his attachment to liberty on the scaffold, for resistance to an arbitrary Government. He said he had never been able to discover that "some men came into the world with saddles on their backs, and others booted and spurred to ride them." Neither could Mr. A. admit that parties came into the Federal Union in any such relative conditions. And he would take occasion to warn gentlemen who thought, by means of the present or any other injustice, to mount upon the backs of the Southern people, that they would find their seats neither pleasant, nor so entirely secure but that they might chance to encounter a fall, from the effects of which it might not be easy to recover.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the value of my opinions upon the interesting subject now before us, they have not been hastily formed. It may possibly be recollected by some gentlemen that I expressed them when the existing tariff was adopted; and that I then urged that the period of the termination of a war, during which the manufacturing industry of the country had received a powerful spring, was precisely that period when Government was alike impelled, by duty and interest, to protect it against the free admission of foreign fabrics, consequent upon a state of peace. I insisted, on that occasion, that a less measure of protection would prove more efficacious, at that time than one of greater extent at a future day. My wishes prevailed only in part; and we are now called upon to decide whether we will correct the error which, I think, we then committed.

In considering the subject, the first important inquiry that we should make is, whether it be desirable that such a portion of the capital and labor of the country should be employed, in the business of manufacturing, as would furnish a supply of our necessary wants? Since the first colonization of America, the principal direction of the labor and capital of the inhabitants has been to produce raw materials for the consumption or fabrication of foreign nations. We have always had, in great abundance, the means of subsistence, but we have derived chiefly from other countries our clothes and the instruments of defence. Except during those interruptions of commerce arising from a state of war, or from measures adopted for vindicating our commercial rights, we have experienced no very great inconvenience heretofore from this mode of supply. The limited amount of our surplus produce, resulting from the smallness of our numbers, and the long and arduous convulsions of Europe, secured us good markets for that surplus in her ports or those of her colonies. But those convulsions have now ceased, and our population has reached nearly ten millions. A new epoch has arisen, and it becomes us to deliberately contemplate our own actual condition, and the relations which are likely to exist between us and the other parts of the world. The actual state of our population, and the ratio of its progressive increase when compared with the ratio of the increase of the population of the countries which have hitherto consumed our raw produce, seem to me alone to demonstrate the necessity of diverting some portion of our industry from its accustomed employment. We duplicate our population in about the term of twenty-five years. If there be no change in the mode of exerting our industry, we shall duplicate, in the same term, the amount of our exportable produce. Europe, including such of her colonies as we have free access to, taken altogether, does not duplicate her population in a shorter term probably than one hundred years. The ratio of the increase of her capacity of consumption, therefore, is to that of our capacity of production as one is to four. And it is manifest, from this simple exhibition of the powers of the consuming countries, compared with those of the supplying country, that the former are inadequate to the latter. It is certainly true, that a portion of the mass of our raw produce, which we transmit to her, revert to us in a fabricated form, and that this return augments with our increasing population. This is, however, a very inconsiderable addition to her actual ability to afford a market for the produce of our industry.

I believe that we are already beginning to experience this want of capacity in Europe to consume our surplus produce. Take the great articles of cotton, tobacco, and breadstuffs. For the latter we have scarcely any foreign demand. And is there not reason to believe that we have reached, if we have not passed, the maximum of the foreign demand for the other two articles? Considerations connected with the cheapness of cotton, as a raw material, and the facility with which it can be fabricated, will probably make it be more and more used as a substitute for other materials: But after you allow to the demand for it the utmost extension of which it is susceptible, it is yet limited—limited by the number of persons who use it, their wants, and their ability to supply them. If we have not reached, therefore, the maximum of the foreign demand—as I believe we have—we must soon fully satisfy it. With respect to tobacco, that article afforded an enjoyment not necessary, as food and clothes are, to human existence, the foreign demand for it is still more precarious, and I apprehend that we have already passed the limits of it. It appears to me, then, that if we consult our interest merely, we ought to encourage home manufactures. But there were other motives recommending it, of not less importance.

The wants of man may be classed under three great heads—food, raiment, and defence. They are felt alike in the state of barbarity and in that of civilization. He must be defended against the ferocious beasts of prey in the one condition, and against the ambition, violence, and injustice, incident to the other. If he seeks to obtain a supply of those wants, without giving an equivalent, he is a beggar or a robber; if, by promising an equivalent which he cannot give, he is fraudulent; and if by a commerce, in which there is perfect freedom on his side, whilst he meets with nothing but restrictions on the other, he submits to an unjust and degrading inequality. What is true of individuals is equally so of nations. The country, then, which relies upon foreign nations for either of those great essentials, is not in fact, independent. Nor is it any compensation for our dependence upon other nations, that they also are dependent upon us, if it were true. Every nation should anxiously endeavor to establish its absolute independence, and, consequently, to feed and clothe and defend itself. If it rely upon a foreign supply, that may be cut off by the caprice of the nation making it, by war with it, or by war even with other nations. But it is not true that any other nations depend upon us in a degree any thing like equal to that of our dependence upon them, for the great necessities to which I have referred. Every other nation seeks to supply itself with them from its own resources; and so strong is the desire which they feel to accomplish this purpose, that they exclude the cheaper foreign article for the dearer home production. Witness the English policy in regard to corn. So selfish, in this respect, is the conduct of the other Powers, that, in some instances, they even prohibit the produce of the industry of their own colonies, when it comes into competition with the produce of the parent country. All other countries but our own exclude, by high duties, or absolute prohibitions, whatever they can, respectively, produce within themselves. The truth is, and it was in vain to disguise it, that we are a sort of independent colonies of England—politically free, commercially slaves. Gentlemen tell us the advantages of a free exchange of the produce of the world. But they tell us of what never has existed, does not exist, and perhaps never will exist. They invoke us to give perfect freedom on our side, whilst, in the ports of every other nation, we are met with a code of odious restrictions, shutting out entirely a great part of our produce, and letting in only so much as they cannot possibly do without. I will hereafter examine their favorite maxim, of leaving things to themselves, more particularly. At present I will only say, that I am, too, a friend to free trade, but it must be free trade of perfect reciprocity. If the governing consideration were cheapness; if national independence were to weigh nothing; if honor nothing; why not subsidize foreign Powers to defend us? Why not hire Swiss or Hessian armies to protect us? Why not get our arms of all kinds, as we do, in part, the blankets and clothing of our soldiers, from abroad? We should probably consult economy by these dangerous expedients.

But, say gentlemen, there are to the manufacturing system some inherent objections which should induce us to avoid its introduction into this country; and we are warned by the example of England, by her pauperism, by the vices of her population, her wars, &c. It would be a strange order of Providence, if it were true, that he should create necessary and indispensable wants, and yet should render us unable to supply them, without the degradation or contamination of our species.

Pauperism is, in the general, the effect of an overflowing population. Manufactures may, undoubtedly, produce a redundant population; but so may commerce, and so may agriculture. In this respect they are alike; and, from whatever cause the disproportion of a population to the subsisting faculty of a country may proceed, its effect of pauperism is the same. Many parts of Asia would exhibit, perhaps, as afflicting effects of an extreme prosecution of the agricultural system, as England can possibly furnish respecting the manufacturing. It was not, however, fair to argue from these extreme cases, against either the one system or the other. There are abuses incident to every branch of industry, to every profession. It would not be thought very just or wise to arraign the honorable professions of law and physic, because the one produces the pettifogger, and the other the quack. Even in England, it had been established by the diligent search of Colquhoun, from the most authentic evidence, the judicial records of the country, that the instances of crime were much more numerous in the agricultural, than in the manufacturing districts; thus proving that the cause of wretchedness and vice, in that country, was to be sought for, not in this or that system, so much as in the fact of the density of its population. France resembles this country more than England, in respect to the employments of her population; and we do not find that there is any thing in the condition of the manufacturing portion of it which ought to dissuade us from the introduction of it into our own country. But even France has not that great security against the abuses of the manufacturing system, against the effects of too great a density of population, which we possess in our waste lands. Whilst this resource exists we have nothing to apprehend. Do capitalists give too low wages; are the laborers too crowded, and in danger of starving? The unseated lands will draw off the redundancy, and leave the others better provided for. If an unsettled province, such as Texas, for example, could, by some convulsion of nature, be wafted along side of, and attached to, the island of Great Britain, the instantaneous effect would be, to draw off the redundant portion of its population, and to render more comfortable both the emigrants and those whom they would leave behind. I am aware that, whilst the public domain is an acknowledged security against the abuses of the manufacturing, or any other system, it constitutes, at the same time, an impediment, in the opinion of some, to the success of manufacturing industry, by its tendency to prevent the reduction of the wages of labor. Those who urge this objection have their eyes too much fixed on the ancient system of manufacturing, when manual labor was the principal instrument which it employed. During the last half century, since the inventions of Arkwright, and the long train of improvements which followed, the labor of machinery is principally used. I have understood, from sources of information which I believe to be accurate, that the combined force of all the machinery employed by Great Britain, in manufacturing, is equal to the labor of one hundred millions of able-bodied men. If we suppose the aggregate of the labor of all the individuals which she employs in that branch of industry to be equal to the united labor of two millions of able-bodied men, (and I should think it does not exceed it,) machine labor will stand to manual labor, in the proportion of one hundred to two. There cannot be a doubt that we have skill and enterprise enough to command the requisite amount of machine power.

There are, too, some checks to emigration from the settled parts of our country to the wastelands of the West. Distance is one, and it is every day becoming greater and greater. There exists, also, a natural repugnance (felt less, it is true, in the United States than elsewhere, but felt even here) to abandoning the place of our nativity. Women and children, who could not migrate, and who would be comparatively idle if manufactures did not exist, may be profitably employed in them. This is a very great benefit. I witnessed the advantage resulting from the employment of this description of our population, in a visit which I lately made to the Waltham manufactory, near Boston. There some hundreds of girls and boys were occupied in separate apartments. The greatest order, neatness, and apparent comfort, reigned throughout the whole establishment. The daughters of respectable farmers—in one instance I remember the daughter of a Senator in the State Legislature—were usefully occupied. They would come down to the manufactory, remain perhaps some months, and return, with their earnings, to assist them throughout the year. But one instance had occurred, I was informed by the intelligent manager, of doubtful conduct on the part of any of the females, and after she was dismissed, there was reason to believe that injustice had been done her. Suppose that establishment to be destroyed, what would become of all the persons who are thus engaged so beneficially to themselves, and so usefully to the State? Can it be doubted that, if the crowds of little boys and girls who infest this Capitol, and assail us every day, at its very doors, as we come in and go out, begging for a cent, were employed in some manufacturing establishment, it would be better for them and the city? Those who object to the manufacturing system, should recollect, that constant occupation is the best security for innocence and virtue, and that idleness is the parent of vice and crime. They should contemplate the laboring poor with employment, and ask themselves what would be their condition without it. If there are instances of hard taskmasters among the manufacturers, so there are in agriculture. The cause is to be sought for, not in the nature of this or that system, but in the nature of man. If there are particular species of unhealthy employment in manufacturing, so there are in agriculture also. There has been an idle attempt to ridicule the manufacturing system, and we have heard the expressions "spinning jenny tenure." It is one of the noblest inventions of human skill. It has diffused comforts among thousands who would have never enjoyed them but for it; and unborn millions will bless the man who invented it. Three inventions have distinguished the last half century, each of which, if it had happened at long intervals of time from the other, would have been sufficient to constitute an epoch in the progress of the useful arts. The first was that of Arkwright; and our own country was entitled to the merit of the other two. The world is indebted to Whitney for the one, and to Fulton for the other. Nothing is secure against the shafts of ridicule. What would be thought of a man who should speak of a cotton gin tenure, or a steam-boat tenure? In one respect there is a great difference in favor of manufactures, when compared with agriculture. It is the rapidity with which the whole manufacturing community avail themselves of an improvement. It is instantly communicated and put in operation. There is an avidity for improvement in the one system, an aversion from it in the other. The habits of generation after generation pass down the long tract of time, in perpetual succession, without the slightest change in agriculture. The ploughman who fastens his plough to the tails of his cattle, will not own that there is any other mode equal to his. An agricultural people will be in the neighborhood of other communities who have made the greatest progress in husbandry, without advancing in the slightest degree. Many parts of our country are one hundred years in advance of Sweden in the cultivation and improvement of the soil.

It is objected, that the effect of the encouragement of home manufactures, by the proposed tariff, will be, to diminish the revenue from the customs. The amount of the revenue from that source will depend upon the amount of importations, and the measure of these will be the value of the exports from this country. The quantity of the exportable produce will depend upon the foreign demand; and there can be no doubt that, under any distribution of the labor and capital of this country, from the greater allurements which agriculture presents than any other species of industry, there will be always a quantity of its produce sufficient to satisfy that demand. If there be a diminution in the ability of foreign nations to consume our raw produce, in the proportion of our diminished consumption of theirs, under the operation of this system, that will be compensated by the substitution of a home to a foreign market, in the same proportion. It is true, that we cannot remain in the relation of seller only to foreign Powers, for any length of time; but if, as I have no doubt, our agriculture will continue to supply, as far as it can profitably, to the extent of the limit of the foreign demand, we shall receive not only in return many of the articles on which the tariff operates, for our own consumption, but they may also form the objects of trade with South America and other Powers, and our comforts may be multiplied by the importation of other articles. Diminished consumption, in consequence of the augmentation of duties, does not necessarily imply diminished revenue. The increase of the duty may compensate the decrease in the consumption, and give you as large a revenue as you before derived.

Can any one doubt the impolicy of Government resting solely upon the precarious resource of such a revenue? It is constantly fluctuating. It tempts us, by its enormous amount, at one time, into extravagant expenditure; and we are then driven, by its sudden and unexpected depression, into the opposite extreme. We are seduced by its flattering promises into expenses which we might avoid; and we are afterwards constrained, by its treachery, to avoid expenses which we ought to make. It is a system under which there is a sort of perpetual war between the interest of the Government, and the interest of the people. Large importations fill the coffers of Government, and empty the pockets of the people. Small importations imply prudence on the part of the people, and leave the Treasury empty. In war the revenue disappears; in peace it is unsteady. On such a system the Government will not be able much longer exclusively to rely. We all anticipate that we shall have shortly to resort to some additional supply of revenue within ourselves. I was opposed to the total repeal of the internal revenue. I would have preserved certain parts of it at least, to be ready for emergencies, such as now exists. And I am, for one, ready to exclude foreign spirits altogether, and substitute to the revenue levied on them a tax upon the spirits made within the country. No other nation lets in so much of foreign spirits as we do. By the encouragement of home industry you will lay a basis of internal taxation, when it gets strong, that will be steady and uniform, yielding alike in peace and in war. We do not derive our ability from abroad to pay taxes. That depends upon our wealth and our industry; and it is the same, whatever may be the form of levying the public contributions.

But it is urged, that you tax other interests of the State to sustain manufacturers. The business of manufacturing, if encouraged, will be open to all. It is not for the sake of the particular individuals who may happen to be engaged in it that we propose to foster it, but it is for the general interest. We think that it is necessary to the comfort and well being of society, that fabrication, as well as the business of production and distribution, should be supported and taken care of. Now, if it be even true that the price of the home fabric will be somewhat higher, in the first instance, than the rival foreign article, that consideration ought not to prevent our extending reasonable protection to the home fabric. Present temporary inconvenience may be well submitted to, for the sake of future permanent benefit. If the experience of all other countries be not utterly fallacious; if the promises of the manufacturing system be not absolutely illusory, by the competition which will be elicited in consequence of your parental care, prices will be ultimately brought down to a level with the foreign commodity. Now, in a scheme of policy which is devised for a nation, we should not limit our views to its operation during a single year, or for even a short term of years. We should look at its operation for a considerable time, and in war as well as peace. Can there be a doubt, thus contemplating it, that we shall be compensated by the certainty and steadiness of the supply, in all seasons, and the ultimate reduction of the price, for any temporary sacrifices we make? Take the example of salt, which the ingenious gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) has adduced. He says during the war the price of that article rose to ten dollars per bushel, and he asks if you would lay a duty, permanent in its duration, of three dollars per bushel, to secure a supply in war. I answer no, I would not lay so high a duty. That which is now proposed, for the encouragement of the domestic production, is only five cents per bushel. In forty years the duty would amount only to two dollars. If the recurrence of war shall be only after intervals of forty years peace, (and we may expect it probably oftener,) and if, when it does come, the same price should again be given, there will be a clear saving of eight dollars, by promoting the domestic fabrication. All society is an affair of mutual concession. If we expect to derive the benefits which are incident to it, we must sustain our reasonable share of its burdens. The great interests which it is intended to guard and cherish, must be supported by their reciprocal action and reaction. The harmony of its parts is disturbed—the discipline which is necessary to its order is incomplete, when one of the three great and essential branches of its industry is abandoned and unprotected. If you want to find an example of order, of freedom from debt, of economy, of expenditure falling short of rather than exceeding income, you will go to a well regulated family of a farmer. You will go to the house of such a man as Isaac Shelby. You will not find him resorting to taverns, engaged in broils, prosecuting angry law suits. You will behold every member of his family clad with the produce of their own hands, and usefully employed—the spinning wheel and the loom in motion by day-break. With what pleasure will his wife carry you into her neat dairy, lead you into her store-house, and point to the table cloths, the sheets, the counterpanes, which lie on this shelf for her daughter Sally, or that for Nancy, all prepared in advance, by her provident care, for the day of their respective marriages. If you want to see an opposite example, go to the house of a man who makes nothing at home, whose family resorts to the store for every thing. You will find him, perhaps, in the tavern or the store at the cross roads. He is engaged, with the rum grog on the table, taking depositions to make out some case of usury or fraud; or perhaps he is furnishing to his lawyer the materials to prepare a long bill of injunction in some intricate case. The sheriff is hovering about his farm to serve some new writ. On court days (he never misses attending them) you will find him eagerly collecting his witnesses to defend himself against the merchants' and doctors' bills. Go to his house, and, after the short and giddy period that his wife and daughters have flirted about the country in their calico and muslin gowns, what a scene of discomfort and distress is presented you there! What the individual family of Isaac Shelby is, I wish to see the nation in the aggregate. But I fear we shall shortly have to contemplate its resemblance in the opposite picture. If statesmen would carefully observe the conduct of private individuals in the management of their own affairs, they would have much surer guides, in promoting the interest of the State, than the visionary speculations of theoretical writers.

The manufacturing system is not only injurious to agriculture, but, say its opponents, it is injurious also to foreign commerce. We ought not to conceal from ourselves our present actual position, in relation to the other Powers. During the long war which has so much convulsed Europe, and which will probably be succeeded by a long peace, we transacted the commercial business of other nations, and largely shared, with England, the carrying trade of the world. Now, every other nation is anxiously endeavoring to transact its own business, to rebuild its marine, and to foster its navigation. The consequence of the former state of things was, that our mercantile marine and our commercial employment were enormously disproportionate to the exchangeable domestic produce of our country. And the result of the latter will be, that, as the exchanges between this country and other nations will hereafter consist principally, on our part, of our domestic produce, that marine and that employment will be brought down to what is necessary to effect those exchanges. I regret exceedingly this reduction. I wish that the mercantile class could enjoy the same extensive commerce that they did formerly. But, if they cannot, it would be a folly to repine at what is irrecoverably lost, and we should rather seek to adapt ourselves to the new circumstances in which we find ourselves. If, as I think, we have reached the maximum of the foreign demand for our three great staples, cotton, tobacco, and flour, no man will contend that we should go on to produce more and more, to be sent to the glutted foreign market and consumed by devouring expenses, merely to give employment to our tonnage and our foreign commerce. It would be extremely unwise to accommodate our industry to produce, not what was wanted abroad, but cargoes for our unemployed ships. I would give to our foreign trade every legitimate encouragement, and extend it wherever it can be extended profitably. Hitherto it had been stimulated too highly, by the condition of the world, and our own policy acting on that condition. And we are reluctant to believe that we must submit to its necessary abridgment. The habits of trade; the tempting instances of enormous fortunes which had been made by the successful prosecution of it, were such that we turn with regret from the pursuit of it; we still cherish a lingering hope; we persuade ourselves that something will occur, how or what it may be we know not, to revive its former activity; and we would push into every untried channel, grope through the Dardanelles into the Black Sea, to restore its former profits. I repeat it, let us proclaim to the people of the United States the incontestable truth, that our foreign trade must be circumscribed by the altered state of the world; and, leaving it in possession of all the gains which it can now possibly make, let us present motives to the capital and labor of our country to employ themselves in fabrication at home. There was no danger that, by a withdrawal of that portion which is unprofitably employed on other objects, and an application of it to fabrication, our agriculture would be too much cramped. The produce of it would always come up to the foreign demand. Such were the superior allurements belonging to the cultivation of the soil to all other branches of industry, that it would always be preferred when it can be profitably followed. The foreign demand would, in any conceivable state of things, limit the amount of the exportable produce of agriculture. The amount of our exportations would form the measure of our importations, and, whatever these may be, they will constitute the basis of the revenue derivable from customs.

The manufacturing system is favorable to the maintenance of peace. Foreign commerce is the great source of foreign wars. The eagerness with which we contend for every branch of it; the temptations which it offers, operating alike upon us and on foreign competitors, produce constant collisions. No country on earth, by the extent of its superficies, the richness of its soil the variety of its climate, contains within its own limits more abundant facilities for supplying all our rational wants than ours does. It is not necessary or desirable, however, to cut off all intercourse with foreign Powers. But, after securing a supply, within ourselves, of all the great essentials of life, there will be ample scope still left for preserving such an intercourse. If we had no intercourse with foreign States, if we adopted the policy of China, we should have no external wars. And in proportion as we diminish our dependence upon them, shall we lessen the danger of the recurrence of war. Our late war would not have existed if the councils of the manufacturers in England had been listened to. They finally did prevail, in their steady and persevering effort to produce a repeal of the Orders in Council; but it was too late to prevent the war. Those who attribute to the manufacturing system the burdens and misfortunes of that country, commit a great error. These were probably a joint result of the operation of the whole of her systems, and a larger share of it was to be ascribed to her foreign commerce, and to the ambition of her rulers, than to any other cause. The war of our Revolution, in which that ambition displayed its monstrous arrogance and pretensions, laid the broad foundation of that enormous debt under which she now groans.

The tendency of reasonable encouragement to our home industry is favorable to the preservation and strength of our Confederacy. Now our connexion is merely political. For the sale of the surplus of the produce of our agricultural labor, all eyes are constantly upon the markets of Liverpool. There is scarcely any of that beneficial intercourse, the best basis of political connexion, which consists of the exchange of the produce of our labor. On our maritime frontier there had been too much stimulus, an unnatural activity; in the great interior of the country, there exists a perfect paralysis. Encourage fabrication at home, and there would instantly arise animation and a healthful circulation throughout all the parts of the Republic. The cheapness, and fertility, and quality, of our waste lands, offer such powerful inducements to cultivation, that our countrymen are constantly engaging in it. I would not check this disposition by hard terms in the sale of it. Let it be easily accessible to all who wish to acquire it. But I would countervail this predilection by presenting to capital and labor motives for employment in other branches of industry. Nothing is more uncertain than the pursuit of agriculture, when we mainly rely upon foreign markets for the sale of its surplus produce. In the first place, it is impossible to determine, a priori, the amount of this surplus; and, in the second, it is equally impossible to anticipate the extent of the foreign demand. Both the one and the other depend upon the seasons. From the fluctuations incident to these, and from other causes, it may happen that the supplying country will, for a long series of years, have employed a larger share of its capital and labor than is wise, in production to supply the wants of the consuming countries, without becoming sensible of its defect of policy. The failure of a crop, or the failure of a market, does not discourage the cultivator. He renews his labors another year, and he renews his hopes. It is otherwise with manufacturing industry. The precise quantum of its produce, at least, can with some accuracy be previously estimated. And the wants of foreign countries can be with some probability anticipated.

I am sensible, Mr. Chairman, if I have even had a success, which I dare not presume, in the endeavor I have been making to show that sound policy requires a diversion of so much of the capital and labor of this country from other employments as may be necessary, by a different application of them, to secure, within ourselves, a steady and adequate supply of the great necessities of life, I shall have only established one-half of what it is incumbent upon me to prove. It will be still required, by the other side, that a second proposition be supported, and that is, that Government ought to present motives for a diversion and new application of labor and capital, by that species of protection which the tariff holds out. Gentlemen say, we agree with you; you are right in your first proposition, but "let things alone," and all will come right in the end. Now, I agree with them that things would ultimately get right; but not until after a long period of disorder and distress, terminating in the impoverishment, and perhaps ruin of the country. Dissolve Government, reduce it to its primitive elements, and, without any general effort to reconstruct it, there would arise, out of the anarchy which would ensue, partial combinations for the purpose of individual protection, which would finally lead to a social form, competent to the conservation of peace within, and the repulsion of force from without. Yet no one would say, in such a state of anarchy, let things alone! If gentlemen, by their favorite maxim, mean only that, within the bosom of the State, things are to be left alone, and each individual and each branch of industry, allowed to pursue their respective interests, without giving a preference to either, I subscribe to it. But if they give it a more comprehensive import; if they require that things are to be left alone, in respect not only to interior action, but as to exterior action also; not only as regards the operation of our own Government upon the mass of the interests of the State, but as it relates to the operation of foreign Governments likewise operating upon that mass, I dissent from it.

The maxim in this enlarged sense is indeed everywhere proclaimed, but nowhere practised. It is truth in the books of European political economists. It is error in the practical code of every European State. It is not applied where it is most applicable; it is attempted to be introduced here, where it is least applicable; and even here its friends propose to limit it to the single branch of manufacturing industry, whilst every other interest is encouraged and protected, according to the policy of Europe. The maxim would best suit Europe, where each interest is adjusted and arranged to every other, by causes operating during many centuries. Every thing there has taken and preserved its ancient position. The house that was built centuries ago is occupied by the descendants of its original constructor. If one could rise up, after the lapse of ages, and enter a European shop, he would see the same hammer at work on the same anvil or last, and almost by the same hand. There every thing has found its place and its level, and every thing, one would think, might there be safely let alone. But the policy of the American States is otherwise. Here every thing is new and unfixed. Neither the State nor the individuals who compose it have yet settled down in their firm and permanent positions. There is a constant tendency, in consequence of the extent of our public domain, towards production for foreign markets. The maxim, in the comprehensive sense in which I am considering it, requires, to entitle it to observation, two conditions—neither of which exists—first, that there would be perpetual peace; and, secondly, that the maxim should be everywhere respected. When war breaks out, that free and general circulation of the produce of industry among the nations which it recommends is interrupted, and the nation that depends upon a foreign supply of its necessities must be subjected to the greatest inconvenience. If it be not everywhere observed, there will be, between the nations that do not and the nation that does conform to it, an inequality alike condemned by honor and by interest. If there be no reciprocity—if on the one side there is perfect freedom of trade, and on the other a code of odious restrictions—will gentlemen still contend that we are to submit to such an unprofitable and degrading intercourse? Will they require that we shall act upon the social system, whilst every other Power acts upon the selfish? Will they demand of us to throw widely open our ports to every nation, whilst all other nations entirely or partly occlude theirs against our productions? It is indeed possible that some pecuniary advantage might be enjoyed by our country in prosecuting the remnant of trade which the contracted policy of other Powers leaves to us. But what security is there for our continuing to enjoy even that? And is national honor, is national independence, to count for nothing? I will not enter into a detail of the restrictions with which we are everywhere presented in foreign countries. I will content myself with asserting that they take nothing from us which they can produce themselves, even upon worse terms than we could supply them. Take again as an example the English corn laws. America presents the image of a fine generous-hearted young fellow, who has just come to the possession of a rich estate—an estate which, however, requires careful management. He makes nothing; he buys every thing. He is surrounded by a parcel of Jews, each holding out his hand with a packet of buttons or pins, or some other commodity, for sale. If he ask these Jews to buy any thing which his State produces, they tell him no; it is not for our interest; it is not for yours. Take this new book, says one of them, on political economy, and you will there perceive it is for your interest to buy from us, and to let things alone in your own country. The gentleman from Virginia, to whom I have already referred, has surrendered the whole argument in the example of the East India trade. He thinks that, because India takes nothing but specie from us; because there is not a reciprocal exchange between us and India, of our respective productions; that the trade ought to be discontinued. Now, I do not agree with him that it ought to be abandoned, though I would put it under considerable restrictions, when it comes in competition with the fabrics of our own country. If the want of entire reciprocity be a sufficient ground for the total abandonment of a particular branch of trade, the same principle requires that, where there are some restrictions on the one side, they should be countervailed by equal restrictions on the other.

But this maxim, according to which gentlemen would have us abandon the home industry of the country to the influence of the restrictive system of other countries, without an effort to protect and preserve it, is not itself observed by the same gentlemen, in regard to the great interests of the nation. We protect our fisheries by bounties and drawbacks. We protect our tonnage, by excluding or restricting foreign tonnage, exactly as our tonnage is excluded or restricted by foreign States.

APRIL, 1820.

We passed, a year or two ago, the bill to prohibit British navigation from the West India colonies of that Power to the United States, because ours is shut out from them. The session prior to the passage of that law, the gentleman from South Carolina and I, almost alone, urged the House to pass it. But the subject was postponed until the next session, when it was passed by nearly an unanimous vote; the gentleman from South Carolina and the two gentlemen from Virginia, (Messrs. BARBOUR and TYLER,) voting with the majority. We have now upon our table other bills connected with that object, and proposing restrictions upon the French tonnage, to countervail theirs upon ours. I shall, with pleasure, vote for these measures. We protect our foreign trade, by consuls, by foreign Ministers, by embargoes, by non-intercourse, by a navy, by fortifications, by squadrons constantly acting abroad, by war, and by a variety of commercial regulations in our statute books. The whole system of the General Government, from its first formation to the present time, consists almost exclusively in one unremitting endeavor to nourish, and protect, and defend the foreign trade. Why have not all these great interests been left to the operation of the gentlemen's favorite maxim? Sir, it is perfectly right that we should have afforded this protection. And it is perfectly right, in my humble opinion, that we should extend the principle of it to home industry. I am a friend to foreign trade, but I protest against its being the monopolist of all the favor and care of this Government.

But, sir, friendly as I am to the existence of domestic manufactures, I would not give to them unreasonable encouragement by protecting duties. Their growth ought to be gradual, but sure. I believe all the circumstances of the present period highly favorable to their success. But they are the youngest and the weakest interest of the State. Agriculture wants but little or no protection against the regulations of foreign Powers. The advantages of our position, and the cheapness, and abundance, and fertility of our land, afford to that greatest interest of the State almost all the protection it wants. As it should be, it is strong and flourishing; or, if it be not, at this moment, prosperous, it is not because its produce is not ample, but because, depending as we do altogether upon a foreign market for the sale of the surplus of that produce, the foreign market is glutted. Our foreign trade having almost exclusively engrossed the protecting care of Government, wants no further legislative aid. And whatever depression it may now experience, is attributable to causes beyond the control of this Government. The abundance of capital, indicated by the avidity with which loans are sought, at the reduced rate of five per cent.; the reduction in the wages of labor; and the decline in the price of property of every kind, as well as that of agricultural produce, all concur favorably for domestic manufactures. Now, as when we arranged the existing tariff, is the auspicious moment for Government to step in and cheer and countenance them. We did too little then, and I endeavored to warn this House of the effects of inadequate protection. We were called upon, at that time, by the previous pledges which we had given, by the inundation of foreign fabrics which was to be anticipated from their free admission after the termination of the war, and by the lasting interests of this country; to give them efficient support. We did not do it; let us not now repeat the error. Our great mistake has been in the irregularity of the action of the measures of this Government upon manufacturing industry. At one period it is stimulated too high, and then, by an opposite course of policy, it is precipitated into a condition of depression too low. First, there came the embargo; non-intercourse and other restrictive measures followed; and then, that greatest of all stimulus to domestic fabrication, war. During all that long time, we were adding to the positive effect of the measures of Government, all the moral encouragement which results from popular resolves, legislative resolves, and other manifestations of the public will, and the public wish to foster our home manufacturers, and to render our Confederacy independent of foreign Powers. The peace ensued, and the country was flooded with the fabrics of other countries; and we, forgetting all our promises, coolly and philosophically talk of leaving things to themselves; making up for our deficiency of practical good sense, by the stores of learning which we collect from theoretical writers. I, too, sometimes amuse myself with the visions of these writers, (as I do with those of metaphysicians and novelists,) and, if I do not forget, one of the best among them enjoins it upon a country to protect its industry against the injurious influence operating upon it of the prohibitions and restrictions of foreign countries.

Monuments of the sad effects, upon our manufactures, of the fluctuating policy of the councils of the Union in regard to them, abound in all parts of the country. Villages, and parts of villages, which sprung up but yesterday in the Western country, under the excitement to which I have referred, are perishing and abandoned. In New England, in passing along the highway, one frequently sees large spacious buildings, with the glass broken out of the windows, the shutters hanging in ruinous disorder, cheerless, without any appearance of activity, and surrounded by a solitary gloom. Upon inquiring what they are, you are almost always informed that they were some cotton or other factory, which their proprietors could no longer keep in motion against the overwhelming pressure of foreign competition. Gentlemen ask for facts to show the propriety of protection to our manufactures. Do they want stronger evidence? They ask why the manufacturing industry is not resumed under the encouraging auspices of the present time? Sir, there is general dismay; there is want of heart; there is the greatest moral discouragement. A man who engages in manufacturing business is thought by his friends to be deranged. Who will go to the site on which lie the ruins of Carthage or Balbec to rebuild there a city? Let Government commence a systematic, but moderate, support of this important branch of our industry. Let it announce the fixed purpose, that the protection of it, against the influence of the measures of foreign Governments enters into the scope of our national policy. Let us substitute to the irregular action of our measures one that shall be steady and uniform; and hope and animation and activity will again revive. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Lowndes) offered a resolution, which the House rejected, having for its object to ascertain the profits now made upon capital employed in manufacturing. It is not, I repeat it, the individuals, but the interest we wish protected. From the infinite variety of circumstances under which different manufacturing establishments are situated, it is impossible that any information, such as the gentleman desires, could be obtained, that ought to guide the judgment of this House. It may happen, that, of two establishments engaged in the same species of fabrication, one will be prospering and the other laboring. Take the example of the Waltham manufactory near Boston, and the Brunswick in Maine. The former has the advantages of a fine water situation, a manager of excellent information, enthusiastically devoted to its success, a mechanist of a most inventive genius, who is constantly making some new improvement, and who has carried the water loom to a degree of perfection which it has not attained in England, and such as to reduce the cost of weaving a yard of cloth, adapted to shirting, to less than one cent per yard; and it is abundantly supplied with capital by several rich capitalists in Boston. These gentlemen have the most extensive correspondence with all parts of the United States. Owing to this extraordinary combination of favorable circumstances, the Waltham establishment is doing pretty well. Whilst that of Brunswick, not possessing all of them, but perhaps as many as would enable it, under adequate protection, to flourish, is laboring hard. Would gentlemen infer, from the success of a few institutions having peculiar advantages, which form exceptions to the languishing condition of manufacturing industry, that there exists no necessity for protection? In the most discouraging state of trade and navigation, there were, no doubt, always some few individuals who were successful in prosecuting them. Would it be fair to argue, from these rare instances, against any measure brought forward to revive their activity?

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Whittman) has manifested peculiar hostility to the tariff, and has allowed himself to denominate it a mad, quixotic, ruinous scheme. The gentleman is dissatisfied with the quarter (the West) from which it comes. To give higher tone and more effect to the gentleman's declamation, which is vague and indefinite, he has even assumed a new place in this House. Sir, I would advise the gentleman to return to his ancient position, moral and physical. It was respectable and useful. The honorable gentleman professes to be a friend to manufacturers! And yet he has found an insurmountable Constitutional impediment to their encouragement, of which, as no other gentleman has relied upon it, I shall leave him in the undisturbed possession. The honorable gentleman a friend to manufacturers! And yet he has delivered a speech, marked by peculiar emphasis, the whole of which is against their protection. The honorable gentleman a friend to manufactures! And yet he requires (if his Constitutional difficulty could be gotten over) such an arrangement of the tariff as shall please him, although every one else should be dissatisfied. The intimation is not new of the presumptuousness of Western politicians in endeavoring to contribute to give to the policy of this country such a direction as will assert its honor and sustain its interests. It was first made whilst the measures preparatory to the late war were under consideration, and it now probably emanates from the same quarter. The predilection of the school of the Essex Junto for foreign trade and for British fabrics (I am far from insinuating that other gentlemen who are opposed to the tariff are actuated by any such spirit) is unconquerable. We disregarded the intimation when it was first made: we shall be uninfluenced by it now. If, indeed, there were the least color for the assertion that the foreign trade is to be crushed by the tariff, is it not strange that the whole of the representation from all of our great commercial metropolises should unite to destroy it? The member from Boston, (to whose national and disinterested course I am happy on this as on many other occasions to be able to testify;) the representatives from the city of New York, from Philadelphia, and from Baltimore, all entered into this confederacy to destroy it, by supporting this mad and ruinous tariff. Some gentlemen assert that it is too comprehensive. That it leaves no important interest unprovided for recommends it to me.

The same gentlemen, or others, if it had been more limited, would have objected to its partial operation. The general measure of the protection which it communicates, is pronounced to be immoderate and enormous. Yet no one ventures to enter into a specification of the particular articles of which it is composed, to show that it deserves thus to be characterized. The article of molasses has, indeed, been selected out, and held up, as an instance of the alleged extravagance. The existing tariff imposes a duty of five cents; the proposed tariff ten cents, per gallon. We tax very high foreign spirits, and yet we let in, with a very low duty, foreign molasses, which ought to be considered as rum in disguise, filling the space of so much domestic spirits. If (which I do not believe will be immediately the case, to any considerable extent) the manufacture of spirits from molasses should somewhat decline, under the new tariff, the manufacture of spirits from the raw material produced at home will be extended in the same degree. Besides the incidental advantage of increasing our security against the effects of seasons of scarcity, by increasing the distillation of spirits from grain, there was hardly any item in the tariff which combined so many interests in supporting the proposed rate of duty. The grain-growing country, the fruit country, and the culture of cane, would be all benefited by the duty. Its operation is said, however, to be injurious on a certain quarter of the Union. It was not to be denied that each particular section of the country would feel some one or more articles of the tariff to bear hard upon it, during a short period; but the compensation was to be found in the more favorable operation of others. Now, I am fully persuaded that, in the first instance, no part of the Union would more largely share than New England, in the aggregate, of the benefits resulting from the tariff. The habits of economy of her people, their industry, their skill, their noble enterprise, the stimulating effects of their more rigorous climate, all tend to insure to her the first and the richest fruits of the tariff. The Middle and the Western States would come in afterwards for their portion, and all would share in the advantage of internal exchanges and circulation. No quarter of the Union could urge, with an iller grace than New England, objections to a measure having for its object the advancement of the interests of the whole; for no quarter of the Union participated more extensively in the benefits flowing from the General Government. Her tonnage, her fisheries, her foreign trade, have been constantly objects of federal care. There was expended the greatest portion of the public revenue. The building of the public ships; their equipment; the expenses incident to their remaining in port, chiefly took place there. That great drain upon the revenue, the Revolutionary pension law, tended principally to New England. I do not complain of these advantages which she enjoys. She is, probably, fairly entitled to them. But gentlemen from that quarter may at least be justly reminded of them when they complain of the onerous effect of one or two items of the tariff.

Mr. Chairman, I frankly own that I feel great solicitude for the success of this bill. The independence of my country on all foreign States, as it respects a supply of our essential wants, has ever been with me a favorite object. The war of our Revolution effected our emancipation. The last war contributed greatly towards achieving our commercial freedom. But our entire independence will only be consummated after the policy of this bill shall be recognised and adopted. We have great difficulties to contend with; old habits—colonial usages—the obduracy of the colonial spirit—the enormous profits of a foreign trade, prosecuted under favorable circumstances, which no longer continue. I will not despair; the cause, I verily believe, is the cause of the country. It may be postponed; it may be frustrated for the moment, but it must finally prevail. Let us endeavor to acquire for the present Congress the merit of laying this solid foundation of the national prosperity. If, as I think, fatally for the public interest, the bill shall be defeated, what will be the character of the account which we shall have to render our constituents upon our return among them? We shall be asked, what have you done to remedy the disorders of the currency? Why, Mr. Secretary of the Treasury made us a long report on the matter, containing much valuable information, and some very good reasoning, but, upon the whole, we found that subject rather above our comprehension, and we concluded that it was wisest to let it regulate itself. What have you done to supply the deficit in the Treasury? We thought that, although you are all endeavoring to get out of banks, it was a very good time for us to go into them, and we have authorized a loan? You have done something, then, certainly, on the subject of retrenchment. Here, at home, we are practising the greatest economy, and our daughters, no longer able to wear calico gowns, are obliged to put on homespun. Why, we have saved, by the indefatigable exertions of a member from Tennessee, (Mr. COCKE,) fifty thousand dollars, which were wanted for the Yellow Stone expedition. No, not quite so much; for thirty thousand dollars of that sum were still wanted, although we stopped the expedition at the Council Bluffs. And we have saved another sum, which we hope will give you great satisfaction. After near two days' debate, and a division between the two Houses, we struck off two hundred dollars from the salary of the clerk of Mr. Attorney General. What have you done to protect the home industry from the effects of the contracted policy of foreign Powers? We thought it best, after much deliberation, to leave things alone at home, and to continue our encouragement to foreign industry. Well, surely, you have passed some law to reanimate and revive the hopes of the numerous bankrupts that have been made by the extraordinary circumstances of the world, and the ruinous tendency of our own policy? No; the Senate could not agree on that subject, and the bankrupt bill failed! Can we plead, sir, ignorance of the general distress, and of the ardent wishes of the community for that protection of its industry, which this bill proposes? No, sir, daily almost throughout the session, have we been receiving petitions, with which our table is now loaded, imploring us to extend this protection. Unanimous resolutions from important State Legislatures have called upon us to give it, and the people of whole States, almost in a mass—of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Ohio—have transmitted to us their earnest and humble petitions to encourage the home industry. Let us not turn a deaf ear to them. Let us not disappoint their just expectations. Let us manifest, by the passage of this bill, that Congress does not deserve the reproaches which have been cast on it, of insensibility to the wants and sufferings of the people.

When Mr. C. had concluded—after explanatory observations between Mr. CLAY and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 27.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Græme Keith Spence; which was twice read.

A motion was made by Mr. MCCOY that it lie on the table; which, being rejected, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time tomorrow.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, also reported a bill making appropriations for carrying into effect the treaty lately concluded with the Chippewa nation of Indians; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the better regulation of the trade with the Indian tribes."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to continue in force 'An act to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy,' and also to make further provision for punishing the crime of piracy;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. STORRS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the time being, be and they are hereby authorized to grant the use of the books in the Library of Congress, during the recess of its sessions, to the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, on the terms, and under the rules, regulations, restrictions, and penalties, that members of Congress are allowed to use the said books.

The resolution was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate "to continue in force 'an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy,' and also to make further provision for punishing the crime of piracy," was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, to establish certain land offices in the State of Alabama, (so amended in this House as to include also Indiana and Illinois,) was read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate for concurrence in the amendments.

The bill from the Senate to confirm certain proceedings of the inhabitants of Cahokia, in the State of Illinois, in laying out a town on the commons of said village, was read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

Mr. LITTLE introduced a proposition, the object of which was, that the House should, for the remainder of this session, meet at 11 o'clock instead of 10, the present appointed hour. In support of this motion, he said that every day for a week past there had not been more than thirty members present at the hour of meeting, and the chairmen of committees were not present to make their reports, but subsequently came into the House, and obtained leave to report. He therefore thought it would be a saving of time to meet at the hour of 11, and afford time to the committees to sit in the morning, and transact business.

This motion produced some little discussion between Messrs. SIMKINS, FOOT, CAMPBELL, TAYLOR, and MCCOY. Among other things, it was said by Mr. MCCOY that, though there was a large majority of the House in favor of meeting at an early hour, there never was a majority present at the hour of meeting. He was, however, opposed to changing the hour of meeting, which had already been changed more than once in the session.

The motion of Mr. LITTLE was negatived.

Mr. SIMKINS then moved this resolution:

Resolved, That the House will not adjourn on any day before the hour of five o'clock in the afternoon, whilst any question before it is in discussion, and remains undecided.

And this proposition was ordered to lie on the table for one day.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill regulating the duties on imports.

The question being on the Committee's rising and reporting the tariff bill to the House, the debate thereon was resumed.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, addressed the Committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I feel much indebted to the Committee for their goodness in rising on yesterday, to afford me an opportunity of expressing my views upon this subject.

I am about to attempt an answer to the member from Pennsylvania who reported this bill, and other gentlemen who followed him in its support. Considering the arduousness of the undertaking, it might perhaps be the part of prudence in me to decline it; for one gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. TRIMBLE) informed us that he had demonstrated many of his propositions, and thus placed them beyond the possibility of question, although moral and political questions are, in their nature, incapable of demonstration, and it cannot be affirmed of any thing short of demonstration that there is no possible doubt; whilst another member from Kentucky (the Speaker) has invited the opponents of the bill to attempt an answer to the member from Pennsylvania; from which it may be inferred, that the advocates of the bill feel something like the confidence of anticipated triumph. Arduous however as the undertaking may be, fearful as the odds may be against me, I am emboldened to proceed, from the consideration that, in such a conflict as I find myself engaged in, success on my part would be cause of self-gratulation, whilst defeat would not be attended with disgrace.

The Speaker, in the close of his remarks, called upon us to say what account we could render of our stewardship when we returned to our constituents? He presented to us the following train of inquiry in detail: What, said he, have you done upon the subject of retrenchment? I shall be ready to answer, in relation to that subject, that I exerted my utmost efforts to effect a considerable retrenchment; and that, if I did not succeed, it was because I was overruled by a majority of this House, who differed from me in opinion as to the policy of continuing to its full amount one very large item of public expenditure. What have you done as to the currency of the country? I shall answer, nothing, because nothing was necessary to be done. The channel of circulation had become too full, it had overflowed its banks. The flood of circulating medium has subsided; it has already sought, or is tending to seek, its level, almost as the waters of the Potomac seek theirs. As physical laws govern the one, so the laws of political economy govern the other. Self-regulation, then, is a safer and better reliance than any act of legislation. What have you done to relieve the thousands of unfortunate bankrupts in the country? I shall be ready to answer that, whilst I sincerely sympathize with my suffering fellow-citizens in that situation, I could not vote for a bankrupt bill consistently with my idea of the immutable principles of justice. I do not speak now of the release of their persons from confinement. To such a proposition my objections do not apply; but I never can consent to cancel the obligation of contracts, and to exempt after-acquired property from liability to the payment of debts; because the relation of debtor and creditor cannot exist, until the debtor shall have received something of value from the creditor, and then to cancel the obligation of the contract, is to say to the creditor, who has parted with value we cannot restore to him, that he shall not receive the equivalent which the debtor promised, and without the expectation of which he never would have parted with what constituted the consideration of that promise. This, sir, is a very brief account of my stewardship in relation to these subjects, with which I shall expect that my constituents will be so satisfied as to say that, as it respects them, I have been a faithful servant. I shall not ask them for the further reward of "making me steward over many things, because I have been faithful over a few." But, sir, what connexion have these subjects with the bill now under discussion? Suppose that the House had decided improperly upon all these, can they by any possibility affect the decision upon this question, which must rest upon the basis of its own intrinsic merits? But what have you done in favor of domestic manufactures? Here again, sir, I am ready to answer, nothing; and, as this inquiry brings us directly to the very subject before the Committee, I will now proceed to state to you, and through you to my constituents, the reasons which have produced a conviction upon my mind that, in doing nothing, we shall act wisely.

The avowed object of this bill is, by means of increased duties upon imported goods, to afford encouragement to that part of the industry of the country which is engaged in domestic manufactures; and the question is, whether such a measure is compatible with the principles of justice, or of sound policy? It will be my endeavor to prove that it is not. Before, however, I go particularly into these views, I beg leave to answer the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BALDWIN,) and the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) of a general nature, in relation to our system of revenue from imposts. They have characterized it with epithets of the severest reprobation. It has been called an unsound, a rotten system. So far from thinking that these epithets are merited, I have, for my part, a decided preference for the impost system, and I will proceed to state to the Committee the reasons of that preference. The whole practice of the Government, from its commencement to the present moment, with but few exceptions, and those principally in time of war, has been to rely upon imposts for the purpose of defraying its expenditures. Of this fact I make the double use, that those who have administered the Government have considered this mode of raising revenue most consistent with the feelings of the people, and that the people themselves, having been accustomed to it for thirty years, would find it more agreeable and convenient than any other. I would not innovate upon it, then, unless there were very strong reasons for a change. So far from this, the reasons are, in my opinion, strong in favor of its continuance. Let us examine them somewhat at large. This mode of raising revenue by impost is the least expensive in its collection, and of course, of any given sum raised by taxation, the less there may be expended in collection, the more there will be applicable to the purposes of the Government. Gentlemen have said that the excise in England was collected at less expense than any other tax. Whatever may be the case in England, such would not be the fair calculation in this country. In England the population is dense, and the manufacturers are collected in large cities and towns, which would make the collection much less expensive than in the United States, where the population is comparatively very sparse, and the manufacturers scattered over a much larger surface. But, instead of detaining the Committee with probabilities, I will refer them to matter of fact. The report from the Treasury Department, of December, 1801, states that whilst the expenses of collection on merchandise and tonnage did not exceed four per cent. those on the permanent internal duties amounted to almost twenty per cent. This he ascribed to the dispersed situation of the persons paying the duties, and the total amount of revenue being inconsiderable. But, sir, let us come nearer the present time. It appears, from official documents, that the total amount of duties on imports, for the years 1815, 1816, 1817, and 1818, was (not regarding fractions) $118,383,000, and the whole expense of collection (in like manner discarding fractions) was $2,771,000, not equal to two and a half per cent. upon the whole amount. From the same source I derive the fact that the expense of the collection of internal duties, in 1816, was four per cent. and eight-tenths, and that of the collection of the direct tax of the same year was five per cent. and three-tenths.

A second advantage in favor of the impost system is, that there is much less loss to the Government by insolvency, &c.; it appears that the whole loss upon customs, from the commencement of the system, amounting to the enormous sum of $351,329,799, is not quite one-half of one per cent. Without referring the Committee to the minutæ of official reports, I am justified in saying, generally, that the loss in the collection of internal taxes has been much greater, and for this obvious reason, that the customs are collected from a very few persons in comparison with those from whom the other taxes are collected. A third advantage is, that the payment of this kind of tax is an act of volition; the duty becomes a part of the price, and we either buy or not as we choose; whereas, as far as internal taxes should consist of direct taxes, the payment would be matter of compulsion. A fourth advantage is, that this system is calculated to operate more equally. The great desideratum in every system of taxation should be to make every citizen contribute, as far as practicable, in proportion to his ability. As there is no mode of ascertaining that ability with precision, without too inquisitorial a scrutiny, the best approximation which we can make to it is to act upon the principle that every man's expense is proportioned to his ability; the few examples which we observe of a departure from this principle, in prodigality or extravagance, do not disturb the general truth; the present system has this principle for its basis, as the buyer of goods pays a tax according to what he purchases. Although the same reasoning would apply to excises, yet it clearly would not to direct taxes; they, by the Constitution, must be laid, not according to wealth, but according to population; thus, in case of a direct tax, a manufacturing State, with millions of capital profitably employed in that way, would pay not one cent more than another State of equal population, whose wealth was even fifty per cent. less than that of the other; but it is not only thus unequal in its operation between different States, it is also subject to enormous inequalities between citizens of the same State.

Revision of the Tariff.

The direct tax is imposed upon land with its improvements and slaves. Now, sir, it might happen that a man worth ten thousand dollars, if it consisted in lands and slaves, might pay more direct tax than one worth half a million, if it consisted of certain descriptions of property, such as bank stock, funded debt, &c., for this kind of property pays no part of the direct tax. A fifth advantage in adhering to this system is, that now we have one set of officers; whereas, if we introduce a permanent system of internal taxation, the present system must still be also continued, and thus we shall create another set of officers, whose salaries and perquisites of office will be an entire loss, in a pecuniary point of view, besides the vexation produced by being liable to the demands of a double set of tax-gatherers. The last, but not the least advantage which I will mention, is, that the power of laying imposts is taken from the States and given exclusively to Congress. One of the strongest objections to the Constitution was, the collision which might arise between the State and Federal Governments, in the exercise of their respective powers of taxation, where they were concurrent; but in this particular mode of laying duties on imports, and in this only, the Federal Government having the power exclusively, there is a complete obviation of all difficulties which might arise from colliding jurisdiction.

The advocates of this bill have told us that we cannot much longer get on without the aid of internal taxation; that sooner or later we must come to that point; and that, therefore, we had better do it at once. My first remark in reply to this is, that if, as I have attempted to show, the system of impost be a better and more equal one than that of internal taxation, then the argument which would persuade us to adopt the latter, by anticipation, because we might hereafter be obliged to do it, is precisely like persuading a man that, because he must, in the course of nature, inevitably die, it would become him to anticipate it by his own act, in the commission of suicide. But, say gentlemen, the revenue from imposts is unequal to the exigencies of the Government; and how do you propose to remedy it? Why, it would seem, by the passage of a bill, the effect of which must be, as I shall presently attempt to show, to diminish that very revenue which gentlemen say, even now, is insufficient. The only way by which this apparent inconsistency can be explained is, that this subject is discussed as if a system of internal taxation were now in being; but I call upon gentlemen to remember, that whatever their wishes or opinions as to the relative merits of the two systems may be, the impost system exists now in point of fact, whilst the other does not; and I will add my wish, that it never may, until it shall become indispensably necessary, not by our forced legislation, but by the natural course of events. I have just said that I would attempt to show that the passage of this bill would diminish our revenue; I will now redeem my pledge, or endeavor to do so.

The first proposition which I shall lay down is this—that it will lessen the amount of importations, upon this obvious principle, that any given quantity of the exportable produce of the land and labor of the country will purchase fewer commodities at a higher, than it would at a lower price. That the imposition of the proposed duties will raise the price of the commodities imported no gentleman has questioned. Our exportable produce remaining the same, then, will purchase less than if the duty were not raised; and, consequently, the quantity of articles must be diminished. If it be said that the increased duties will compensate for the diminished consumption, I answer, that, with the exception of a few mere luxuries, the great bulk of imported commodities is consumed by that portion of our people, who, constituting the middle class of society between poverty and wealth, are, with various degrees of property, only independent or moderately rich. Though the very wealthy man might still continue to purchase his luxuries as before, without regard to price, yet, amongst the great class which I have mentioned, (the very bone and sinew of the community,) there is a spirit of prudence and calculation which makes them value their comforts and pleasures at a certain price only, beyond which they will not go. What that is, it is impossible to say, with any thing like precision, it being a mere question of quantity, of more or less; I venture, however, to say, that the duties now proposed would pass this limit, and consequently cause a great diminution of consumption, and with it a diminution of comfort to our citizens, and of revenue to the Government.

I pass on to other views. The increased rate of duty will furnish a strong additional temptation to smuggling, already in some degree practised with the existing duties, and thus, as far as that practice shall extend, defraud the Government altogether. But the advocates of the bill themselves admit that there will be a diminution of revenue as to many of the most important articles, and have attempted to supply it by an increase of duty upon iron, salt, sugar, and coffee—articles either of absolute necessity, or, at least, of ordinary comfort. Upon this I must take leave to remark, that if these articles will bear an increase, we ought, according to the declarations of gentlemen themselves, to have the benefit of it; for they tell us that our revenue is deficient, and any addition which these articles will bear will not be more than the Government can conveniently dispose of. At a time, then, when all the revenue which we can derive from imports will not more than meet the exigencies of the Treasury, it surely cannot be right to adopt any policy which would diminish that amount, even if the policy proposed to be established might, under other circumstances, be thought a correct one.

I shall now endeavor to prove that it is in violation of the general principles of political economy to build up a manufacturing system by the forced means of legislative interference, and that there is nothing peculiar in the situation of this country, whether considered in relation to its political character or otherwise, which makes our case an exception to the general rule. It would seem, however, from what has been said by the Speaker of the writers on political economy, that he reposes little or no confidence in them. He has said, that we derive our visionary theories from European writers, whom their own Governments do not acknowledge as guides in legislation; thus, that gentleman, instead of meeting and refuting the doctrines of Stuart, Smith, and others, has at once put them under the ban of his denunciation by a single contemptuous remark. Indeed, it might be said of him, as was said of another distinguished man upon another occasion, "that he put to flight a host of syllogisms by a sneer." After all his disparagement of European writers on the science of political economy, I must be permitted to say, that, if their manufactures of cotton and wool exceed ours as far as their works upon this interesting subject surpass ours, then indeed we cannot sustain the competition to which we aspire by any encouragement which we can afford; and though their Governments do not follow their counsels, that surely is no reason why we should not, if they be in themselves correct, and calculated to enhance the prosperity of the country. As well might it be said, that we ought not to respect any of their principles of ethics or morality, such, for example, as the doctrines of Paley or Rutherford, because they do not pursue them. There is, it is true, no demonstration in the sciences of morals and politics, as there is in the mathematics; but there are, in each of those sciences, certain truths so obvious in themselves and so universally assented to by mankind, that they almost rank in the class of axioms, and constitute the basis of reasoning in questions of this kind; such, for example, is the principle, that the market price of commodities is regulated by the proportion between the actual demand and supply. It is to principles as well settled as this that I shall resort in the course of this argument, though they may even be drawn from European writers. Without further remarks, I will proceed directly to the general reasoning against legislative interference to create and sustain a manufacturing system.

The strength of every country consists in the number, the character, and the wealth of its population. First, then, let us compare two countries, the one agricultural, and the other manufacturing, in relation to numbers. The very object of agriculture is to procure the means of subsistence; but it is agreed on all hands that the quantity of subsistence is precisely the measure of the extent of population, since without it they cannot exist; of consequence, other things being equal, the country, which is agricultural, and which not only makes its own subsistence, but a surplus for exportation; which, upon occasion, may be applied to supply the deficiency of any year, will be more populous than one, a great part of whose labor is applied to manufactures, and which, therefore, in ordinary years, scarcely makes a sufficiency, and, in any case of deficiency, depends entirely upon a foreign supply, for the very means by which to support life. If it be said that this reasoning does not apply to the present situation of the United States, I answer, that it is the province of the statesman, not to legislate merely for the present moment, but to look forward to that state of things, which, according to the course of human affairs, may fairly be considered as inevitable; and, according to all experience, the time will come when it will apply to us with full force as well as to other nations. When, for example, the manufacturers, together with their families, shall bear a large proportion to the remaining population; for let it be remembered, that while food only increases arithmetically, population increases geometrically; an idea which I shall have occasion to dwell upon more at large hereafter.

Let us now compare the same two nations in relation to the character of their population, whether affected by moral or political causes. The agriculturist, in this country, cultivates his own farm; he looks only to the beneficence of the Deity, and the sweat of his own brow, for the maintenance of himself and family; by his own will he regulates his conduct; he knows no superior except those who are clothed with the authority of the law; he thus acquires the proud spirit of an independent freeman; he has the port, the stature, the dignity, of a man. On the contrary, the manufacturer has no source of revenue but his labor, which he must constantly sell to a master; not his own, but that master's will, is the rule of his conduct. While independence, then, is the characteristic of the agriculturist, mere servility is that of the manufacturer. This is the difference in the moral effects; that in the physical is just as striking; the agriculturist, from the very nature of his pursuits, enjoys the light and air of Heaven, in all its purity; he has his regular periods of labor and rest; he has that strong and healthy constitution which results from these. The manufacturer, on the contrary, under the orders of an avaricious task-master, scarcely knows the distinction of day and night. The hammers of Birmingham are never at rest; the wheels of Manchester never stand still. They are pent up in task-houses during the day, amid noxious effluvia, and crowded in huts at night—that is, such of them as are allowed to sleep; for a part, in alternate succession, pursue their toils during the night. Such is the condition of the adults engaged in these establishments. That of the children is, if possible, still more deplorable; taken at an early period from their parents, they are cut off from the sacred morality of the hearth, and lose all benefit of parental instruction, which instils the lessons of wisdom into the mind, and morality into the heart; thrown together into a crowd, where there is a promiscuous intercourse between different ages and sexes, fatigued with a degree of labor which they can scarcely bear; without the aid of moral or religious instruction, they grow up unfit to be members of society, and qualified only to obey the will of a master themselves, and to transmit that wretched inheritance to their posterity. How different the condition of the children of the agriculturist! The virtue and independence of the parent are learned and practised by them, and they become qualified to act with propriety in all the various relations in which they stand bound to society. But, sir, I will not pursue this subject further. I refer the Committee to the feeling description of those who have written upon it, and particularly to that of the celebrated Aikin.

The advocates of this bill contend, that it will tend to increase the national wealth. I think I shall be able to show that they are entirely deceived in this calculation. Wealth, either public or private, consists in the excess of production beyond consumption; whatever appropriation of capital, then, will create the largest mass of production, (the consumption remaining the same,) will create the most wealth; if an appropriation to manufactures were the most profitable, we may be assured that individual interest will give it that direction. This principle of interest is one of the strongest of our nature; “not written on the heart by precept, but engraven by destiny; not instilled by education, but infused at our nativity;” it burns with an inextinguishable light, like the fire of the vestal virgins. The unceasing desire, which we thus have, to better our condition, is best guided, too, by individual sagacity, which always points, or endeavors to point, to the object of our wishes. Why, then, is the capital of the country not appropriated to manufactures? Merely for the reason, that other appropriations of it are more profitable; this is proven, incontestably, by the very circumstance of the manufacturers asking for aid; for, surely, if their profit were equal to that of the other pursuits in society, they would not need it, and to give it would be the extreme of injustice. But, if the appropriation of capital to manufactures be thus clearly shown to be less profitable than in some other way, then it follows that a less mass of production is created; and, as national wealth has been shown to consist in the excess of production beyond consumption, consequently, national wealth is diminished, not increased. That it will increase the wealth of the great manufacturers, no one questions; but, let it be remembered, that the inquiry here is, whether it will add to the totality of the wealth of the nation? I have already shown that it will produce a contrary effect; and that, too, by a direct injury to the whole mass of consumers; for, precisely as you enhance the price of the commodities which they purchase, you diminish the value of the products of their labor, the value of which consists in the power of commanding the products of the labor of others. Another great advantage which an agricultural country possesses over a manufacturing one, is, the greater stability of its wealth; the wealth of the first consists in its lands, with its permanent improvements, buildings, melioration of soil, &c. which, amidst all the vicissitudes of events, and even the shocks of war, still remain; that of the other, with the exception of the fixed part of the capital, consists in what claims no country for its home, but that in which the greatest profit can be made; it may rather be said to sojourn for a while in any country, than to be domiciliated there; one combination of circumstances located it in a particular place; a different combination will cause its removal. The history of all Europe is a practical commentary on these remarks; manufactures have there repeatedly changed their abode; and no man can tell how soon England may cease to be the work-shop and toy-shop of Europe and America.

Another decided recommendation of the agricultural system over the manufacturing, is this: the interest of the agriculturist is precisely identified with that of the community; that of the manufacturer is not only not identified, but is, in some degree, opposed to it. The interest of the manufacturer is, to narrow, as much as possible, the competition in the sale of his commodities; the interest of the community is, obviously, to widen that competition. “Profit, too, is naturally low in rich, and high in poor countries; and it is always highest in countries which are going fastest to ruin.” In a political point of view, then, it is well worthy of consideration how far it is good policy to create and sustain, by artificial means, a class in society whose interests are thus, in some degree, necessarily opposed to those of the rest of the society. I do not mean to say, that manufactures are not useful, and even necessary, to agriculture; but I do mean to contend, that it is better to let others manufacture for us, as long as we can appropriate our capital in a way which will be more profitable; and I do mean to contend, that, if Government attempt to judge of this, it will be perpetually subject to error, and may, by the aid which it affords, force a comparatively unprofitable appropriation of the capital of the country; whereas, if it be left to individual sagacity, the thermometer will scarcely mark the variations in the temperature of the weather with more accuracy than this will the variations in the rate of profit; and, consequently, we have the utmost security that capital will be applied to manufactures, whenever it ought to be so applied; that is, whenever, by such an application, it will be more profitable than by any other. And what equivalent are we promised for submitting to a measure subject to so many and such strong objections? Why, it is said, that, if we will protect manufactures, as soon as they shall be firmly established, they will afford us a revenue from excise. In the first place, I answer, that, if that promise should be realized, the period would be altogether uncertain, and, in the mean time, there would be an acknowledged deficiency of revenue arising from impost; and further, if I have shown that an appropriation of capital in that way would be less profitable, there would be an actual annihilation of national wealth, to an amount equal to the difference between the profit arising from that and a different appropriation. It is said, however, that manufactures will become cheaper than they now are: this is a downright inconsistency; for, at their present price, we are loudly called upon to save them from sinking, and yet, at the same moment, we are told, that they will actually be sold at a price, hereafter, less than that for which they now sell, and a sale at which, it is said, will produce ruin. There is no inducement, then, in this promised equivalent. I have already shown that the proposed measure is wrong, upon general principles, and I will now attempt to show, not only that there is nothing peculiar in the situation of this country which would require us to depart from these general principles; but that, on the contrary, whatever distinguishing peculiarity there is, either in our Government, people, or country, it contributes rather to fortify than to weaken their force, and to render them emphatically applicable to us. Our Government is Republican; next to the virtue of its citizens, equality is one of the surest foundations upon which such a Government can stand. Equality of rights is actually attainable, and is practically enforced; but equality of property, also, as far as it can be effected by Constitutional and legal means, is also greatly desirable; it is with a view to this result, that the principle of primogeniture has been abolished in the several States, which gave to one member of a family the whole real estate; it is with the same view that the principle of entails has been abolished, which perpetuated the estate, so given, in the particular person, and his heirs in a particular line. These principles are two of the strongest pillars upon which a monarchy rests, because they concentrate the property of the country, and with it the power and influence of a few; but the very reverse of this is the proper policy in our Government; with us not concentration, but the most extensive and universal diffusion is the great desideratum; the very same property which, when broken into small parts, spreads plenty, comfort, and independence, over a whole country, when accumulated in the hands of a few, begets the extremes of great wealth and great poverty; by this, one portion of the society is too much elevated, the other is too much depressed; the one feels arrogance, the other submission. In such a state of things, the force of political institutions would be continually impaired by the aristocracy of wealth. Inasmuch, then, as I believe that the effect of this bill would be to produce this concentration of wealth, so much to be reprobated, and thus place the General Government in the attitude of counteracting the policy of the States, which,

as I have said, consists in promoting a diffusion of property—in this point of view, I think there is a strong political reason, derived from the nature of our institutions, in aid of the general principles which I have been discussing.

In relation to our people they have, from a combination of circumstances, the most important of which is the immense quantity of new and fertile land, been always accustomed to the pursuits of agricultural life. The force of habit, then, co-operates with other causes to give them a preference to that kind of labor; but I have already endeavored to prove that it is more contributive to the health of the body and the independence of the mind. If these positions be correct, and especially the last, agriculture is a pursuit which, more than manufactures, fits the people for the Government under which they live. Surely it cannot be the part of a statesman, by legislation, to hold out an inducement to the people to abandon that pursuit which qualifies them for the station in which they are placed by the social compact under which they live; not to perform the part of mere servile obedience, but to fill the station of independent freemen, who, by their representatives, themselves make the laws by which themselves are governed.

In relation to our country, let it be remembered that Europe, particularly the manufacturing part of it, is well peopled, whilst our population is extremely sparse. The population of England, including Wales, in 1803, was 169 to the square mile; in France it was 174 to the square mile. In 1810, the population of Connecticut, the most populous State in the Union, was 56.04 to the square mile; that of Virginia only 13 and a fraction; and, admitting the superficies of the United States to be two millions of square miles, the whole population is only three and eighty-three hundredths to a square mile. See Seybert's Statistical Annals. The whole land of England and Wales is estimated by Bristed at 38,500,000 acres. I have already said, that Seybert estimates the United States at 2,000,000 square miles; this, reduced to acres, amounts to 1,280,000,000 acres of land. Now, sir, it seems to me, that it would be almost sufficient to state the relative population and territory of the two countries, to convince any man that what may be a correct policy in relation to England, would be highly improper for us to pursue.

The population of England and Wales, in 1803, exceeded that of the United States in 1810, and yet the territory of the United States is more than thirty times that of England and Wales; whilst the population of the United States, to the square mile, is more than forty times less, including our whole superficies. Manufactures suit a redundant population, with a confined territory; such is the case of England: they do not suit a sparse population and a redundant territory; such is the situation of the United States. Manufactures, if not forced into existence by artificial means, are the natural result of an overflowing capital; it never can be said that the capital of any country can be of that kind, whilst there are millions and tens of millions of acres of the most fertile land yet uncultivated; such is the situation of the United States. Whilst there is land of this sort to cultivate, its cultivation is the most profitable appropriation of capital. Take, for example, a quarter section of land at its present price, amounting to two hundred dollars; let but one half of this be well cultivated, and I know of no application of the same capital, unconnected with mere speculation, which would yield an equal result; the mere maintenance of the family, which would be derived from it, exclusive of the produce which might be sold, under ordinary circumstances, to an amount equal to the capital invested, would be more than the profit of any other appropriation with which I am acquainted. What is true of one quarter section, is equally true of every one in the United States, as long as one of good quality remains in an uncultivated state. There is an argument derived from the influence of machinery upon manufactures, which I beg leave to present to the Committee, because it seems to me to be entitled to very great weight. To make the application, I will first present a few facts. In a note to Lauderdale, on Public Wealth, page 294, it is said, that a machine at Derby contained 26,586 wheels, and 97,746 movements, that work 73,726 yards of silk at every turn of the wheel; that is to say, 318,504,960 yards in twenty-four hours. In the same book, page 301, it is said that, in Scotland, it was estimated that a still could be discharged about once a day. In thirteen years afterwards, they had arrived at such perfection as to discharge it almost twenty-two times in an hour—that is, upwards of five hundred times as often. These statements appear to be such as almost to startle credulity. Let us take some much more moderate, and which will answer all the purposes of my argument. In Ganilh's Political Economy, it is said that Sir Richard Arkwright's invention of the cotton-spinning machine shortened that kind of labor by two-thirds, and rendered it twenty times more productive than it had been before. In a supplement to the Philadelphia address, of 1819, it is said that a British spinner can, by the intervention of labor-saving machinery, spin as much by one person as requires in India sixty persons. Finally, in the same book, it is said, upon the authority of a British writer, that the whole laboring population of Great Britain has its powers multiplied fourteen times by machinery. The author makes an estimation which would reduce it to about twelvefold. The general purpose for which I have made these quotations is this—to present to the advocates of this bill a dilemma from which it seems to me they cannot extricate themselves. The first part of it is, that, if we have not the advantage of labor-saving machinery, it is utterly impossible to sustain a competition against the foreign manufacturer; the other is, that, if we have that machinery, our other advantages are such that our manufacturers do not need any further protection from the Government. The first proposition is, that it is impossible to sustain a competition, unless we have the advantage of machinery. If I were to take the case of the still which I have stated, and rely upon that, it would be so striking that the mere statement of the fact would superseede the necessity of argument or comment; for all will agree at once that distillation, carried on by a still discharged once a day, could not maintain a competition against that carried on by a still discharged five hundred times a day; that is to say, could not maintain a competition where the odds were five hundred to one.

But, sir, I will not call this extreme case to my aid; I will not even use the much more moderate statement of the British machinery making one British spinner equal to forty India spinners, besides an allowance for the expense of the machinery; I will take the minimum estimates; I will suppose that the physical labor is multiplied twelve times by machinery; and I will ask whether, even under these circumstances, we could possibly sustain a competition without ourselves having the aid of machinery? I will venture to answer the question for the Committee, and say, it would not be possible; for the obvious reasons, first, that the odds are twelve to one against us, with the exception of the cost and expense of the machinery; and, secondly, that if we attempted to balance it by eleven additional workmen, we should be subject to the enormous comparative disadvantage of paying the wages, and furnishing the clothing, food, and maintenance of eleven persons, whereas the machines require no food or clothing, the only accruing cost being the interest of the original price, and the wear and tear of the machine. If it be said that we have not the machinery, then I answer in the alternative, that, if our manufacturers have the capital, and will not appropriate it in that way, it is their own fault; if they have not the capital which would enable them to buy the machinery, then the Government cannot furnish it, and without it they are not ready for manufactures.

The second proposition is, that if our manufactures have the machinery, their other advantages are such that they need no further protection from the Government. Take, for example, the two great articles of cotton and woollen goods; upon these the existing duties are twenty-five per cent.; when, in addition to this, it is recollected that the raw material is raised here, whereas the foreign manufacturer has to purchase it at a considerably enhanced price, and that he also is subject to the charges and risk of transportation to this country, the whole advantage of the domestic manufacturer may be estimated moderately at thirty-five per cent. or more. As to the coarse cotton goods beyond the Cape of Good Hope, it is greatly more, because the duty is estimated upon them as if their minimum cost were twenty-five cents per yard, whereas, in point of fact, it is not more than ten cents. If with this advantage we cannot sustain the competition, it argues such a want of skill or economy, or something else, as to show that we are not ready yet for manufactures.

But I will not detain the Committee longer with hypothetical reasoning, but will come to some facts, which will show that it is the want of perfect machinery, which makes the great difference against us. It is said, in the supplement to the address of the Philadelphia Society, which I have before referred to, that we have beaten England out of our market, in hats, shoes, boots, and all manufactures of leather; that we are her superiors in ship building; and the reason assigned in that work is, that these are all works of the hands, where labor-saving machinery gives no aid. But again, sir, in the same address we are presented with the results of a cotton manufactory near Boston, from which it appears that three hundred persons, consisting of fourteen men and two hundred and eighty-six women and children, with the aid of power-looms and other machinery, produce at the rate per annum of 1,500,000 square yards of cloth, amounting, at twenty-five cents per yard, to $312,500; which, after deducting the price of the raw material, leaves $240,000; equal to eight hundred dollars to each hand. This, surely, is a result which any capitalist ought to be content with; and, accordingly, we are informed that the owners of this establishment are satisfied, and ask no protection from the Government. In the same address we are told, upon the authority of a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, in 1816, that in the year 1815, there were engaged in the cotton manufactory about 100,000 persons, consisting of 10,000 men, 66,000 women and female children, and 24,000 boys, who made only 81,000,000 yards of cloth.

Now, sir, it will be seen, by a comparison of these two statements, that, if the 100,000 persons, in the year 1815, had made a quantity of cloth in the same proportion to their numbers, as the manufacturers near Boston did, instead of 81,000,000 yards, which they did make, they would have made 500,000,000 yards. It will be seen, also, that, taking the quantity of cloth which they actually did make, to wit, 81,000 000 yards, and allowing the same proportion to the persons engaged, as in the manufactory near Boston, (called, I believe, the Waltham) instead of 100,000 persons, there ought only to have been 16,200 engaged in the manufacture. And what, let me ask, is the cause of the enormous difference between these two results? Sir, the book itself assigns the reason, which I will give you in its own words: speaking of the product of the Waltham Factory, it says, "the reason why the result of this calculation so far exceeds the proceeds of the labor of the 100,000 manufacturers in 1815, as stated in page 201, is, that the machinery of the establishment near Boston has been brought to the last degree of perfection; and the power looms, which afford immense facilities to the operations, were very rare in 1815." Here, then, is the very principle for which I am contending, namely, that when we have the best kind of machinery, we do, in point of fact, a prosperous business. If that be the case, I contend that it is not to be expected that we can furnish the capital to purchase this machinery, when it is not owned; and if the manufacturer have this capital, he wants not governmental aid, but only the appropriation of his own money, together with ordinary care and prudence in the management of the establishment. I forgot, sir, to mention another decided advantage in favor of the American manufacturer, which is the greater cheapness of provisions, a consideration entitled to considerable weight in the account. If it be said, the wages of labor are higher in the United States than in Europe, I answer, first, that the same supplement to the Philadelphia address, to which I have so often referred, seems to consider the rate of wages as not being any considerable objection. But it is indifferent to me whether the wages of labor be considered too high or not. Gentlemen may have this point either way. If they be considered not too high, then there is no reason, upon this account, to ask for protection; if, on the contrary, they be considered so high as to make it difficult for the American manufacturer to sustain a competition against the European, then, there results, from that fact, an inference almost irresistible against our manufacturing at present. To make myself understood upon this point, I must ask the attention of the Committee to the nature of the wages of labor, and the circumstances which make it high. Capital will never long be appropriated to any business which does not yield the ordinary profit. The wages of the laboring men employed must always be subducted before that profit can be calculated. If, then, those wages be high, and the business yet carried on, it appears satisfactorily that, after the payment of such wages, it is capable of yielding the usual profit. Any description of business which, whilst it yields the usual profit to the capitalist, affords higher wages to all the laboring men employed, than any other business, is more promotive of the public and private prosperity of the country than that other. But, further, the rate of wages depends upon the demand for labor; as that demand is increased by the increasing wealth of the country, and cannot otherwise be increased, so the greatest degree of demand will be for that description of labor which is most productive. When, therefore, I am told that the present pursuits of the country afford high wages to labor, and so high that manufacturers cannot pay them; I answer, then, that manufactures are less profitable than those pursuits, and, consequently, they ought not to be sustained at the expense of pursuits yielding more profit than they do. But, sir, why do I pursue this investigation further? We have been told, by the Speaker, that there are millions of capital now waiting for and seeking an employment. I will add, that I have understood a large sum could be borrowed by the Government, at five per cent. We have been told, too, and the declaration has been iterated and reiterated, that there are thousands and tens of thousands in the United States, who, for want of employment, are unable to maintain themselves and families. If all these ideas be correct, then, I appeal to the candor of the Committee, whether manufactures ought to receive any legislative protection. From representation, it would seem that capital is dormant, laborers out of employment, of course that a small profit would be satisfactory, and that wages of labor would be small; and we know the fact which I have stated to be correct, that our provisions are cheap, our materials raised at home, and, in short, if we have the machinery suited to the purpose, that we have every advantage in our favor except that of experience, and even that we can command from abroad.

Yet we have heard the most doleful Jeremiahs in relation to the condition of the manufactures of the country; we have been told they were lying prostrate for want of encouragement; we have been told, by the Speaker, that, in travelling to the North, he inquired, what ruinous building is that? and was answered, it is a cotton factory. And what is that? Another cotton factory. Indeed, sir, the desolation of the manufacturing establishments has been described, by that gentleman, in a manner almost as impressive as are the halls of Balcutha, where, we are told, that the rank grass grows upon the wall, and the fox peeps out of the window. But, sir, if manufactures be prostrate, so also are commerce and agriculturally equally low themselves, needing some reanimation, and in this prostrate and almost inanimate condition, instead of breathing new life into them, they are to be still more oppressed, by heaping upon them additional burdens in favor of manufactures—I had like to have said, by inflicting upon them, in part, the punishment of peine forte et dure—that is, putting upon them as much as they can bear, and more than they can bear. In order to understand and duly to appreciate the complaints of the manufacturers, it behooves us to take a short retrospect of the history of the country; that retrospect will show us, first, that the apparently unprosperous condition of manufactures, compared with what it was a few years ago, is the result of adventitious circumstances, and that, therefore, it is not to be remedied by any permanent system of legislation; and, secondly, that the same circumstances have also greatly, if not equally, affected the other great interests of society, and that, therefore, the remedy for the sufferings of the one is not to be found in a system, the effect of which will be to increase the sufferings of the others. Without detaining the Committee, to inquire minutely into the causes that led to it, the fact is of universal notoriety that, during the late war with Great Britain, and for some time after, the channel of circulation in the United States was filled to overflowing with a paper currency, the prevailing one of the country. One of the immediate causes of this, was the countenance afforded by public opinion to the banks, (the paper mints,) in suspending specie payments, and thus removing the only effectual restraint upon the cupidity of stockholders. This led, not only to the multiplication of new banks, but to the excessive issue of paper from the old ones. I promised the Committee, however, not to detain them with an inquiry into the causes, and I will, therefore, proceed with the assumption of the fact, that the country was deluged with an inundation of paper currency; for the amount, I refer you, sir, to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, from which it will be seen that, from the year 1816 to the close of the year 1819, the currency of this country had been reduced from about $110,000,000 to about 45,000,000.

The profits of manufacturing had been such during the war, that many were allured to embark in it, and a great portion of them without an adequate capital of their own, but deriving resources from the facility of bank accommodations. The great depreciation of the currency, on account of its excessive quantity, caused every description of property to sell extravagantly high. This would have been nominal only, if the currency had continued of its then value; but its subsequent great and actual appreciation has fatally proven that, what was only a nominal high price in the commencement, has turned out to be actually so, to the ruin, or at least embarrassment of thousands. Thus, a considerable portion of the investments in manufacturing establishments was made whilst every thing was at or near the acme of extravagant price, and in many instances, too, upon a borrowed capital. This was not confined to manufacturers; every interest in the country, and amongst others, the agricultural, has been deeply affected by this state of things. Whenever, from any cause, the circulating medium of a country begins to undergo a rapid depreciation, the immediate and necessary effect is, that every kind of property begins to be represented by more dollars, the number of which increases as the depreciation increases. This is almost universally considered a rise in the actual value of property, and hence a spirit of speculation is awakened amongst all classes of the community; purchases are made, contracts are entered into, as if the present prices were not only to continue, but to increase. Soon, however, depreciation reaches its height, and, according to the course of human affairs, the currency begins to move in a contrary progress; appreciation now marches with as gigantic strides as depreciation had done before; and the consequences are seen in the ruin of thousands, who, but yesterday, as it were, seemed to be in a tide of prosperity. The condition of the United States is a practical commentary upon this reasoning. Within three or four years past, the farmer got two dollars per bushel for his wheat; the cotton planter thirty cents for his cotton; the tobacco planter from twenty to thirty dollars per hundred for his tobacco; contracts and purchases were made, predicated upon this state of things; lands which, a few years before, had sold at ten and fifteen dollars per acre, now sold for twenty and thirty; slaves, who had sold at four or five hundred, now sold for eight hundred or a thousand; and so of all the other transactions in society. The great bulk of society cannot distinguish between a rise in price, which is the result of depreciation in the currency, and that which proceeds from actual appreciation in the value of property.

Now, sir, the more clearly to illustrate my idea, let me take some individual contract for the payment of one thousand dollars; five hundred bushels of wheat, at two dollars per bushel, would discharge it. But let us suppose that, though wheat sold at this price when the contract was made, it fell, before it was discharged, to one dollar. Here it is obvious that half the amount remains unpaid, though the resources are the same. Now what is true as to this single transaction, is equally true as to all the contracts in society; and consequently, upon the hypothesis stated, half of all those contracts would remain unsatisfied, though the resources in kind were as great at the period for completing the contracts as when they were made. The report of the Treasury furnishes a pretty good standard of the actual degree of embarrassment in complying with the contracts of society. There are $45,000,000, out of which to comply with engagements entered into when the circulating medium amounted to $110,000,000. Let every gentleman bring home to himself the difficulty which he would feel in performing his contracts, if his cash were reduced in the proportion of from $110 to $45, and he will at once realize the whole embarrassment of all the people of the United States, whose currency is reduced, it appears, in that proportion. In this embarrassment the manufacturers participate, in common with their fellow-citizens of every other class; and this view of the subject will show that the manufacturers mistake greatly in the mode in which they estimate their profits. That estimation should be made, not upon the nominal amount of their capital invested, but upon what it is now worth. Sir, I know that this change has operated severely upon them; but I have shown that it operates equally upon the agricultural and all other interests in society. Take the case of the farmer. If, sir, we were to estimate the profits of a Virginia farmer upon the nominal amount of his capital in lands, slaves, &c., three years ago, with a sale of his produce at the present prices, none scarcely would make two per cent., few would make one, and thousands not half an one.

But, sir, I wish to present another view of this subject, which will meet many of the complaints which have been urged. This view, I acknowledge, does not apply to the manufacturer, who commenced upon a borrowed or fictitious capital, and who is now indebted for the original investment; but surely it is not the purpose of any gentleman to furnish such persons the means of reimbursement of the capital which they have borrowed, and injudiciously invested; that would be to make us the insurers against the losses of all the improvident speculators in the country, and would be as unreasonable as to relieve the farmers of the country who had made injudicious purchases of land. Then, sir, let us take the case of a manufacturer, who owes nothing for his manufacturing establishment, which I will suppose to be paid for with his own funds, and I will show that a much less apparent profit will be, to him, intrinsically as valuable as a greater apparent profit would have been a few years ago. In 1816 cotton sold at 30 cents per pound, now at not more than fifteen; provisions, and every thing necessary for the maintenance of labor, are now much cheaper than they then were. See the operation of these things; suppose, in 1816, a bushel of wheat sold at $1 50, and that it now sells at one dollar; if, in 1816, cotton cloth sold at 30 cents per yard, and now it sells at 20 cents, it is substantially just as good a sale; for, though there is a nominal fall of fifty per cent. in the money price, yet the true value of any thing is the quantity of the produce of other's labor which it will command; and now twenty cents will command as much of that produce as thirty did a few years ago.

I could multiply illustrations of this kind, but these will be sufficient to show that a part of the complaints of manufacturers is founded upon a mistaken mode of estimating their profits, and another part, upon estimating the nominal or money price of their fabrics, for the actual or intrinsic value, or the power which they give in commanding the labor of others. Another great error, in estimating the profits of manufactures, is this: I have already shown to the Committee, that the Committee of Commerce estimated the number of persons engaged in the cotton manufactory in 1815 at 100,000. I have also shown you that, with the aid of machinery, such as there is at Waltham, and taking the number of hands there as the standard, 16,200 persons would have been sufficient. Now, sir, supposing that, whilst the price of every thing else has fallen, the wages of labor should remain the same, and supposing, too, what I think extravagant, that $150 each ought to be estimated as the wages, though nine-tenths of them are women, boys, and female children, yet, in this item alone, there is an over-estimate in the expenses of $12,570,000.

We have been told, however, that England has derived her immense wealth from manufactures, and we have been, therefore, much pressed with the weight of her example. I have already endeavored to show that in this country a different appropriation of capital is more profitable, and that, therefore, it is impossible to increase the national wealth by diverting it to a less profitable one. If I have succeeded in this, whatever may be the case in relation to England, her example is not for our imitation. I beg leave, however, to tell gentlemen that, although England has derived much of her boasted wealth from manufactures, yet she has derived a large portion of it from various other sources; she has had, for a long series of years, with the unavoidable interruptions of war only, the most extensive foreign commerce in the world; she for a long time had the monopoly of the commerce of the United States, then her colonies; she now has it of her American and West India colonies; but, above all, she has derived immense wealth from her East India possessions. Whatever may have been the fate of her East India Company, the nation itself, per fas aut nefas, by monopoly and oppression, have been much enriched from that extended empire, embracing a native population of forty millions of people. Let us for a moment inquire into this somewhat in detail: Colquhoun, a modern British writer, informs us, that the gross revenue of the East India Company's possessions amounts to upwards of £18,000,000; the same writer states that there are 6,000 British people, who, as civil and military officers, receive salaries of from £200 to £10,000. Besides the East India Company, there are in their territorial possessions 4,000 free British merchants; from salaries, and from the profits of the free trade, large sums are accumulated by individuals, which find their way to the mother country. It is true, that almost all the gross revenue is expended in the company's possessions; but I refer the Committee to the history of that suffering country, to conjecture of how much they have been plundered by the natives of England, who return to their native land to riot upon the spoils which their rapine has produced. I speak upon the authority of Colquhoun, when I say that England has been much enriched from that source. But, after all, what is this boasted wealth of England? Is it distributed amongst the people at large, so as "to scatter plenty over a smiling land?" No, sir, it is collected into the hands of comparatively a few; in the language of another, "it sprouts into wens and tumors, and collects in aneurisms which starve and palsy the extremities."

Sir, the emblem of England is a painted sepulchre—fair without, but carious within. View that country at a distance, and you see a powerful navy, an extensive commerce, and a great system of manufactures, promising almost boundless wealth; but lift the curtain—take a nearer view—and you behold much more to regret than to admire. Such a view will present to you the following picture: the country mortgaged as it were by a debt, the mere interest of which is greatly more than the principal of our national debt; this interest paid to the public creditors, who are less than one million in number, whilst the whole population of Great Britain and Ireland is between sixteen and seventeen millions. To pay this interest and the current expenses of Government a revenue was raised for the year 1819, (which for that single year was £54,000,000 sterling,) equal in our currency to considerably more than double the whole capital of our national debt, and then leaving a deficiency of £14,000,000. The taxes to meet this enormous expenditure, supposed to be at least four pounds sterling to every man, woman, and child; the poor rates for 1815, estimated at £7,800,000, equal to $34,632,000—a sum considerably larger than the whole annual expenditure of the United States' Government, including the Sinking Fund of $10,000,000—the paupers estimated as being between a fifth and a sixth part of the whole population of England. Such are some of the outlines of the picture which England presents. There is indeed much wealth in the country, but so distributed as to make extreme riches and extreme poverty—a state of things which I ardently hope never to see existing in the land which gave me birth.

Before I quit this part of the subject, I cannot forbear to call the attention of the Committee to an estimate made of the immense productiveness of manufactures, in the Address of the Philadelphia Society, first number of the new series. It is there stated, and attempted to be shown by calculation, that the cotton manufacturers of Manchester, with a bale and a half of cotton, costing only seventy-five dollars, by working it up into cotton cloths, investing the proceeds in cotton, manufacturing this cotton in the same manner, and thus carrying on the business in successive operations, can in 20 months create a product equal to $62,428,000. Astonishing, indeed! If this calculation be correct, what pursuit in the United States can be so profitable as manufactures? None can approach it; and therefore, in this view, the aid of Government would not only not be necessary, but the extreme of injustice.

But, say gentlemen, it is necessary to adopt this policy, with a view to render us independent of foreign nations. Sir, if by this he meant that we ought to have within ourselves the means of furnishing the necessary ships, munitions of war, &c., then we are independent. But, if gentlemen mean to say that we ought to be independent of all other nations in all those various articles which minister to our convenience or luxury, then it is equivalent to a declaration that we ought to have no commerce. For, what is commerce but an exchange of equivalents—an exchange of those things between nations of which they are mutually and reciprocally in need; and as to which, therefore, there is a mutual and reciprocal dependence? The true principle of political economy is this: make yourselves entirely independent of the world, as it respects what is indispensable to your safety and defence. As to every thing else, the single inquiry should be, of whom can it be purchased, so as that, with the same sum, the greatest quantity of equal quality can be gotten; that is, in other words, where can it be got cheapest? For, if we pay more where we could get it for less, one part of this dilemma is inevitable—either the purchaser is injured to the amount of the difference which the manufacturer receives as a profit, or if that be necessary to sustain the manufacturer, then the community is injured, by this forced and unprofitable appropriation of the capital of the country.

We have been told, however, that all the Governments in Europe which have not encouraged manufactures have fallen into a state of poverty; and we have had the examples of Spain and Poland presented to us as completely illustrative of the proposition. Gentlemen might have found a much stronger reason for the poverty of these countries, in their history and political institutions. Poland is now blotted from the map of Europe; but even during its existence as a State, we know that the feudal system was in full operation; that there was on the part of the nobles, the most aristocratic oppression and tyranny, and, on the part of the great mass of the people, the most abject dependence and slavery. The peasantry of the country labored not for themselves, but for others; they labored, therefore, without the only great stimulus to exertion; and, consequently, there was neither the industry nor skill which we find in a country where the people are free, and where they are protected in their rights of person and property. The feudal system once prevailed in Spain also; but even since its abolition, the Government of that country has been of the most wretched kind; their tax upon the exportation of specie made it less valuable than in the other countries of Europe, except Portugal; they greatly impeded the intercourse among the different parts of the Empire by a tax upon transportation; but, above all, the administration of justice was so imperfect as to protect the debtor against the demands of the creditor, and thus "make the industrious part of the nation afraid to prepare goods for those 'haughty and great men to whom they dare not refuse to sell on credit, and from whom they are altogether uncertain of payment.'

These are the reasons why these countries are poor, and why no kind of pursuit, and particularly that of manufactures, is carried on there with the same industry and perseverance as elsewhere. Look at the history of England herself, while the feudal system galled that people with all its fetters, and you find that manufactures, as well as every other pursuit, made but slow progress in that country also. What villein will labor like a freeman? None; until human nature is so formed as that we will labor with as much ardor for the benefit of others as we do when we ourselves are to reap its fruits. But when England had emancipated herself from feudal thralldom; when, by means of commerce, and otherwise, she had accumulated an immense capital; when, above all, she had, by her ingenuity and capital, first invented, and then put into active operation, the finest machinery in the world; then she took the lead of the rest of the world in manufactures. Have you any doubt as to the extent of the influence of her capital and machinery? As late as 1782, the cotton manufacture was among the humblest of the domestic arts, and did not exceed £2,000,000 sterling. We learn from Colquhoun that, in 1812, the product, including the material, was £29,000,000.

Gentlemen have conceded, that the proposed system would be improper, if it was not that the nations of Europe, and especially England, have pursued the plan of positive prohibition, or high duties almost amounting to prohibition, towards us, and they call upon us to imitate their example. The first answer to this is, what, I believe, has been already urged, that it would be strange conduct, because foreign nations have injured us by prohibition or high duties, we should, therefore, injure ourselves still more by creating a monopoly in favor of a part of our own citizens, at the expense of the rest. But let us now trace the course of the English policy, and the reasons which led to it, together with the point at which it has now arrived, and I think I shall be able to show that it ought to be avoided, not pursued. Governments as well as individuals seem, at times, to have their hobbies; perhaps there are few subjects in relation to which the hobby has been oftener changed than that of political economy, or the art of making a nation rich; at one time, the commercial or mercantile system is the fashion of the day; at another time, the doctrine of the French economists prevails, that agriculture is the only source of wealth; now it seems that manufactures alone can save us from ruin and bankruptcy. But I return to the English policy, and the reasons which led to it. During the prevalence of the mercantile system, the general idea was, that wealth consisted in gold and silver, and that a nation having no mines could only get them by exporting more than it imported. By the use of this kind of reasoning, persons interested in the monopoly of the home market induced the Parliament either to prohibit or lay heavy duties on importation; and those concerned in the foreign market also prevailed, so as, in some instances, to get bounties upon exportation. For some time this was submitted to, but, at last, the country gentlemen began to perceive these operations, while they benefited certain classes, were directly at their expense. With a view, then, to counteract their effects, they have, after struggling at different times, procured, as offsets, the following provisions: the total prohibition, except from Ireland, of cattle and salted provision, an exclusion of all foreign corn, unless when the scarcity is such as to raise the price to eighty shillings per quarter, a monopoly price, and a bounty upon the exportation of their own corn. Now, sir, I ask the Committee whether a system of policy can be worthy of our imitation, which, setting out upon entirely false principles, creates a monopoly in favor of one part of the community at the expense of the other, and then seeks to restore the equality by a set of countervailing provisions in favor of the injured party? Equality is the desideratum; you may, after having made one scale much heavier, restore the equilibrium by putting an equal weight in the other; but, if you put a weight into neither scale, the equilibrium has never been destroyed. Thus it appears that all which can be hoped for, after piles of regulations as high as Atlas, would be, by legislation to restore an equality, which, by legislation, we had destroyed. My course, therefore, is, to remain where we are, and not disturb the balance because we may afterwards restore it; if, however, we must imitate the English system in part, I hope gentlemen will give it all; a part of which is a bounty upon the exportation of their corn. If gentlemen will give us a sufficient bounty on the exportation of our breadstuff, that would restore us to our original equality. But, it is said that England imposes a duty upon our wool. Do not gentlemen see that, unless that duty is drawn back, upon exportation, to the United States, it operates to the advantage of the domestic manufacturer, by increasing the cost of the British article? And, if it be drawn back, then it is entirely neutralized. England, also, say gentlemen gives her manufacturers a drawback upon exportation; and, in some instances, a bounty. It requires only to define the terms drawback and bounty, to see that there is nothing in this complaint. The drawback upon the English manufacture is, where an excise duty is imposed by the British Government, which raises the price at home; but, as they cannot regulate the foreign market, therefore, upon the exportation, they draw back this excise, in order that their people may come into foreign competition, not encumbered with this increase of cost. The case of the bounty is, if possible, still plainer; it is given only where, without this aid, the articles could not, upon exportation, withstand a foreign competition. Any article thus situated, it is obvious, cannot injure the American manufacturer; that is, if the bounty be not too large; and, if it be, the British Government has injured its people in favor of a particular class, and then the argument is, that we must inflict a like injury upon the American citizen, in favor of the same class; an argument, the weight of which it is submitted to the Committee to appreciate.

We are warned by gentlemen that, unless we establish domestic manufactures, to the exclusion of foreign, we shall import more than we export, and thus produce national bankruptcy. That may, and actually has, happened with one or more particular countries. Thus, for a series of years, from 1805 to 1811, the balance of trade with England was against us, to the amount of upwards of $26,000,000 per annum. Whilst, however, this may be the case as to one or more countries, it is obvious that it cannot, for any length of time, be the case in relation to the whole circle of our commerce. If the whole of our exports for any considerable time should fall short of the whole of our imports, a debt to the amount of the difference would be created against us, which would injure us by affecting the exchange disadvantageously to us. It would injure our credit, too; and, finally, even if we would go on, it must stop, for want of credit; for, as individuals will not, so neither will nations, part with their property without an equivalent. But, sir, another effectual check to this is in ourselves. Amongst every people, as there will be some misers, so there will be some prodigals, who will run into wild and excessive expenditure; but the great mass of every community are governed by prudential considerations, and will confine their expenditure within their income; and if, from any miscalculation, they should outstep the proper limits, they have a perpetual tendency to fall again within them; accordingly, sir, you will find this hypothesis confirmed by looking at the report of the Treasury Department; from that you will find that the customs in 1815, amounted to upwards of $36,000,000; in 1816, to somewhat more than $27,000,000; and, in 1817, only to about $17,000,000 and a half; thus proving, incontestably, from official documents, that our imports were diminished more than one-half between the years 1815 and 1817. Let not gentlemen, then, alarm themselves with the illusory apprehension that, without this system, we shall bring on national ruin by excessive importation; the corrective to that evil may be safely trusted to the people.

The advocates of this bill, after having exhausted all their stores of argument in its favor, as applying to the general principles upon which they attempt to support it, have addressed themselves directly to the agricultural interest, and endeavored to show that the encouragement of manufactures, by legislative aid, is indispensable to the prosperity of agriculture. Whilst I feel obliged to them for the kind dispositions they have manifested towards that interest, I must beg leave, for myself and for my constituents, to say, that we choose to judge for ourselves as to the means of promoting our individual prosperity; and that, as we think they would, in this instance, (no matter how good the intention) do us an injury, instead of a benefit, we must be excused for declining their proffered kindness. But permit me to examine their arguments upon this point. They remind us of the present very low price of agricultural produce, and then tell us that the effect of the encouragement of domestic manufactures will be, to give us a sure, steady, and better market. In the first place, I would remark, that, if upon this point we are content, I do not see why gentlemen should feel so much uneasiness in relation to our interest; even more than we should feel ourselves. It at least does not belong to them to complain of the low price of agricultural produce, which I have already had occasion, in the progress of this argument, to show, operates directly as a bounty on manufactures. But, sir, the promise of a better market at home than abroad, is perfectly delusive, as I will now attempt to prove. It is agreed on all hands that, if this bill pass, we shall pay a higher price for manufactured articles. Now, sir, let me call the attention of the Committee to the relative price of wheat and domestic cloth, (which I some time since noticed for a different purpose,) in order to illustrate my present view. Suppose that I should even receive one dollar twenty-five cents for the bushel of wheat, for which I now get only a dollar; if, in consequence of this bill, the cloth, which I formerly got for twenty cents per yard, be raised to thirty, the effect will be, that, whilst the nominal price of my wheat will be raised, its actual value will be diminished; that is to say, the same quantity will command less of the produce of others' labor, which is the true test of value.

The Speaker has holden out to us a discouraging prospect indeed, in relation to our market for agricultural produce. He has told us that, as we now scarcely have any market abroad, our situation, in this respect, will be continually becoming worse; that our surplus will increase in the ratio with our increasing population, so as that it will be impossible for us to command a foreign market for it. Sir, the very foundation of the Speaker's argument fails in this, that our surplus produce will not increase in proportion to our increasing population. The principles of Malthus upon this subject, I hold to be undeniably true, that population has a perpetual tendency to increase beyond the means of subsistence; and that, whilst food increases arithmetically, it is of the nature of population to increase geometrically; that is, within given periods, to double whatever was the capital stock at the last preceding period. It makes no difference that, in this country, our population is sparse, and our territory immense. These circumstances only prove, that the time will be more distant when population will reach the limits of food, and thereby be impeded; but they do not at all affect the truth of the general principles; and, in our legislation upon this great question, this or the next year should not constitute our horizon, but we should look along the line of time, and legislate for futurity.

Let us, then, bring these principles to a practical test, by applying them to the United States. It has been computed, upon the best statistical data that we have, that our population is duplicated in every period of twenty-three years and a fraction of a year. Supposing, then, the capital in the present year, 1820, to be ten millions, the next period of twenty-three years would give us twenty millions, and the next, that is, in the year 1866, would give us forty millions. Now, it is palpable that our subsistence will not increase in the same proportion. I speak not now of the rich lands of the West, whose productive powers are such that, as far as they extend, they would tend considerably to supply the deficiency of the old States. Let it be remembered that the attachment which we feel to the natale solum is so strong, that but few of us emigrate to the wilderness who have a tolerable prospect of support in our native place. Under the influence of this principle, I think it would be a large calculation to suppose that one per cent. of our population emigrate annually; which, supposing the capital to be ten millions, would be one hundred thousand. The remaining nine millions nine hundred thousand, then, would remain upon the soil which they formerly occupied; and we know by experience that, without great industry and application, and without a meliorating system of husbandry, the soil not only does not improve so as to double its productive powers in about twenty-three years, but that it does not improve at all; nay, that it will be in a continual state of deterioration; the direct consequence of which is, that there will be a continually increasing necessity for more labor to raise the same quantity of agricultural produce; and if, even with the best system of husbandry, the produce of the soil could be doubled once or twice, no one will say that it could go on increasing indefinitely, like the population to be fed from it, in a geometrical progression. This, which is thus far hypothetical reasoning, may be shown to be a fact in the history of our country, by reference to the Statistical Annals of Dr. Seybert. From them it will appear that the maximum quantity of flour ever exported from the United States, was in the year 1817, being one million four hundred and seventy-nine thousand one hundred and ninety-eight barrels; that, as early as 1803, there were exported one million three hundred and eleven thousand eight hundred and fifty three barrels, having increased in fourteen years only one hundred and sixty-seven thousand three hundred and forty-five; whereas, to have kept way with the supposed increase of population, it should have been the result of a diversion of the labor of the country to some other employment, then I answer, that supposition equally well suits the purposes of my argument; for it proves that the people of the country know their own interest sufficiently well, without governmental interference, to change the employment of their labor and capital whenever their interest requires it. Let it be left with them, and the moment which is proper for the change will be indicated by their interest. As long as agriculture affords them the same, or nearly the same, profit as other appropriations of capital and labor do, they will pursue it; whenever it begins to fail to do this, at that precise point of time, without the Government keeping watch and ward, it will flow over into some other channel. Look at the clear proof that the people know how to change, and that they will change, the application of their capital and labor, in the Treasury report of the exports of 1819. It appears from that, that in 1819 we exported only 750,660 barrels of flour; whereas, as I have just said, but two years sooner, to wit in 1817, we exported 1,479,198 barrels. The Committee may rest assured that the capital and labor of the country were not idle, but were employed in some other way. And, indeed, sir, if gentlemen could even imagine a state of things in which we could not find a market abroad for one barrel, we could yet, even in a mere change of taste, find an obvious resource. From the same Treasury report it appears that there were imported into the United States, in the year 1818, 6,052,453 gallons of foreign spirits. We should only have, in the last resort, to convert our grain into spirit, and thus we should at once dispose of nearly four-fifths of all the wheat, the flour from which was exported last year. And whenever the time arrives that we have no foreign market, or from other causes, it shall become our interest to do so, I tell gentlemen we shall neither need the advice nor the coercion of Government to induce us to do it.

H. OF R.

Revision of the Tariff.

APRIL, 1820.

It has been said, however, and insisted on, with much earnestness, that agriculture has been aided by Government, and that the very bill now under discussion guards it by protecting duties. We are, therefore, called upon, in the name of justice, to afford a reciprocal protection to manufactures. One single fact, and the consequences palpably deducible from it, furnish a conclusive answer to this argument; it is this, that our agricultural products, particularly the three great staples of the country, cotton, flour, and tobacco, successfully sustain the competition in foreign markets. Now the only benefit which they could, by possibility, derive from protecting duties, would be in the home market; but to say that articles which, when exported, and when, therefore, they can derive no aid from this Government, can maintain themselves in foreign markets against the competition of like foreign articles, require that aid, in order to maintain themselves against the same articles, coming into competition with them in the home market, is, to advance a proposition in such palpable hostility with every principle of political economy, that it needs but be stated in order to be refuted. It cannot be necessary to undertake, by serious argument, to prove that, if either the price at which we can afford to sell, or the quality, give us the preference abroad, that preference cannot be lost at home, when, in addition to these advantages, we have the farther advantage of being exempt from the cost of exportation, and the foreign articles are encumbered with the disadvantage of being subject to the cost of importation.

Sir, I will not trouble the Committee longer. I have attempted to prove that the proposed system is incompatible with sound policy, because it will diminish the wealth of the nation: that it is incompatible with justice, because it will promote the interest of one class, at the expense of another class of the community. If I have succeeded in this, it follows that the bill ought not to pass, and such, I trust, will be its fate.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, addressed the Chair as follows:

APRIL, 1820.

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

Mr. Chairman: To complain is the strongest propensity of the human mind, and evinces the greatest ingratitude. We look at history and view the bright side only of the past; with confident hope we contemplate the future; but we endure the present with anxiety and regret. This predisposition is encouraged by others, who would convince us that their aid is necessary to relieve us from our embarrassments. The doctor must magnify the danger of his patient, that he may acquire the reputation and profit of the cure. This, and a confidence in ourselves to improve upon the wisdom or detect the follies of others, have produced all the projects, schemes, and innovations, which have agitated, embarrassed, and distressed the world. Whence those rank speculations which have ended in distress and ruin? Whence the Mississippi and South Sea projects, Mr. Law's bubble, and the Earl of Oxford's folly, and the other wild and extravagant schemes which threatened at once to inundate Europe and to involve the people in one universal ruin? From an excess of legislation, which tempted and provoked the iniquitude of the people. Nine tenths of the evils which have been inflicted upon mankind, originated in governing too much.

Look at the people of the United States; cast your eye over ten millions of freemen, spread over an immense territory, possessing every facility of soil, water, and climate. Inquire into their necessities and inclinations, and ask, what is the relief which they most need? and they will tell you, to be let alone.

Sir, there is not a country in the world where the three great branches of industry, agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, can engage in so equal a competition as in the United States. This doctrine of letting the branches of industry alone, has, by the Speaker and others, been assailed and ridiculed. But it is sound, legitimate doctrine. An officious intermeddling in the affairs of individuals; an attempt to regulate their ordinary employments, or divert their habitual industry from its usual channel, is equally impolitic and unjust. Every man understands his own interest and will pursue it. Regulate, therefore, the different branches of industry as little as possible—I say as little as possible, because I agree that the maxim, "let the people alone," admits of the following exceptions; 1st. Aid a necessary branch of industry in its infancy according to your means. 2d. Support that which is essential to national safety. 3d. Countervail foreign restrictions where you can do it with a prospect of success. 4th. Impose burdens for the support of Government. The three first are discretionary; the last is indispensable.

But as the Legislature of a nation cannot create wealth, and as every aid to one branch equally subducts from the others, it becomes us to inquire into the relative conditions of the different employments in the United States, and see what are the necessities of our manufactories, and what relief we can afford to bestow.

The pretensions of this class of people is urged in the most piteous strains. To read their petitions and hear the arguments of their advocates, we should presume that manufactures had been excluded from all favor, and cast off as an illegitimate. While you are fostering commerce and agriculture, say gentlemen, the poor depressed manufacturer is left to take care of himself. Is commerce, then, so very flourishing? Is agriculture the favorite child? No, sir. Agriculture gets no favors here. You have your Committee of Commerce and your Committee of Manufactures, who ably and indefatigably support those respective interests. But where is your committee of agriculture? Merchants and manufacturers were never over-modest in complaining or asking for favors, nor very delicate in urging their meritorious services upon the consideration of Government. But the farmers, scattered and separated from each other, doomed to a life of constant labor, have no time to complain. Nor are they remembered here, except when the Committee of Ways and Means seeks the avenue that leads to their pockets, and seizes upon the products of their industry, to pacify the importunities of manufacturers.

Sir, the manufacturers of the United States are more favored and better protected than those of any other country. This will be deemed a bold assertion. But I invite gentlemen to examine for themselves. Let them look at the British protecting duties, and deduct from these encouragements the poor rates, the excise, and other burdens, the British manufacturer has to endure, and then answer the question, has not the American manufacturer, on the whole, the advantage?

The Speaker has given us a melancholy description of a cotton factory which he saw unoccupied and with the windows broken out. Indeed! And I, too, have passed by several dwelling-houses of very industrious farmers that never had any windows in them; and the reason was, that the Boston and Pittsburg factories had been so well protected that these farmers could not afford to purchase the glass.

The truth is, the whole country is distressed. The manufacturers, from the encouragement given by the war, and your protection had been extravagant and prodigal. Rash, unskilful, and imprudent men, with nominal capital, had commenced on a large scale, and had failed, as a matter of course. Many such instances can, no doubt, be cited; and these are the cases of distress which have been so feelingly described. But when were the facilities to manufacturers greater than at present? One gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) has told you that your produce is rotting on your hands that your commerce is at an end, and you can sell nothing abroad. Another gentleman from the same State (Mr. GROSS) has given you to understand that manufactures will flourish when you cannot sell your surplus produce to advantage abroad. If these premises are true, the conclusion seems to be irresistible, that the present is a most favorable time for your manufactures.

In perfect accordance with these sentiments, the Speaker has contended, that want of capital was the root of the evil, and has given us an instance where great capitalists can succeed now with profit and advantage. In the course of his observations he admitted that there was a redundancy of capital in the United States, inactive and lifeless, and that the capitalists of Philadelphia had offered the Government a loan of twenty millions at five per cent; and yet the manufacturers cannot succeed for want of capital! Sir, I don't know how these contradictions are to be reconciled. Adequate capital and a prudent management will, no doubt, insure success. Money can be had on most favorable terms, and to any amount. It is, moreover, a fact, that the manufacturers have now protections and facilities that are not realized in any other country: yet they are not satisfied. The merchant whose ships are rotting at his wharves, and the farmer whose produce is perishing for want of a market, must incur new burdens to satisfy the cupidity of these manufacturers. And, as though nothing had been done, they ask for a little relief. A little relief! Then you have done nothing yet. Is your last tariff nothing? Is the modification made two years ago, to their full satisfaction, nothing? Pass this, and in two years more this will be nothing.

The object of a protecting duty is to exclude foreign fabrics, and to give a monopoly to your own manufacturers, or give them the advantage in the market, by raising the price and diminishing the quantity of the foreign article.

An entire exclusion is a tax on the consumer, and leaves him to the mercy of the manufacturer. A partial exclusion, or a rise in the price, has the same operation in a different degree. It is idle, indeed, to pretend that a competition at home will supply the want of foreign competition, and soon produce a depression of price. That can never take place until your market is amply supplied by your own artists—an event not speedily to be expected. In the meantime commerce is to be shackled, and the farmer to be subject to a monopoly which he can neither resist nor counteract. He has a surplus for which there is no brisk demand. He is consequently subjected to a home competition, which puts his own produce in the power of the manufacturer. By these high protecting duties, therefore, you enable the manufacturer to buy and sell upon his own terms. To buy, because the farmer has competitors; to sell, because the manufacturer has none.

I am aware that it has been contended, that the farmer and planter who produces the raw material, will, by this protection, find a better market at home; and the Speaker has told us that this will be the case, particularly in regard to cotton. But the cotton planters will scarcely swallow this bait. That the increase of your cotton factories gives an additional demand for the raw material in the home market is readily admitted. But, what is to be the effect of a tax on foreign fabrics, the raw material of which you furnish? Your cotton fabrics from abroad come charged with an additional duty; if the increase of the price is equal to that of the duty, it allows of a corresponding increase of the home fabric, and this will constitute a tax, which will fall on the consumer.

Should this be the case, the raw cotton will experience no diminution, but probably a small augmentation, of price. This, however, cannot be. By bringing the home and foreign fabrics together into the market, the price will not be increased equal to the impost, and the foreign manufacturer will find his profits diminish to nearly the amount of the increase of the impost. He must, therefore, if he can, remunerate himself for this loss by a depression of the raw material; as his capital and the nature of his fabrics will enable him to keep them for a good market, and the planter will be driven to the necessity of a speedy sale, a depression of the price of raw cotton will be experienced, which the home demand will not, for years, compensate. The result will probably be, that the price of the foreign fabric will be augmented, and that of the raw cotton diminished, and that the impost will be divided between the cotton planter and the American consumer of the manufactured cotton.

But, exclude entirely or partially the foreign fabric, by excessive duties, and you inevitably encourage smuggling. Make your laws as you will, they will be violated in proportion to the temptation. The severity of punishment diminishes the probability of conviction, and men will be left to calculate between probabilities of detection and gain. Although it would be paying a poor compliment to the morality of the people to extend this observation to crimes of a malignant cast, yet, as it regards evading revenue laws, experience proves that the remark is just. It is not from a relaxation of morals in merchants that this is the case. Merchants are like other men, and subject to like temptations. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) and the Speaker might have dispensed with their sarcasms on this class of men. Was it liberal to throw the odium of the proceedings of Castine, the Essex Junto, and Hartford Convention, upon the whole body of the merchants? Sir, it is with mortification that I am compelled to admit some disgraceful transactions in my section of the country; but I trust that such transactions are by no means limited by geographical lines. And it is scarcely prudent for members of the same family to engage in speaking of each other dishonorable truths. It may afford amusement to their neighbors, who would hear the mutual charges with a malignant satisfaction, but it will depreciate the reputation, and impair the harmony of the family. I might possibly indulge in a few retorts to put gentlemen on their guard. No portion of the country is without its faults. Even Pennsylvania, the land of Penn, of Franklin, and the chairman of the Manufacturing Committee. Pennsylvania, proverbial for her simplicity and unvarnished morality, has some stains upon her mantle. If I do not very much miscollect, something of an insurgent spirit was once exhibited, not far from the district represented by the chairman. Whether whiskey, or the want of it, was the cause, I don't remember, but it has usually been termed the Whiskey Insurrection. Another case, much later, of a spirit of oppugnation, was witnessed in the same State. I don't remember the particulars, but it related to a United States judgment, and a certain General Bright had something to do with it. It, however, was not considered as a very bright affair. And even the Speaker, had he looked at home, might have found instances of a like character, without casting a sneer at the northeast. I trust he has not forgotten the Washita expedition, and the interest that certain Kentuckians were suspected to take in its prosecution. Our memories have been refreshed on the subject at this very session. I will not proceed further. These are family faults, which should not be mentioned abroad. They are only hinted at here to remind gentlemen of the old proverb—"Let those who live in glass houses take care how they cast stones at their neighbors' windows."

But I as little agree with my colleague (Mr. WHITMAN) in his eulogy, as with the other gentlemen in their censure of the merchants. I was not a little surprised to hear his ascription of the payment of three or four hundred millions to the merchants.

There is no principle better settled or understood than that, with few exceptions, the impost falls on the consumer. The merchants pay it sometimes in advance; but, generally, after collection from their customers; they have no more merit for the payment than the collector who transmits it to the Treasury. The former, like the latter, becomes responsible for the tax, and it is much to their credit that they have responded with great punctuality, and that the Government has hitherto lost but forty-five cents in the hundred dollars by their failures. I wish I could say, that, after the money reaches the Treasury, it is converted to its proper purposes with no greater dilapidations. Merchants, as well as others, will evade the laws, when prompted by strong temptations. Such is man. "Lead us not into temptation," is an invocation prescribed by one who well knew the frailty and depravity of the human heart. It is even doubtful whether our best and firmest men would wish a trial of their virtue against some temptations. There are assailable points in every human fortress.

The depravity and misery which follow a habit of smuggling, are better perceived than described. If the Congress of the United States have no power, but by individual example, to inculcate virtue, they should at least take care how they indulge in legislation which shall encourage vice. Enact laws which public sentiment shall resist, or cupidity evade; let such evasion become familiar, and detection and punishment rare; let habit confirm what interest and inclination suggested, and it becomes at once an example and a signal to despise all legal restraints, and hold in contempt the authority from whence they emanated.

But this is not all; smuggling, to a degree affecting the market, destroys all benefit intended for the manufacturer, and throws the impost off the consumer upon the merchant. The smuggler can undersell him, and deprive him of the power to enhance his goods to the amount of the impost. The foreign goods being low in the market, the manufacturer has failed of his object.

When the protecting duty is successfully laid, it falls on the consumer. It ought, therefore, to be made to bear as equally as possible; to touch lightly on the necessaries of life; and by no means to impair the national defence. What, then, is the character of your increase upon coffee, iron, sugars, molasses, and salt? These, sir, are become necessities of life, and for the last year the revenue from them amounted to four millions. You propose to increase them on sugar, coffee, and sheet-iron, one-fifth; salt, one-fourth; rolled iron, one-third; bar and bolt, two-thirds; and molasses and castings, double. Is this equal? Iron is a necessary of life, and in a degree a raw material. A tax on this is borne by every farmer in the Atlantic States. Not a nail driven into the shoe of his horse, but is encumbered with the impost. It is also a tax on manufacturers of hardware generally. Why is it necessary? The expense of manufacturing a ton of bar iron, including a fair manufacturing profit, and excluding the stock of which it is made, is not fifty dollars. Add the stock, and you would not bring it above ninety. Yet these manufacturers ask a duty of twenty-five, equal to one-half the making and profits, and to more than one-fourth of the value. When the tariff was modified, two years ago, the manufacturers were satisfied with fifteen dollars, and they now ask an addition of two-thirds of that. When will they be satisfied? They will never cease to ask so long as you will continue to grant.

Sugar and molasses are manufactured in but small quantities in the United States, in proportion to the consumption; the land is cheap, and the planters need not the existing duties to insure them profits, and even fortunes. The people of the East have a large trade with the West Indies. Our provisions and lumber are exchanged there, principally for these articles. The molasses is distilled into rum; and this business, hitherto carried on to considerable extent, can scarcely survive the existing duty. This must be abandoned—and you destroy the West India trade, and drive us round the Florida Capes and up the Mississippi, a voyage equal to one across the Atlantic, to purchase these articles, without the means of paying for them. And for what purpose? To diminish the quantity of spirits distilled from molasses, and thereby give a bounty on the whiskey of the West.

But the most outrageous tax is that on salt—a necessary of life, which the poor man must use, even more than the rich. The existing impost is forty per cent. upon the value, and this must be increased one-fifth more.

But this is not all. Your fisheries are important to the prosperity and safety of the nation. Why does Great Britain give such an enormous tonnage bounty on her fishing vessels? It is the nursery of her seamen, whence her navy is supplied. Such has been the effect of this bounty in years of scarcity, that it has cost the nation one hundred pounds sterling for every barrel of fish. The bounty which you have given, is only intended as a drawback of the duty on salt. It has not, hitherto, proved an equivalent, and the balance is usually against the fishermen. This addition falls upon them without an equivalent; and this tax falls almost exclusively on the Atlantic States, and two-thirds at least on New England. New York derives a revenue from her salt works, and they are rented upon a condition that the manufacturers shall sell at a stipulated price. The West will never feel this tax. The Speaker may tell me, if he pleases, of foreign salt at Louisville. Very well. Coals also have been sent to Newcastle, and British manufactures exported from the United States to England, and sold at a profit. But these are extraordinary cases, and prove nothing. I ask the Speaker, or any gentleman from the West, whether it is not a settled and universal opinion there, that they shall make their own salt? These four millions, paid upon these necessary articles of consumption, fall almost entirely on the Atlantic States, and yet they must be increased. Sir, let gentlemen smile at our molasses and codfish, but let them not smile at our expense. There is an inequality and injustice in this, that is intolerable. Molasses doubled, and playing cards increased one-sixth only! Sir, I do not know but these are a necessary of life. They are probably an article of considerable consumption in the West, for whose benefit the tariff seems well calculated. Tax the bar iron: they will make enough of their own; tax molasses, and, consequently, the spirits distilled from it: they prefer whiskey; tax the salt, and, of course, the codfish: they prefer catfish. Thus, you perceive, the gentlemen beyond the mountains are very willing to impose burdens, from which they and their constituents are wholly exempt.

But this is defended as a countervailing system. What has hitherto been the success of your coercion on other nations? Your bill regulating the West India trade—what has been its effect? I do not rejoice, nay, I regret, that my predictions of its success have all been verified. I would not have begun—but I would now go on. It would be mortifying, indeed, to retract a system of coercion which, but two years since, was adopted with so much deliberation and unanimity. When the Speaker cites this case as an instance of the propriety of regulations, and of the inconsistency of gentlemen who oppose the tariff, he neither has me, nor proves his case. I opposed the measure, and the hopes of its advocates have been hitherto disappointed.

But what part of your tariff is to operate as a countervailing system? Ten per cent. on articles imported in foreign vessels is a distinct affair, and has no connexion with the principles of your tariff. It resembles a tonnage duty, which the Speaker considers so favorable to commerce. It is the first time, I confess, I ever heard that a discriminating tonnage duty facilitated commerce. This is a tax on carrying, which inevitably diminishes the value of the article carried. It helps the carrier, unless it is met by other nations with a similar discrimination; in which case, the carrier loses one way what he gains the other. The whole export and import trade is burdened, and the tax falls on the manufacturer, grower, consumer, or merchant, either or all, according to the circumstances of the markets. It may be in favor of the shipping interest, but every facility of transportation must be beneficial to commerce, which consists wholly in a system of exchange.

But how is this to affect your revenue? Upon the articles of first necessity, to which I have referred, there will probably be an increase, after deducting for the diminution of the consumption. This \$4,000,000 might probably be increased to \$4,650,000. Upon teas, spirits, wines, and duck, which produced \$5,000,000 last year, there is no material addition. Your first class, which you propose to raise from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and which yielded \$179,076 97, consisting of jewelry and other articles of large value, in proportion to their bulk, will be easily smuggled, and will furnish no addition.

The same remarks will apply to your second class, including silks and other valuable articles, which you propose to raise from 15 to 20 per cent., which afforded $2,916,828 75; and the third class, including hardware, which produced $1,916,906 20, and which you propose to raise from 20 to 25 per cent. The quantity regularly imported will be much diminished by a diminution of consumption and illicit importations, and, instead of a material increase of revenue on these, I should not be disappointed if there should be a falling off. Certain specified articles, such as ale, raisins, and red and white lead, had increased one-third, and cocoa one-half, and all of which last year yielded $226,129 77, might afford you an increase of $50,000. The other specified articles yield but a trifle, and at best would produce a petty sum. Doubling the duty on raw cotton will operate, as was probably intended, as a total prohibition, which diminishes your revenue $126,562 26. The fourth class, including woollens, cottons, and linens, and which you propose to increase from 25 to 33 per cent. with the regulations in regard to the minimum price, will create a serious depression. The articles included in this class yielded you, the last year, $6,201,049. The immense duty on all, especially the coarse cottons and linens, by fixing the minimum price so high, will, I am pretty sure, diminish your revenue to the tune of more than two millions annually. Your tariff, then, as it is, takes annually from your Treasury two millions. A considerable diminution seems to be expected by the chairman of the Manufacturing Committee and the Speaker; and we are told that the impost must be abandoned as a rotten system! A system that has carried the nation through prosperity and adversity, through peace and war, and under which, for thirty years, our population and wealth have increased beyond example, must be abandoned as rotten, and we are to be set afloat on the sea of experiment and speculation.

But, sir, who have made the impost insufficient? Why does it fail this year to satisfy the public exigencies? Because it is regulated more with a view to the protection of manufactures than to the protection of revenue. With reasonable and effectual protection to manufactures, the revenue would even now be ample. But you embarrass commerce, and discourage agriculture, to pacify the manufacturers; you mutilate and break down the system, and then condemn it as rotten. You tantalize and upbraid it for wounds which you yourselves have inflicted. You put the poisonous cup to its lips; you compel the draught; its deleterious influence paralyzes and prostrates its constitution, and then, with a malignant sneer, you detest the object for imperfections and impurities which you have communicated.

But upon what hypothesis is your impost to depreciate? Have gentlemen fallen into the opinion, so fondly entertained, that Europe is settled down in perpetual peace? And what is the foundation of this opinion? Whatever may be our wishes, however strong our hopes, surely experience is opposed to the prospect of lasting tranquillity. If war is not the natural state of men, most certainly it is the usual condition of the nations of Europe. Look back upon them two centuries, and, during the whole period you will not find forty years of general peace. Their relative positions and political condition are sources of almost perpetual wars. The balance of power, which they are always fighting for and never obtain, was never in greater jeopardy than at present. Uneasy, restless, feverish symptoms are making their appearance. The legitimates are trembling, and the people beginning to think of their rights. Europe appears on the eve of a convulsion, terrible, I fear, in its operations, but happy, I trust, in its result. If it were our duty to wish that the present condition of Europe should be permanent, and that the calm of despotism should be endured rather than the evils of a revolution, still we ask, what is the prospect? Look at Spain, look at the events in France, and the symptoms in Germany, and then calculate on probabilities. The scenes we are to witness, however distressing, will give an activity to the commerce of the United States, and, like those which are past, increase our strength, and improve our prosperity. Those who calculate therefore on commerce and revenue from a long and general peace, are contradicted by evidence and experience. Pursue, then, your old system; look at the future through the medium of the past; be guided by the compass of experience, and you are safe.

But, should we embark in this new speculation, venture upon this untried experiment, and, calculating that each nation, in perfect peace, is to repose upon its own resources, adopt this Chinese policy, what are to be your ulterior measures? Create a motive, force a necessity, and sailors, and merchants, and farmers, must become manufacturers, or quit their country. Pass this bill, and it is the winding-sheet of your navy. The flag of your country, the star-spangled banner, which has so often waved in triumph over your enemies, and secured to your nation such lasting renown, must be furled, stowed away in some garret, with worms and cobwebs, and your glory is to be consigned to forgetfulness.

I ask again, what are your ulterior measures? Abandon your rotten system, and what is your substitute? Follow up your measures, and, while providing to drain the Treasury, give us, at the same time, your means to replenish it.

Will you tax the manufacturers to aid manufactures? They will scarcely thank you for the aid. To take from a man as much as you bestow, confers on him no favor. If the manufacturers cannot exist without protection, they surely cannot endure a tax equivalent to the protection required. But postpone this tax, say they, until we have commenced, and are in the full tide of successful experiment, and we shall then be able, and as soon as we are able, we shall be willing to requite the favor. Wait, borrow some twenty millions to replace the bounties which you pay to manufacturers; do this in a time, too, when they have great facilities in the cheapness of labor, provisions, and stock; and, when the price of these articles shall double, as they probably will, what then will be their language about taxes? Not only forbear your tax, but give us more aid. We expect that that which you have furnished will be augmented to keep pace with the augmentation in the price of our articles of consumption.

The result is, that the deficiency must be supplied by a direct tax. It is inevitable. Whoever votes for this bill creates a necessity for a land tax. I solemnly declare that I never will agree to tax the land to support manufactures. We have heard much of the equivalent given us in the Constitution for slave representation. Our zealous advocates of restriction from the North insisted that the framers of the Constitution expected that we were to be compensated in direct taxes for slave representation, apportioned on the same principle. I did not then expect the equivalent was to come so soon. For myself, and the people I represent, I do not feel much gratitude for the favor. No, sir, I repeat it, so long as I have the power I will continue to protest against a land tax to support manufactures.

But, sir, are you sure the forcing system will not prove injurious to the manufacturers themselves? You attempt too much; expectation fails, and a reaction is produced. Begin when they least need it, and withhold your hand when the necessity presses, and the expectations which you have raised will end in disappointment and ruin.

For twenty years past your manufacturing industry has flourished and improved more than the other branches. I might again recur to the depression of commerce and agriculture, and urge, in detail, their wants and distresses; but the pressure is known and felt. The burdens on these are already intolerable. Manufacturing establishments are making a progress sufficiently rapid. Within twenty years at least one hundred manufacturing companies have been incorporated within the single State of Massachusetts; many of these with large capitals; and those which have been managed prudently have succeeded. I hope never to witness the period when our manufacturers shall hold the pre-eminence. Let the industry of the people follow its own channel, and all will be well. To transfer the people from one employment to another is an unnatural process; its success in this country very doubtful, and its result will be unfortunate, if not ruinous. Would you perpetuate your liberties, then encourage and inculcate that education and industry which will accomplish the object. What is the effect of large manufacturing establishments? Ignorance, faction, and depravity. The Speaker has given us an account of the discipline and education in a cotton factory highly interesting and fascinating. From his eulogy, I should expect that he would be willing to send a daughter there for a polite education. If cases contrary to this do occur, he infers that it is an abuse of the system. Sir, these suggestions are creatures of a vivid imagination. Had I that gentleman's magic tongue, I would give you a picture of the morality of great manufacturing establishments. "To rear the tender thought, to teach the young idea how to shoot," to instil into the minds of our youth the principles of freedom and the precepts of virtue and religion, in a cotton factory, a furnace, or a glass works! In that religion which is inculcated by inspiring terror you might succeed, for your pupil would always have a picture of the infernal regions before him.

This is to be the future policy of the West—the West, which presents unlimited demands for agricultural industry, must be converted into a vast workshop! Immense tracts of uncultivated land call for the labor of the farmer. Florida is to be ours, if we can get it; and Texas, we are told, is ours already. The last is described by the Speaker as so delightful, that, in comparison, Milton's description of Paradise is faint, weak, and insipid. Yet this Elysium, with all its beatitude, must be abandoned for manufacturing establishments. The children of the West, with bodies sprightly, vigorous, and elegant, and minds free and elastic as the air they breathe, are to be caged and cooped up in a dismal dungeon. Our sons and daughters, who are to become the fathers and mothers of a free and sovereign people, are to be instructed in the principles of liberty, in this pure and perfect school. You take the child, swathe and bandage the mind to direct all its energies to the important object of a pin's point or a needle's eye; you bend and distort the body, and crush down its energies; you subject it to the discipline and mechanical direction of a mercenary master; and this is to be the defender of your country and its liberties, and the parent of a race of freemen. Look at the manufacturing establishments of Europe; see the poor wretches there, doomed to perpetual imprisonment, inhaling a foetid atmosphere, with a body pale, haggard, and ghastly, containing a mind equally crippled and depraved. Witness the distress and misery which this system entails, and the faction and treasuries it engenders, and say, is it very consistent with our free Government to copy it?

That man is inclined to evil as the sparks are to ascend, that his heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked, is apparent, without the authority of revelation. Every day's experience proves the melancholy truth. Some favorite passion, some love of power, of wealth, of splendor, of fame, or some other love, operate as delusions, and act as syrens to lure us upon the Scylla or Charybdis, while we are navigating the dangerous channel of human life. Shall we direct the people into the paths of vice? Let man be poor, ignorant, and enslaved, he has yet one consolation while he is innocent. Let the storms of adversity assail him, to an approving conscience he can retire, as a shield from the storm, and a covert from the tempest. An awful responsibility, therefore, rests upon a Legislature which directs a nation's industry to those pursuits which lead to vice.

Sir, follow nature, and your way is clear. But the design of the Creator seems to be strangely perverted. When he was proceeding in his work, and had pronounced it very good, he seemed to regret that something was wanting. Not that there were no manufacturing establishments to fetter and chain the mind; not that there were no merchants to exchange luxuries and diffuse poison; not that there was no warrior to enslave and murder his fellow-man; but that there "was not a man to till the ground." And he took him from the dust, that his origin might point to his employment, and put him in the garden to "dress it." But man soon revolted; and it is worthy of remark, that the first systematic rebellion against the laws of God was by a combination of manufacturers at Babel, and that he punished their folly by confounding their language. This scrap of history teaches much. From that period to the date of your tariff, as soon as they have acquired the power, the ability to combine, the manufacturers have been building towers to overlook all other branches of industry, and overawe every government that did not subscribe to their demands. The manufacturers of the United States are young, and yet innocent, and it is important to keep them so. Give them the same power and the same temptations, and they will probably pursue the same course. The evil may be easier prevented than corrected; keep the three great branches of national industry balanced, each will be a check on the other, and all will be safe and prosperous.

But there is a branch of manufacturing industry strictly domestic, which your large establishments are calculated to injure and subvert. I mean that which is carried on in every farmer's family. Most of the families of our farmers make their own clothes and cloth furniture. This is seldom done in the vicinities of large factories. The enticements are so strong to congregate there, that the family is deserted, and domestic industry abandoned. The Speaker's rosy buxom country girl, whom he so feelingly described, going to market with her roll of linen under her arm, (although he seemed to think more of the girl than her linen,) is transferred from her father's house to the factory, in which school she would probably soon learn to dispose both of her bloom and her virtue. Although I am friendly to a due encouragement of manufactures, I cannot hesitate to believe that these establishments have a sensible effect to impair the species of industry of which I have been speaking. I intended to have given other views of the subject, but time is precious, and difficulties thicken as we proceed. We seem to be traversing a vast and pestilential desert. No gentle breeze, refreshing shade, or cooling stream, to cheer, nor sun, moon, or star, to guide us on our way. But all is dark, dreary, and dismal, as the valley of the shadow of death. I hope and trust we shall pause before we hazard an experiment so fraught with difficulties and dangers.

When Mr. H. had concluded, the Committee rose, and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. HARDIN moved to postpone the bill indefinitely, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 28.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act granting certain privileges to the Ocean Steamship Company of New York," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the benefit of Christopher Miller;" and "An act concerning the banks of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" with an amendment to each,—in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland, submitted the following amendment to the rules of the House, which lies on the table one day of course:

"Every discussion on any bill, motion, or resolution, shall terminate in five days after it shall have commenced.

"No member shall speak upon any question longer than an hour at one time."

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Manufactures be instructed to prepare and report a bill laying a duty of — cents on all spirituous liquors distilled from grain and other domestic materials.

The question being taken whether the House would now consider the resolution, it was decided in the negative—ayes 58, noes 66.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Græme Keith Spence, late a purser in the Navy, (allowing him certain discount, paid by him during the late war, in passing off Treasury notes received from Government,) was read the third time; and, after some debate on the merits of the bill, in which Mr. McCoy opposed and Mr. LIVERMORE advocated its passage, the bill was passed—ayes 67, noes 55—and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

The House then took up the bill to regulate the duties on imports, and the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of the whole House.

Mr. HARDIN's motion to postpone the bill indefinitely being under consideration—

Mr. H. rose and delivered, in a speech of nearly two hours in length, his sentiments in opposition to the bill.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I am too sensible of the value of time, at this protracted period of the session, to task the patience of the House longer than may be absolutely necessary to submit the views I entertain of this subject. When efforts so zealous, urged as they are both by the force of individual character and best talents of the House, are made to defeat the principal object of this bill, I owe it to that quarter of the country which I represent, and which is deeply interested in the result of this question, to contribute my aid in behalf of a measure which I believe is calculated to mitigate the national distress, and promote the national prosperity.

Besides the general principles which are involved in this subject, there are other considerations, to which I will beg leave first to refer, why this motion should not prevail.

I am free to say that I do not entirely approve of the bill in its present form. It embraces too many subjects, and presents a combination of objects which, I fear, will counteract, in the extent of its range, some of the benefits designed to be afforded to that portion of the national labor which most imperiously requires to be cherished. But, though it may be in some measure true, that the bill proposes more than the state of the country absolutely requires, the present motion does not propose enough. If the bill is too large, and calls upon us to do too much, it is no reason why we should do nothing. It is our duty to modify it, and adapt it to the wants and condition of the country.

And, though it be true, as has been urged, that we are now near the close of a protracted session, we should remember that it has been characterized by few of those measures to which the anxious eyes of the nation have been constantly directed, and that the subject now before us is one neither of the first impression, nor hastily got up. It has been before the people and the councils of the country for many years, and forced upon the reflection of the least considerate, by the pressure of the private and public distress which this bill proposes to relieve. The subject underwent a full investigation when the existing tariff was established; and the great error at that time was, that there was not afforded a degree of protection commensurate with the evils. The inadequacy of the existing tariff has been fully tested by past experience, and throughout the present session our powers have been invoked to supply its defects. We have already expended a week in investigating the details of this bill, which will be worse than loss of time if we separate without coming to a decision. If the protecting arm of the Government is to be extended to the national labor, the policy should be announced without delay; otherwise it may prove ineffectual for the object. Considerable capital is already embarked in manufacturing establishments, and if it be our interest to preserve it there, and to cherish its employment, it is indispensably necessary that we should inspire the capitalists with confidence in our policy, to prevent them from withdrawing it, or to save it from actual loss. If we fail to do so now, the remedy may be administered when the disease has sunk below its efficacy. A determination to foster this particular employment of the national capital, may prove effectual now, even with an inadequate tariff, when, without such a determination, it may be impossible hereafter to repair the ruins which might have been prevented by seasonable aid.

I am willing to unite with gentlemen in paring down this bill to reasonable limits, provided it shall be allowed to give abundant encouragement to the principal articles of public necessity, and afford ample relief to the exigencies of the national labor; but I will take it as it is, rather than get nothing. It is our duty to relieve the distress which pervades the country, and there is much greater danger, in my opinion, that we shall do less, than more, than is necessary.

I beg leave, also, to divest this subject of the particular character with which it has been ingeniously attempted to stamp it. To associate it with sectional interests and particular classes, is treating it unfairly, and resembles much more the indulgence of narrow prejudices than the pursuit of a liberal policy for national purposes. It is calculated more to increase a common evil than to promote a general good, or to conduct us to an enlightened decision. The object is purely national, embracing the best interests of all parts of the community. It is to promote a common end, for a common benefit; to cherish the national labor and capital wherever they may be found, and to conduct them to profitable and nationable results. If the encouragement of that portion of our labor which can be employed in the manufactures of the country, will not do this, it ought not to be afforded. I claim for them no particular aid beyond what may contribute to the good of the whole mass of our national industry.

But the tariff has been assailed also with great confidence, and particularly by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who spoke a few days ago, with so much ability, (Mr. BARROUR,) because of its revenue character. It is said it increases the rate of duty on foreign merchandise generally, including articles of necessity, because of the high prohibitory duties upon those which are designed to be more particularly encouraged, and that it will finally lead to a system of internal taxation or excise. I confess I have not much reliance upon this bill for purposes of revenue. I do not advocate it upon this ground. I value it only for the protection it would afford to the labor of the country; and I repeat my wish that it had been confined to this object, leaving the subject of revenue to its appropriate jurisdiction. I am willing to look to a system of impost as the chief source of revenue, while it is adequate to the purpose; but gentlemen must know that this cannot be the case for any great length of time. However anxious we may be to avert it, the day will soon come when this nation will be compelled to rely upon its internal resources for its fiscal exigencies, and it, therefore, becomes our duty, by a prudent foresight, to strengthen those internal resources, that we may be prepared for it when it shall come. How can we expect to rely upon a system, whose means are diminishing in the same proportion that our demands upon it are augmenting? The first fruits of the impost system were poured into our Treasury by a commerce the most extensive and prosperous, and our wants were those of a young nation, with a thin population, and cheap and limited institutions. But the growth of the nation has been rapid beyond example; our territory has been much more than doubled, and our institutions have become extended in proportion to the limits of our territory and population. We have raised armies, erected fortifications, and planted works of defence around our whole frontier. We have built and equipped fleets which are indispensable guards of the rights, and indissolubly associated with the pride and glory of the nation. In short, we have taken a high rank among the nations of the earth, and our expenses are necessarily more than quadrupled, and, in the nature of things, must continue to increase. But, in all this time, while our national progress has been upon this gigantic scale, our foreign commerce has borne no proportionable augmentation; on the contrary, it has been rather wasting away, until that which could formerly overflow your Treasury, cannot be sworn to half its demands. The tariff, however, so far from abandoning the imposts, proposes to extract from it larger means; but it does not do this altogether on account of the encouragement afforded to manufactures, but in pursuance of the express recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, who, with the enlightened independence which so highly distinguishes his public conduct, has candidly exposed the extent of our wants, and the inadequacy of the supply. I request permission to refer to his report at the present session, as conclusive upon this subject. The Secretary of the Treasury, after particularly exhibiting the ordinary estimates of such a report, observes: "Under all the circumstances, it is respectfully 'submitted that the public interest requires that 'the revenue be augmented, or that the expenditure be diminished. Should an increase of revenue be deemed expedient, a portion of the deficit 'may be supplied by an addition of the duties now 'imposed upon various articles of foreign merchandise, and by a reasonable duty upon sales 'at auction; but it is not probable that any modification of the existing tariff can supersede the 'necessity of resorting to internal taxation, if the 'expenditure is not diminished." The report then proceeds to recommend the present as a favorable moment to afford efficient protection to our cotton, woollen, and iron interests, if it can be done consistently with the general interests of the nation. Our session is now about to close, and we have not diminished our expenditure, nor do I believe it would be practicable or advisable to do so. I would be unwilling to reduce the Army or the Navy, and I know of no object of retrenchment which would not weaken our strength at home, and our respectability abroad. A resort to other means of supply is, therefore, unavoidable. If we should be obliged to draw that supply from our home labor, it might be drawn safely and efficiently, if we now, by a wise policy, render that labor flourishing, and save it from the deadly influence of foreign competition. The tariff does not create the necessity of this resort, but is auxiliary to the supply: it draws as much as possible from the impost, that it may be compelled to extract less from internal means, and, at the same time, it wisely augments the internal means, by invigorating the arm of our own industry, and keeping at home that large amount of national wealth which is now perpetually going out of the country, to enrich the foreign, and impoverish our own labor. Who does not see that any measure which tends to augment the stock of the national wealth, must, at the same time, increase the individual resources, and swell the national supply?

The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) has particularly deprecated a system of internal taxation or excise, and principally because of the expensiveness of its collection. I have no such hostility. I believe the people have less to apprehend from a system of direct, than one of indirect taxation. In the former they see and feel the weight of their burden; in the latter it may be multiplied to an alarming degree, before its enormity can be detected. A moderate system of internal taxes is the safest and most certain source of supply, and in its nature will always be less oppressive than any other. Nor is it by any means clear that it is more expensive than the impost. The revenue, in both cases, is paid by the consumer, who also pays the expenses of the system. In the case of the impost, he pays the merchant's profits in addition to the duty; and are not these equivalent to the expenses of a system of internal taxes? But, sir, unfortunately for the consumer, under the impost system, he pays nearly a moiety of his price for the benefit of the foreign laborer, and thus subtracts from the fund of public wealth, that which should be kept in circulation at home. I cannot entertain a doubt that it would be the interest of this nation to foster its manufacturing labor and capital, even at the risk of a temporary diminution in its revenue. The labor which would thus receive encouragement would soon attain the capacity to bear an equivalent proportion of the national burdens, and, by increasing all the streams of supply, ultimately enrich the public treasury. If it be necessary now for the Government to stretch forth its arm to shield this infant branch of the national labor from foreign rivalry, the day is not distant when, in its turn, it will give vigor and strength to the national sinews.

Having said thus much, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the objections against the tariff as a whole, I will proceed now to consider the general principles upon which, I think, its great objects may be maintained and recommended to our adoption.

I was fully aware of the principles of the writers upon political economy, which have been so earnestly and ably relied upon by the opponents of the tariff; and though I am by no means disposed to involve in a common censure these principles and their authors, they appear to me to be unsafe guides in this discussion, where they are not sanctioned by experience, and tested by the practical operation of national policy. Much of the numerous treatises upon political economy consists in plausible theories, founded upon a state of things which, in fact, have no existence, and, with regard to the most of these theories, the greatest difference of opinion prevails among the authors themselves. Among these numerous theorists each is the stout advocate of his own system, and the world has not yet finally decided between them. One contends that agricultural labor is the only profitable source of wealth, and that manufacturing capital is unproductive; this is denied by another, who advocates some other favorite branch of industry. A third is the advocate of commercial capital; another prefers the home trade; and the fifth contends for the superiority of a foreign commerce; so that scarcely any two of them agree, when they come to carry their respective systems throughout the details, and are yet litigating many of the principles which have been so confidently relied upon in this debate. Sir, it is the course of true wisdom in us to leave them to their employment, and adopt those principles only which we find in practical and successful use. With these as our data, we must adapt our measures to our own wants, and the actual condition of the world.

Now, sir, whatever contrariety of opinion may prevail, in regard to the mass of the theories upon this subject, there is a common foundation for them all; and that is, that the source of individual and national wealth is labor, and that the degree of the former will be in proportion to the activity of the latter. We may also disagree as to the particular mode of employment in which this labor will be most productive, but all will agree that it must be employed in some way. It must be made active; and, if necessary, must be stimulated to activity. The evils of an unemployed, inactive labor, are always in proportion to its capacity, and all the vices which follow in the train of an idle population will soon chastise a nation whose councils are inattentive to the employment of its labor. I am not the advocate of any particular branch of labor. I believe it is best, in general, that it should be diversified. I can have no idea of a nation purely agricultural, commercial, or manufacturing. Their interests are mutual, and the advantage of each is always promoted by encouraging, to a certain extent, the prosperity of the others. I am free to say, however, that, in the United States, the preference should be given to the agriculture of the country. This should be the basis of our strength, the great fountain of our resources, and in the nature of things it always must be so. There is, therefore, no design to change the agricultural character of the nation into a manufacturing one, as has been so seriously deprecated in this debate. Such fears are altogether imaginary. At least nine-tenths of the power and influence of this country are agricultural, and it is utterly impossible that a course of policy can be pursued, for any length of time, which shall, in any degree, subvert that interest. The agriculturist understands his interests, and will not be slow in resisting any serious encroachment upon them. In a popular government like ours, his resistance will always be prompt and effectual. Even in England, extended as are her manufactures, the agricultural interest is always predominant; and there is no instance, in all the struggles with regard to the grain laws, and other measures in which these two great interests have been opposed, that the agriculturists have not prevailed.

It is clearly among the first duties of a nation to make the labor of its citizens active, and direct it to the most profitable results. Not by undue means to stimulate any particular branch of labor, to the ruin and injury of any other; but to stimulate the aggregate of its own against the aggregate of foreign labor, and to protect any particular branch of its own labor against the rivalry of foreign policy. If a nation expects to become wealthy and powerful, it must exert itself to supply its wants by its own labor, rather than depend upon foreign labor for articles of the first necessity.

The principle is not only sound in theory, but is that which is in practical operation in every nation which understands its own interest. They sell all, and buy nothing with which their own labor can supply them. Let us look to the example of England. She is agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing. The state of her agriculture is equal to that of any part of the globe; her manufacturing interests more extensive than in any other. Her policy uniformly has been to cherish her manufacturing labor, as auxiliary to her national wealth, and to resist all foreign competition. It is manifested in the earliest dawns of her history. She began with encouraging the manufacture of the coarse articles which constituted her prime wants, and afterwards followed up her policy with an unceasing assiduity, until she not only shielded her own labor from the competition of other nations, but in a great measure crippled their labor at home, and became the source of supply for all the world. Have we not seen the effects of this policy diffusing themselves throughout every branch of her industry, and over every part of her empire, until by this means there has been reared up a mass of wealth and power almost irresistible? It is true, we have been referred to England for an example of the evils of what has been termed the manufacturing system and her national debt; her insurrectional temper and mass of pauperism, have been ingeniously urged in the debate. But these are not the effects of her manufacturing system. They are the result of the expensive wars in which she has been perpetually involved, and the insupportable weight of taxation consequent upon them; of a policy which has kept her continually embroiled, by intermeddling in the disputes of others, when she had none of her own on hand; a policy to which she would long since have fallen a victim, but for those abundant streams of wealth which her active labor continually poured into her lap, and which she so lavishly drained in the cause of her unhallowed ambition. It does not follow that we are to imitate her in these respects, because, like her, we afford protection to our home labor; and I cannot believe that we shall be likely to beget treasonable insurrections by rewarding the occupation of the citizen with ease and cheerfulness. Insurrections are the fruits of an idle, discontented population; they may be produced by the neglect, but not by the watchful protection of the Government. The same policy was early adopted, and has been ever since pursued, by France, Holland, Prussia, Italy, and many other Powers of Europe; and all who are at all conversant with their history know that similar effects proved the wisdom of affording national encouragement to national labor. The famous continental system of Bonaparte shows that he early discerned this real source of national wealth and power. When meditating the destruction of the British empire, he knew very well the source of her strength, and he wisely conceived the policy of drying it up. Had his ambition been tempered with some portion of patience, and he had consented to wait a few years for the gradual success of his policy, it would have been more omnipotent than his arms. His example, however, has not been lost upon the other nations of Europe; and though they did not yield to his schemes, Russia, and almost every other nation, excepting Spain and Portugal, have voluntarily adopted it. The principle of the Russian tariff is to receive nothing from abroad that she possesses skill and labor to make at home. Spain and Portugal are the victims of a different policy. They adopt the principles which are everywhere written and nowhere practised. Spain stands a solitary beacon to warn us of her fatal example, which buried the highest spirit and best capacity in the miseries of idleness and luxury, and drove her population to seek a remedy through the dangerous paths of revolt and insurrection.

If, sir, I may be permitted to refer, for a historical fact, to the book from Philadelphia, as it has been called, in which the zeal and ability of its author have imbodied a mass of the most useful and important information, the case of Portugal affords the most striking instance of the effects of both theories. Portugal did adopt the policy of encouraging her manufacturing, as auxiliary to her national labor, and those who are acquainted with her early history, will remember the success which crowned her exertions; but, in the midst of her system, she was persuaded to consent to the admission of British merchandise, as the price of vending her port wines in England. Her own labor immediately fell a victim to foreign competition, and her situation afterwards is the best lesson we can draw upon the subject. The efforts of England to prostrate the labor of other countries are not confined to Portugal—she carries them into every country, and she practises every expedient calculated to subserve her purpose. We know that her agents are scattered everywhere throughout the United States, and that they are unwearied in their exertions. In all their public speeches, the members of her Parliament betray their jealousy of our manufacturing prosperity; and, at the same moment that her hired writers and journalists* are employed to assail public sentiment here, by denouncing the evils and immoral tendency of manufacturing establishments, the Government heaps bounties upon them, and cherishes their growth at home, while they are sending their fabrics into all countries as auxiliaries to their writers.

I do not refer to the practice of other nations, however, merely for proof of the soundness of the principle of affording national encouragement to national labor; but, as evincing the necessity of our adopting similar regulations to counteract their policy. If the principle, that "things should be left to regulate themselves," be true, it is so only when all nations observe it; it ceases to be practicable with the rest, when any one disregards it. If we were entirely insulated from the rest of the world, and carried on all our transactions within our own country, it might be urged upon us with considerable plausibility. But we are a part of the community of nations; throughout which our intercourse is to be conducted, and all our exchanges made, and we are, therefore, sensible to the regulations in every part of it. If the same rule were universal among all nations, we might calculate upon an equal participation in all common advantages, and that our enterprise would push its own reward. But, if the regulations of other nations interfere with the natural course of things, if they obstruct the ordinary channels of business, and seek to confer advantages on their own labor which it would not otherwise possess, we must either adopt countervailing measures, or become the victim of their policy. We have already seen the extent of their regulations, pursued, too, with the express view of cramping the natural spring of our enterprise. If they receive the products of our agriculture, it is not to reciprocate the exchange, but, from necessity, to supply their own wants; nor are they driven even to this expedient, until the scarcity among themselves makes it indispensable, while the products of all our other labor are subjected to a perpetual exclusion. The effect of this policy, on the part of foreign nations, is to render our own raw products, in a great measure, useless, and to confer on the foreign labor a monopoly in our own market. These are unnatural advantages, which must be counteracted by similar encouragements to the home industry. If foreigners stimulate their industry, we must stimulate ours also; if they preserve a preference in their market, we must give to our labor a preference in ours; as they contract their want of us, we must contract ours of them; if they pursue undue means to labor for us, we must take care to labor for ourselves; a contrary policy would render us dependent upon foreigners for every thing, since, by their system of encouragement, they can undersell us in any thing.

The system is not a new one in the United States. We have always deemed it our duty to protect the home labor against foreign competition. Our duties upon the agricultural products of foreign countries were not imposed for purposes of revenue, but for the protection of our own agricultural industry. And although gentlemen may be disposed to regard these regulations lightly now, because of the peculiar condition of foreign countries heretofore, they are, nevertheless, indicative of the sense we entertain of our true policy; nor should it be forgotten that East India cotton is already imported into the United States cheaper than it can be procured from the Southern States; and that the day may not be distant, when the competition in this article will be much more formidable.

We have adopted the same system for the protection of the commercial enterprise of the country. The heavy foreign tonnage, the high rate of duties upon merchandise imported in foreign vessels; bounties allowed on the exportation of fish; tonnage and drawback granted to fishing vessels; the exclusion of foreign vessels from the coasting trade, and the entire system of navigation laws, are evidently designed to give a preference to American ships and enterprise, over those of foreigners. I do not refer to these in the spirit of complaint; far from it; the wisdom of the policy is apparent in its effects. Nor do I refer to them to show that, because we have done much for commerce, we should, therefore, do something for manufactures; but I refer to them, as demonstrating the utility of the doctrine, of leaving things to regulate themselves; as evincing the necessity of national protection for national labor, and of counteracting the effect of foreign competition upon our home enterprise, in whatever channel it may be employed.

But, if the encouragement we have already given be insufficient for the purpose; if against these the foreign policy is able to raise its arm and paralyze our energies; if, in short, the labor of the country is now idle and unemployed, and an extension of the system of encouragement be necessary to render it active, shall we stop short of the object, or shall we not rather afford it the utmost stimulus? What, then, give me leave to ask, sir, is the present condition of this country? Do we require witnesses to be examined here, or before our committees, to inform us of the want of employment, and the scenes of individual distress and public embarrassment which everywhere prevail, or are we to sit down and calculate in figures their weight and extent? We are assembled here from all quarters of this extensive empire, and every gentleman brings with him a knowledge of private and public suffering beyond example! The honorable Speaker, in the eloquent speech he delivered a few days ago, described to us the condition of the manufacturing establishments in the East, where all admit the closest economy is practised. But the East is not singular in its scenes of decaying houses, deserted establishments, and individual ruin; they are presented wherever manufacturing capital has been employed, and every one must see the ruin which has fallen upon thousands of our citizens, who formerly obtained their living in this species of labor. But, sir, I do not confine my observation to this class only; I invite gentlemen to look at the condition of the country at large, of all classes of labor, in every part, for it is to this sickening mass of general suffering that the remedy is to be administered. Consider the low price of property, as well real estate as every description of our products; look at the decaying towns and villages which are every where presented; at the thousands of the laboring classes of the community deprived of employment; at the numerous bankruptcies, which seem to blacken your cities, and fill them with dismay, and almost despair; at the mass of enterprise, and skill, and science, now enfeebled and borne down by cares, and weeping over a state of deplorable inactivity! Consider the universal stagnation in every branch of industry, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing! How is the face of this great country changed! Where late reigned plenty, and was heard the active hum of business, now meagre scarcity prevails, and idleness palsies the human energies; the poor are wretched, the man of large real estate lives only by the most rigid economy!

And what, sir, is the cause of all this? The answer is not difficult. The artificial state of things which succeeded our Revolutionary struggle, and which, with the stimulus given by our late war, has hitherto sustained us, has suddenly changed; the channels of our wealth are dried up; our labor is thrown out of employment by foreign competition. Give me leave, sir, to trace these causes more particularly.

Before the establishment of our independence, we relied for our supplies principally upon the labor of England, whose policy it was to preserve that state of dependence, and discourage all efforts in her colonies to manufacture for themselves. But the successful termination of that memorable conflict defeated her policy, and gave a new spring to our enterprise, and the same spirit by which it was achieved dictated a resort to our own resources to give it perpetuity. The subject was almost the first that occupied our national deliberations; and the report of the illustrious man who then presided over the Treasury, Mr. Hamilton, portrayed with a prophetic hand the true course of national policy. It would have been pursued long ago, but for those desolating wars which soon afterwards broke out in Europe, and which have continued ever since, until very recently, with scarcely any intermission, and cramped both the agricultural and commercial enterprise of those nations. Their population was drawn from these employments to man their fleets and fill the ranks of their armies; they had little time for the cultivation of the peaceful arts, and we became their growers and carriers. In such a state of things, the population of the country, at that time, found full employment in the agricultural and commercial pursuits, and in the multiplicity of handicraft and other employments, to which a flourishing state of those two great branches of industry always give rise.

The demand abroad exceeded our means of supply; we received high prices for all our produce; our commerce penetrated all parts of the world; every man found constant demand for his labor; and the capital of the country had a brisk circulation; we exchanged all our products for the fabrics of foreign countries, under great advantages, and increased in wealth and power with an unexampled rapidity. But a new state of things has taken place. Those wars have terminated, and the world is at peace. The population which filled the fleets and armies of Europe is withdrawn, and is now turned to agricultural and commercial pursuits. We no longer possess the exclusive advantages in these respects; they neither require our ships nor our agricultural products. Their demand for our surplus produce will diminish annually; for they are rapidly carrying into practical operation their policy of creating their own supply. We all know, too, that the India trade never did, and never will, require any part of our products; it deals principally in money, and operates as a perpetual drain of our specie. If, in connexion with these causes, we consider our increasing population, the result is, that our wants of Europe are augmenting and theirs of us are diminishing. As we can export less, we must raise less; we cannot employ the same quantity of labor, and all those industrious people who are occupied in feeding the demands of a prosperous state of agriculture and commerce are cast upon society without the means of subsistence. The result is, also, that, as foreign nations will not take our surplus produce in exchange for the articles for which we rely upon them, we must go in debt for the amount, and without any means that I can discover of making payment. The balance of trade against us last year was twenty-eight millions of dollars; and every one must see that, as the wants of foreign nations are annually diminishing, this balance must increase with the same proportion. What, though it may be true, as has been contended, that the present embarrassments may be occasioned in some degree by the inordinate extension of the bank capital, and the imprudent speculations of individuals, it neither makes the evils less, nor varies the remedy. If the distress be at all ascribable to this source, it is more because of the capital having been suddenly withdrawn from circulation, than because it was ever thrown into use. No doubt much of the individual embarrassment which now prevails would have been spared, if such an accumulation of bank capital had not been made. But it cannot be disguised, that this capital had become the standard of the business and transactions of the country, and, if it had been permitted to continue, the labor of the country would in time have redeemed it. It has been, however, suddenly taken up—a stagnation of business, scarcity of a circulating medium, sacrifice of property, and want of employment ensue. The necessity for the interposition of Congress is only increased, therefore; and, as we refuse to create a national currency, the duty becomes more imperious to provide another remedy. The remedy is, to foster the national industry, to create a market at home for our surplus, and to make for ourselves what we should be obliged otherwise to import from abroad.

We are here met by the objection that, if this necessity exist, labor will itself take the direction without our interference.

That the necessity does exist no one can doubt; it is palpable; it has existed for some years, and yet the labor has not taken the direction. On the contrary, a great portion of the capital heretofore embarked in almost every branch of industry, is now idle; the distress is progressive, and the manufacturing labor is retrograding. The memorials from all quarters of the country prove this. I can speak from my own knowledge of that part of the country which I represent—the manufacturing interest, which is by no means the least important. Of the state of manufactures there I could draw a picture, without the aid of imagination, of the most gloomy nature; suffice it to say, however, that more than a moiety of the labor formerly employed in these establishments, is now without business; that many of the establishments are actually suspended and that others will soon follow, without the encouragement now contemplated. I shall not deny that this state of things may be owing, in some degree, to the immense quantities of British goods with which this country has been inundated by the foreign merchant and manufacturer; but this only augments the evil; it is a striking illustration of the effects of foreign competition, in the continuance of which the British manufacturer, as well as his Government, has an immediate interest. The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) is mistaken, however, in supposing that the American manufacturer calculates his profits upon his war capital, though, if he did, as he was encouraged by his Government to invest it, it would afford no reason why he should now be abandoned in the day of his adversity. Such establishments, no doubt, feel the pressure more than others; but none are free from it, and even those which have been sacrificed at public sale, and passed into the hands of new owners, at reduced prices, are unable to resist foreign competition.

The truth is, sir, that labor and capital will not of themselves become immediately or extensively employed in manufactures, without the fostering aid of Government, especially in seasons of great distress. They are not so immediately productive in these occupations, and in times of pressure and embarrassment, men look, and are obliged to look, more to an immediate profit and relief, than to ultimate and permanent advantage. In times of extreme need our daily wants must be satisfied; we dread the slow progress of permanent success. Besides this, the changing from one business to another is always an affair of time, and has to encounter the force of old habits, and many other impediments extremely difficult to surmount. We see the force of habit constantly exemplified in the stubborn preference which is given to foreign fabrics, which we have long been accustomed to use, over domestic productions of an equal or even superior quality. The knowledge of such a prejudice, too, cannot fail to deter the capitalist from encountering it. The first impulse of such necessity would be discerned in the manufacturing in families for their home consumption, and even this is slow. But manufacturing establishments, which are to afford employment to the labor of the country upon a scale commensurate with our condition, require both capital and skill. Property of a considerable value must be purchased, improvements made, and costly machinery constructed, which are not adapted to other pursuits; and in the acquisition of skill capital also, as well as time, must be consumed. Agriculture may be pursued without much capital, and there are few who do not possess sufficient knowledge to cultivate the land, in which but little risk is required; but a failure in the manufacturing enterprise is frequently attended with entire ruin. The apprehension of their risks, in competition with the foreigners, whose skill has been matured by a century, and whose capital has grown up under the invigorating hand of national encouragement is, of itself, sufficient to forbid the experiment. It is, moreover, the result of the experience of all times and ages that the success of manufactures has depended upon governmental aid; they have never flourished any where without it. And if encouragement has been found necessary in other nations, and in early periods, how much more is it required in this country, where, in addition to the general considerations and intrinsic difficulties already referred to, we have to contend with the bounties and premiums of other nations, conferred with the express view of stifling our infant enterprise, and preserving their mature ascendancy. Such a rivalry is too unequal to be encountered. Without public aid the contest would be hopeless.

The case is fairly presented, then, sir, in which, from various causes, our home productions cannot stand a competition with those of foreign nations in our market; and in which our national industry is incapable of being stimulated by the rivalry of foreign industry. In such a case, the best writers upon political economy pronounce the interposition of the Government necessary. In such a case the most liberal aid cannot possibly do harm, since it only accelerates a state of things which it is necessary for the interests of the country should take place. Sir, it would be unwise to await the slow and miserable progress of our unassisted labor in such a conflict, marked, as it would be, by the evils of individual want and public imbecility. Nor, sir, can we forget our obligation to those who have already embarked their fortunes in manufacturing establishments, in the full confidence that their efforts would be cherished and sustained by the national protection.

The degree in which the encouragement shall be afforded is, then, sir, the only remaining question. I am willing that this should be measured by the capacity of our labor, and the obstacles with which it has to contend. But it should be sufficient to produce a successful rivalry, and secure the preference in the home market. I do not advocate the policy of prematurely drawing the labor from one branch of industry to another; by extraordinary encouragement, or by high duties, to create a capacity which is to be useful some twenty years hence. But, where we possess the capacity, which, by a due preference in our own market, would supply our consumption with those articles, with the raw material of which our own country abounds; there, I contend, the duty becomes imperious to cherish the capacity, and stimulate it to the highest activity. It is in this point of view, among others, that the policy of the friends of the tariff avoid the narrow construction now put upon the visionary theories of political economists; it is not entirely giving a new direction to the labor of the country, or creating new habits or employments at a great expense upon other classes. It finds the capacity existing; it looks to the direction which men's own dispositions and the course of events have given to the labor, and finding it struggling with a foreign competition, it steps in to its aid, cherishes its resources, and secures them the scope of the home market. But the relief should be prompt and effectual. If the first tariff had gone to the extent now proposed, many of the evils of which we now complain would have been avoided. It is no answer to say, that the tariff was then deemed sufficient; and if the manufacturers then believed it would be, it only proves that they desired no extravagant aid. One thing, however, is certain, that Congress did not fix the duties at as high a rate as was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the result has clearly proved its entire inadequacy.

Do gentlemen doubt the capacity of our labor to supply our home consumption with all the articles of prime necessity—the great object of every provident government? I refer them to the progress which has been already made, under all disadvantages, in the manufacture of coarse cottons and woollens, iron, glass, paper, leather, and cordage. In quality, they are, in all respects, equal, and in many instances superior, to the foreign article. Cramped as we have been, we have manufactured one-third of our cotton crop, and with the few hands which the owners of these establishments have been able to employ, they have supplied clothing for the Army and Navy, and gradually introduced their fabrics into most parts of the interior of the country. Of each of these branches of manufactures, our own country affords the raw materials in abundance, and for the raw material of iron, glass, leather, and cordage, we have no demand abroad. The raw material of iron and glass is entirely worthless, unless used in the construction of the fabrics of this manufacture, and are by that means constituted a new and exhaustless source of wealth to the nation. If, therefore, we depend upon the foreign supply for these articles, besides leaving our labor idle, we abandon this source of wealth at home, and pay a premium to a foreign nation, for converting unprofitable materials into articles of great profit and advantage to their labor, at our expense! And yet it has been said, in the debate, that our manufactures contribute nothing to the national wealth! Sir, let us consider the operation of manufacturing labor upon the wealth of the nation. It would appear to my mind to be a proposition too clear for argument, that a nation who labors to supply its own wants, instead of hiring foreigners to do it, as certainly grows rich by the operation, as does an individual who pursues the same process. If, instead of sending abroad twenty millions of dollars annually, to pay the British manufacturer for his fabrics, we should make them at home, by labor which would be otherwise unemployed, then if we should not save to the country that twenty millions of dollars, there can be no confidence in mathematical certainty. I invite the attention of gentlemen to a few calculations as to the effect of employing the home labor in this way.

England draws the raw material of her cotton, woollen, and leather manufactures, principally, from other others, and yet Colquhoun estimates her clear gain per annum, upon these three articles alone, deducting the cost of the raw material, at fifty-three million pounds sterling. This is the result of a system which buys the raw material and sells the manufactured article; but in this country, where we should work up our own raw material, which we cannot easily dispose of in any other way, the effect would be still more striking. We have already made sufficient progress in this country, not only to develop the capacity of our labor, but to illustrate its conduciveness to individual and national wealth. The able report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures of 1816, states that, at that time, 100,000 persons were employed in the cotton establishments alone, in the United States, and that of these, 10,000 were males over seventeen years, 66,000 women and female children, and 24,000 boys under seventeen years of age. They employed a capital of $40,000,000. They used, of cotton, 27,000,000 pounds, which, at thirty cents, amounted to $8,000,000, and they produced, of yards, 81,000,000, which, at thirty cents, would amount to $24,000,000, and yield a net gain to the country of sixteen million two hundred thousand dollars. It ought to be remembered that, of this sum, at least fifteen millions of dollars went into the pockets of these 100,000 poor people employed in the establishments, and blessed them with competence and honest independence: it thus passed into general circulation, and filled up the veins throughout the body of the nation. What, give me leave to ask, would have been the condition of these 100,000 people had they not been so employed? It is too plain that they would have been in idleness and want—rather the objects of public charity than the active contributors to public wealth; while, at the same time, the sixteen million two hundred thousand dollars would have passed out of the country, and gone into the pocket of the foreign laborer and capitalist. Let us extend the calculation to our actual capacity, and contrast it with the effects of a foreign supply.

Our exports of cotton, in one year, have been estimated at 90,000,000 pounds, which, at sixteen cents, would be worth $13,400,000; our labor is capable of manufacturing this at home; but if we procure our supply from a foreign country, we should take 270,000,000 yards, which, at sixteen cents, would amount to $43,000,000, and we should pay to the foreign laborer $29,600,000, which we might have paid to our own.

The same report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures states that, in the year 1816, there was invested in the establishments for the manufacture of wool, including buildings and machinery, a capital of $12,000,000; and estimated the raw material consumed at $7,000,000; and the increased value of manufacturing at $12,000,000. By these establishments, therefore, even upon this contracted scale, we made at home

$19,000,000 worth of woollen goods, which, if we had brought from Europe, would have cost the sum of $12,000,000, the value of manufacturing. Nor was the profits of these operations confined to the manufacturing labor immediately employed; the capital which erected the establishments and constructed the machinery enriched the mechanic, and that which purchased the raw material went into the hands of the agriculturist, which is an additional illustration of the universal diffusion of these benefits throughout all classes of the community.

Nothing can be plainer, sir, than that, by this operation of laboring at home, we add a clear gain to the national stock; and the force of the argument is not weakened by the remark which has been made, that it puts nothing more into the pocket of the cotton grower than if the articles had been procured from abroad. It takes nothing from him, but, while it gives greater scope and certainty to his market, it rewards the labor of other parts of the country which otherwise would be impoverished. And can it be denied that every addition to the general stock redounds to the common benefit? Sir, the wealth thus accumulated by the individuals, of whose immediate exertions it is the reward, does not lie idle in their hands; it goes directly into the general circulation. It becomes the interest of every class to render the earnings of their labor immediately and extensively profitable; they are laid out in procuring an increased supply of articles for consumption; in the purchase and improvement of land; in the erection of buildings, both of taste and utility; in projecting roads and canals, and in all those liberal objects of public improvement which accompany the possession of ease and riches. These again open and promote new sources of labor and expenditure. The agriculturist feels the impulse in the increased value of his land and estate; and, together with the merchant and all others, in the abundance of capital and facility of intercourse, the laborer and mechanic find full employment and liberal prices; specie abounds in all parts of the country, and ease and plenty crown the exertions of every branch of industry. This state of things has ever been the result of a flourishing state of manufacturing labor in all countries and times in which it has been cherished. I can assure gentlemen that I have witnessed the practical illustration of this system upon that part of the country in which I reside, when the stimulus of the late war had given life and activity to its industry, and put the establishments upon the banks of the Brandywine in full operation. And, sir, if I did not feel too keenly for those of my fellow-citizens who have felt its effects, and for the condition of a country, for many reasons dear to me, I could delineate the melancholy reverse which now enfeebles the hand of labor and paralyzes every species of enterprise.

Nor, Mr. Speaker, is the policy proposed by the tariff liable to the objection which has been urged of increasing the price of the articles, and thus operating as a tax upon the consumer for the encouragement of a few manufacturers. The manufacturers do not ask you to enable them to sell higher, but to sell at all; they do not wish you to raise the price of their articles, but to enable them to sell in our own markets, now monopolized by foreign bounty. The profits of the manufacturer depend no less upon the quantity sold than the price obtained for it; and give the American manufacturer his own market, and he desires no increase of his price. Nor could he calculate upon such an increase, when the effect of the policy would be ultimately to reduce the price in a considerable degree. The price of any article, whether of foreign or domestic product, must, in the nature of things, be regulated by the proportion of the supply to the demand. If the supply be abundant, the price will be low; and if high, it will be scarce.

The foreigner will always get for his article the highest price he can. The home manufacturer will do no more. It is this proportion which keeps down the price, where the supply is a foreign one; and why will it not produce the same effect where it is domestic? If we possess the capacity to supply the demand, as I have shown we do, the same principle will operate, and the competition at home will produce the same effect as that among foreigners, but it will produce even a greater one. Our opponents are obliged to admit, as especially the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARNBOURN,) who has ingeniously attempted to render it subservient to his argument, that our use of improved machinery places us upon an equality with foreign nations on the score of labor, and that in all other respects we have the advantage. If, then, the foreign monopoly were done away, we could bring the article into the market cheaper, because we save the expense of distant transportation. We place the manufacturer and consumer by the side of each other, by which means the articles are brought into market unattended by the costs of transportation, freight, insurance, and the profits of the merchant. But if I were to concede, for the sake of argument merely, that the price would be higher for a short time, it would be but temporary, and the increase of the price immediately tempting the further employment of labor, the supply would at once become proportionably greater. This temporary enhancement of price would not only be compensated by an ultimate reduction, but by an immediate addition to the national wealth, as I have already shown. These are the considerations which render the apprehensions on the score of high price worthless in the eye of the statesman who looks to the lasting and substantial interests of his country, who lays the foundation of her glory and independence upon a firm and lasting basis, and compares the inconvenience of a temporary privation with the strength and durability of her future progress. I am willing to submit to this temporary enhancement of price, if it is to be so, and I am willing to compel my constituents to do so.

But it is said, and with a seriousness which would indicate it as the chief source of apprehension with our opponents, that this employment of our labor will be prejudicial to our agriculture and commerce! From the considerations I have already endeavored to present, in the course of argument I have adopted, these objections would appear to me to be groundless, and in a great degree answered. But there are too many sound reflections establishing a mutuality of interest in the three branches of industry, to be slightly passed by.

I have already adverted to the condition of our commercial enterprise. We have already seen how very much it has been circumscribed, and that, without the recurrence of events which we cannot reasonably anticipate, it can never expand to its former dimensions. In contracting our wants of foreign labor, therefore, in the extent to which I have limited my views, and in exercising, of our own manufacture, articles of the first necessity, we do not abridge the commercial enterprise—we simply employ the labor, which it cannot do, without injury to the nation, and we leave it an ample range for all its means, in that portion of the foreign trade with which we cannot now, and perhaps never can dispense. Sir, this abridgment in the commercial trade will take place without the tariff. We cannot long endure the destructive balance of trade we have already seen accumulating. We shall be driven to contract our wants by lessening our consumption; our inability to pay for them will oblige us to curtail our foreign importations, whether we pass this tariff or not.

But if we labor at home, as we increase our means we shall increase our ability to use those articles of luxury, for which we rely upon the foreign trade, and thus continually enlarge the sphere of commercial capital, and give a new spring to its activity.

The commercial labor and capital will also find additional employment in an enlarged coasting trade, to which an improved home market would give rise, and we cannot be unmindful that, in our future progress, it may become our privilege to sell to others the articles which we are now compelled to buy from them. The day is not distant when the South American market will open to us a vent for all our surplus, in which, with the fostering aid of our Government, we may sustain a rivalry with every other nation. In such an event, our commercial activity would have the most ample scope.

But, Mr. Speaker, the interest of the agriculturist in the success of the manufacturing labor, appears to me so manifest that I cannot suppress my surprise, that ingenuity itself has been able to frame an objection upon this part of the subject. The benefits conferred upon the agricultural interest have served, more than any thing else, to fix my conviction in favor of this tariff.

I have already adverted to the present depressed and embarrassed state of our agriculture, and have endeavored to show the general spirit of energy and exertion which the accumulation of wealth, by the employment of the home labor must produce, and the manner in which its first spring would be felt by the agricultural interest. As the agricultural labor is at the end of the foundation of every other, it is the first to share in their prosperity; the success of manufactories cannot subdue it from the labor employed in agriculture, as has been argued, and must, therefore only impart new vigor to its energies. The national encouragement, confined to the objects which I have specified, would do no more than employ that portion of labor which the weakness of the demand renders useless in agricultural pursuits, and the manufactures alluded to would be conducted principally by new labor, or labor that could not be otherwise employed, but would be idle and unproductive. We have seen that labor in manufacturing establishments consists, for the most part, in machinery, and women and children, and, in addition to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) demonstrating the wonderful effect of machinery, it may be observed, that the use of it is a clear addition to the national labor, requiring no expense to support it. The use of this powerful auxiliary, breaks up all the foundations upon which the old objection rests, that, in new countries and a thin population, manufactures are injurious. The employment of women and children open to the farmer new sources of profit, by offering new occupations to his family, and contributing to their subsistence. I do not admit the dangerous influence of such occupation upon the morals of the children. There is no sound theory which authorizes us to infer that constant employment, rather than idleness and poverty, injures the moral character; and my own observation directly contradicts the assertion. I do not believe there is any district of country in which there is less vice and criminality, than in the manufacturing establishments in the vicinity of my residence, and particularly those located upon the Brandywine. In these establishments there are hundreds of poor children employed, and I am sure that the utmost attention is paid to their moral habits, and a system of schools and education have been founded, through the liberality of their employers, which yield them a fund of instruction which they could never hope to acquire from the poverty of their parents.

But even if a few hands should be taken from the agricultural pursuits, no injury could result from it. We already raise more than we can send abroad, and the effect would only be to improve the soil, and raise more from fewer acres, and with less labor, and of consequence with greater profit; a system of cultivation which, I believe, it is the interest of every agriculturist to pursue. We cultivate too much poor land, and waste our labor upon an impoverished soil.

The great interest, however, which the agriculturist has in the success of manufactures, is the home market which they afford for his surplus products; a consideration in which is involved every motive which is calculated to invigorate agricultural labor, and secure the national independence.

The home market is both of greater scope and of much more certainty than the foreign market; it increases with the growth of the country, and enlarges with the sphere of our wants. If we drew our supplies from our own manufacturing labor, the demand for the raw material and the agricultural product, would preserve the proper proportion, and insure their consumption without a dependence upon foreign demand. The state of a foreign market depends upon the wants and policy of foreign interests, never favorable to ours, and often conflicting with them. It is completely at the mercy not only of the disputes of foreign nations with us, but also of their particular relations among themselves, which we cannot either avert or control. If our market is abroad, the arrival of every ship will produce a fluctuation, and either reduce our prices, or raise them, to be again suddenly depressed, baffling the most prudent calculations of the farmer. If it is at home, the varying course of foreign policy cannot affect it; things flow on in an even channel, and the labors of the agriculturist and manufacturer mutually cheer each other, and impart new vigor to the home labor.

I do not attach any weight to the argument which urges the inadequacy of the home market. If the branches of manufactures, to which I have principally adverted, were in full operation, their labor would rely entirely for their supply upon the agricultural class, instead of raising for themselves, as they are now compelled to do from necessity; and they would certainly consume and require as much as the foreign labor. The consideration applies with peculiar force to the United States, where the agricultural labor, from the great diversity of soil and climate, find the best profit in the production of articles peculiarly adapted to the manufacturing demand. The demand of the agriculturist for the products of the woollen, cotton, iron, and glass manufacturer, of the maker of paper and leather, of the hatters, fullers, and dyers, and the numerous other trades connected with these, is extensive and constant, and it is impossible to suppose that all these, when in full operation, will not furnish a complete market for the agricultural produce which will, of necessity, be adapted to the demand, by which means a market would be afforded for many of the agricultural products in a much greater extent than could be otherwise expected, such as the ores of iron and glass, coal, fuel of all kinds, vegetables, dye-stuffs, and grain itself, where it is used in some branches of manufacture for other than the purpose of food. There would also be an increased and increasing demand, by multiplying the number of consumers by emigration from foreign countries, and by increasing the capacity to consume. Men live in proportion to their means—abundance flows in the train of riches, and the consumption is always in proportion to the wealth of the consumers.

But the home market will also be more permanent, since it will always depend upon our own wants and condition. Foreign nations possess both the disposition and ability to depress our agricultural labor; and though gentlemen now affect to attach more importance to the apprehension of their capacity to undersell us in our own market, they should not overlook a danger much more imminent and equally fatal—their capacity to dispense with our productions in their market. When such an event, to which the whole scope of foreign policy is tending, shall happen, the importance of the home market will be taught by a necessity which a wise foresight should now provide against.

I have already adverted to the redundant population which the present state of Europe will necessarily employ in agricultural pursuits, which are presented in the wide scope of territory which each of those Powers possess. England herself has much land which she may yet reduce to cultivation, so that every year they will diminish their wants of our supply. I entreat gentlemen from the South to consider the argument, in regard to the single article of cotton, as illustrating its fullest force. Foreign nations are annually taking less of this article from the United States, and using every means in their power to dispense with our supply altogether. Even England, from whom we must procure our fabrics, unless we determine to work for ourselves, is annually increasing her supply from India and Brazil, and lessening it from us; and it will be observed, by a reference to Seybert's Statistics, that, while her importations from the United States are nearly stationary, those from India and Brazil are quadrupled, and yet we hesitate to provide a market at home, and counteract a foreign policy which rears its industry upon the ruins of our prosperity! Foreigners rival us in the raw material of cotton, wool, iron, glass, and paper; they render ours useless at home by refusing to receive them from us, and yet compel us to pay them for working up their own for our use!

The home market would reconcile the interests of every section of the Union, and convert the only diversities which ought ever to exist in this country—those of soil and climate—into common blessings and sources of national prosperity. By it the three great branches of industry would equally redound to the general good; they would be united by the same bond and labor for the same purpose; their profits would flow in a common channel, and fructify a common country.

Suppose it should be conceded, as has been contended, that the manufacturing establishments would be principally located in the Eastern and Middle, and some of the Western States; their dependence upon the South for the supply of the raw material would necessarily produce a common interest throughout the whole. The cotton, wool, indigo, hemp, rice, and sugar, of the South and West, would be exchanged for the manufactured productions of the other parts of the Union, and thus produce a course of trade equally beneficial to all parts of the community, and not less profitable than any foreign commerce upon which we can calculate.

If I had not already consumed more than my share of the time of the House, I could easily show the superior advantages of the employment of capital in the home trade, to the extent now contemplated, referring to both England and France for an illustration. It will be sufficient, however, merely to glance at the course of such a trade in the United States. The merchant at Charleston, for example, would lay out a capital of twenty thousand dollars in produce purchased of the Western farmer, which he would sell to the planters of the South for cotton worth twenty-four thousand dollars. This he would ship to the Eastern or Middle States, and exchange it for twenty-eight thousand dollars worth of manufactured articles, with which the demands of the South would be supplied. It must be perceived at once that, in every step of this progress, the home labor is stimulated; the industry of our own citizens in the North, South, and West, is equally benefited to the full amount of the capital employed, which is kept rapidly and constantly circulating. But if the merchant of Charleston should exchange his Western produce or Southern cotton in Europe, for foreign goods, the labor of this country would be benefited only to the extent of his profits, and his capital would be employed as much for the benefit of foreigners as that of our citizens, of which we are every day feeling the evil effects. We are sensible of the evil, and we cannot mistake the remedy.

We possess a country highly favored by Providence, filled with resources ample for all our wants. It is for us to adopt a system of policy which shall draw them forth, and make them active, and which shall protect the home labor against foreign competition, and which shall provide the home market accessible by roads and canals.

I owe the House an apology for having consumed so much time, and will only repeat my hope that the motion may not prevail.

Mr. LOWNDES said, that, after the view which had been taken of the question before the House by his friends who had already spoken, he should not attempt a systematic exposition of the grounds of his vote; because, in doing so, he would be obliged to employ arguments which they had stated more clearly and strongly than he could do. On this account his observations must be very desultory.

The question was not whether manufactures were useful; a great deal of trouble had been taken to prove what nobody denied. Nor was it even the question, whether it was the policy of the Government to encourage them by duties upon foreign importations. His friends had shown, by arguments which had not been answered, that that employment of industry which afforded the most profit to the individual, would ordinarily conduce most to the wealth of the State, and that the duties or prohibitions which should direct any portion of the labor of the country to a business which it could not otherwise engage in, would usually be found to substitute a less profitable employment for one which was more so. If they are right, the present bill, which proposed a large additional encouragement to particular branches of industry, must be entirely indefensible; but, if there were doubt as to the correctness of opinions, (which they held in common with every political economist, to whose work time had given its sanction,) this doubt was enough to dissuade the House from further interference on a subject on which they had, perhaps, already gone too far. While his principal object would be to show that the encouragement already afforded was as great as could reasonably be granted, he wished, before he engaged in an inquiry into the degree of encouragement, to advert to some general principles which he supposed to be involved in the discussion.

The gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE,) whose argument he had heard with as much attention and pleasure as any of those who most fully concurred in his opinions, had proposed no partial or sectional objects. He wished to encourage the industry of the nation; to raise the value of labor and capital employed in every pursuit. This was very patriotic, but very impracticable. We cannot create capital. We are not magicians or alchemists. We can do no more than to produce a change in the distribution of labor among the different employments of life; and, if we increase the profits of any branch of industry by our legislation, it must be by taking from one class what we give to the other. Perhaps the general good might be promoted by such an act, (he was not now entering into this question;) perhaps the class at whose expense the interests of another class were to be promoted, might ultimately be indemnified for a temporary sacrifice; but the expectation must be utterly illusory, that a bounty could be given to any branch of industry without, at least, a temporary sacrifice by some others.

It was plain that the defence of the bill before the House implied that the industry employed in manufactures at home, should be more encouraged by the Government than that which was engaged in procuring for us the produce of foreign countries, in exchange for the labor or produce of our own. The first was called the home industry, and the phrase had no small influence in the discussion. In purchasing commodities imported from abroad, we are supposed to encourage principally the industry of a foreign State. Plausible as this view might appear, he thought that even a slight examination of the subject would show that manufactures and commerce might be equally productive, and might equally encourage "home industry."

Between the results of commercial and manufacturing industry, the difference is not as great as it has been represented. In manufactures a material of inferior value receives a change in its form which adds greatly to its utility. The fabrication which is completed in our country affords a profit, which is equal to the difference in value between the raw material and the manufactured article, after deducting the expense of manufacture. In commerce a material of inferior value is carried abroad, and converted into an article (or exchanged for one) which to us is much more valuable. The conversion affords us, as in the first case, a profit, which is equal to the difference in value between the original article and the exchanged product, after deducting the expense of the exchange. If a thousand people, in a corner of our country, make among them all the provisions which they consume, and in addition to these furnish, by their industry, one hundred thousand dollars worth of broad cloth, it does not appear that they add more to the wealth of the State than the same number of people would do distributed among the employments of merchants, sailors, and farmers, who, after supporting themselves, should exchange the surplus productions of a part of them (enhanced in value by the other part which transports and exchanges them) for the same amount of one hundred thousand dollars in broad cloth, the same value of the same article. If, by high duties or by positive laws we could force these merchants and seamen to stay at home, and their capital and industry should produce, as before, the one hundred thousand dollars worth of broad cloth, the article, although fabricated in the country, would not more be the result of American industry (for the purpose of this argument) than if it had been obtained by the other process of maritime adventure. It is quite natural to consider the foreign manufacture as entirely the product, and its purchase as the encouragement of foreign industry. But how did we get it? Whatever may be the amount of foreign fabrics which are spread over our country, if it be the industry of Europe which produces, it is the industry of America which acquires them.

APRIL, 1820.

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

The industry employed in commerce, then, is American industry, and the acquisition even of foreign fabrics is the result of American industry and its encouragement. He should have an opportunity of illustrating this view when he came to treat of a branch of trade which the bill before the House proscribed—he meant the East India trade. He could, for the present, observe only that the importation of foreign fabrics acquired by American industry, if they were furnished at a lower price than our manufacturers could afford to sell at, produced the same loss and the same benefit as the introduction of any new machinery, or of any simpler process which would lessen the expense of fabrication. In employing the saw mill or the spinning jenny, we acted upon the same principle of getting what we wanted as cheap as we could, and we produced the same distress in throwing out of employment the persons whose ruder industry could not stand this new competition. There was one admission, however, which he frankly made; the effect upon home industry was the same of improved machinery or of foreign trade—but the trade which benefited ourselves benefited also the country, whose wants we supplied, or whose products we consumed. Let this objection have whatever weight it was entitled to. Its principle was not so much anti-commercial as anti-social.

In encouraging, then, the manufactures of the country by duties upon importation, his friend from Delaware would do the very thing which he meant to avoid—he would promote one branch of American industry at the expense of another. But whether this control of individual industry was right, he meant to leave to the arguments of his friends from Virginia. It had been said that the plan of encouraging particular branches of industry had been applied to commerce as well as manufactures. This was no decisive recommendation of it. If the nation had been taxed to encourage commerce, it was a poor indemnity, (it was not exactly a compensation of errors,) that it should be taxed for the support of manufactures. There was, too, some little difference between the two cases. Taxes for the support of Government were laid upon commerce; these were paid by the consumers of foreign merchandise, and whatever the expenses on account of commerce may have been, they were expenses which commerce herself was made to pay. The merchant, or the purchaser of foreign articles, received, if you please, some relief from the credit which was allowed upon the payment of duties; but he certainly received nothing from contributions which were paid by any other class in the community.

Exclusive advantages, indeed, have been given to the navigating interest. The principal interest of it was the monopoly of the coasting trade. This was connected with considerations of defence, not of profit—to support not our merchants, but our navy. But what was the extent of the bounty? In the direct trade with the first navigating country in the world (England) our ships obtained, without any discrimination in the duties, the larger part of the navigation. Could the ships of foreign nations, unable successfully to compete with ours in foreign trade, have carried on the coasting trade on lower terms than our own? No other interest has contributed a bounty to commerce, and the discrimination in favor of American navigation, in the only instances in which it could be expected to operate, (if it ever operated at all,) was a discrimination of ten per cent.

The encouragement of manufactures in the mode proposed, whether the thing were right or wrong, must produce two effects—the one, that of withdrawing labor and capital from commerce or agriculture, and thus enlarging the whole amount employed in manufactures—the other, that of effecting the distribution of labor and capital among the different branches of manufactures themselves. He would say nothing of the first effect, but the second must be allowed to be one of unmixed injury. Admit that it is our interest to manufacture articles which we could procure at cheaper rates from abroad, it must be still more our interest to manufacture such as prove themselves adapted to our circumstances by being able to bear foreign competition. Our capital and labor are limited, and, in directing the largest amount of these into branches which require most encouragement, we really divert them from those into which they would flow with most advantage. Thus, every branch of industry which is entirely safe from foreign competition, and in respect to which protecting duties may be considered as nominal, must be injured by the encouragement of those which draw from them their resources of capital and labor. We have many branches of industry among those which may be expected to be first established in every country, which seem not to be more prosperous now than they were thirty years ago, nor are the articles which they furnish by any means at so low a price. What are called the mechanic arts are generally in this class. Why is this so? Because Government, in fact, bids against them; because the operation of this system of duties must be relative, and, in encouraging one branch of industry, we necessarily discourage another. Look at the iron manufactory as a proof of this. It is said to want yet further encouragement, recently as the duties have been raised, and, it is true, (he had the proof of it upon his table,) that the profits of the iron-master were greater before the Revolution than they had been for some past years; greater when our capital and population were small, and foreign competition unrestricted, than when all these circumstances were changed in our favor. To all that industry, whether agricultural or manufacturing, which is safe from foreign competition, the system of "encouraging domestic industry" can give no advantage, but it must share in the burden without participating in the profits. We exported the last year, he believed, manufactured goods to the amount of three millions. The establishments which furnished these could not gain by duties upon importation; but their expenses would be increased, though their profits could not.

Mr. L. enlarged for some time upon this subject, and attempted to show that the system of laying a high duty upon every process of manufacture must frequently produce this effect; that, to encourage a manufacture which employs but a small number of hands, and is comparatively unimportant, we may raise so high the price of an article which supports the industry and subserves the comfort of a large class of the community, as to produce general inconvenience. He appealed not to theory but to fact. We were anxious in 1816 to encourage the rolling of copper. We did so, and laid a duty upon copper in sheets. Our plan has, in part, succeeded. Two establishments have been maintained, which are said to employ fifty-four workmen; and it is computed that four thousand industrious men, the braziers who work up this copper, (whose industry even began to furnish articles for exportation,) have suffered heavy and general injury, which has extended to all their customers—to a large portion of the community.

The view on which peculiar reliance appeared to be placed for the defence of this bill was that which was connected with the alleged failure of our policy hitherto in respect both to the industry and revenue of the country. He had heard these arguments with surprise. He should hereafter make some observations upon a comparison between our import duties and those of the nations of Europe. But, was it enough to condemn our policy that it was not European? It is yet more true of internal taxes than of impost, that the nations of Europe are very far in advance of us. Their establishments of other kinds differ more than their tariffs from those of the United States. We had ventured, however rash it might be thought, "to adopt principles which had not been tested" by their experience. And, had we suffered for our temerity? Had our experiment really failed? What nation in Europe had advanced more rapidly to prosperity and wealth by the most successful wars, than had the United States without a conquest, by the mere development and natural growth of their resources? Let their policy be changed if it must be so, but let them not be ungrateful to the wisdom which had directed, to the Providence which had favored them. The nominal value of property might change; the currency might rise or depreciate; but a population quadrupled in less than fifty years, and a production increased in a yet larger proportion, furnished no evidence to condemn the scheme under which security had resulted. Independently of the protection of property, which our laws afforded, the principal cause of a growth so extraordinary must be found in the high rewards of labor. In new countries, where land is yet not fully appropriated, labor always obtains a high price in the raw produce of the earth, and generally but a small one in manufactured articles. It has been the happy peculiarity of our situation and of our policy that the laborer has obtained as large an amount as any where else of the necessities which agriculture furnishes, and a much larger one of the comforts which manufactures provide. The statesmen may mar his condition, but cannot mend it. He cannot raise his wages estimated in the produce of the earth, and by a large foreign import he must lower his wages if you estimate them in the manufactures which he must consume.

But our scheme of revenue has failed. The House would have hereafter a better opportunity of examining this subject than they now have. He would not represent the state of the revenue as prosperous—but perhaps it was a proof that the prosperity of a few years had rendered our expectations unreasonable, that we looked almost with dismay upon the finances of a year, in which, if we deduct what we propose to borrow, from what we pay of public debt, there will still be an amount of debt extinguished, of upwards of two millions and a half (about half of which will be Mississippi stock.) After paying every current expense, and applying large sums in increasing the Navy and fortifications of the country, we should owe less by upwards of two millions and a half, on the 1st of January, 1821, than we did on the 1st of January.* He did not think, that the prospects of succeeding years, (looking to the average of several years) were as bad as they had been represented, unless they were made so by this bill. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposed to open new sources of revenue, his scheme would deserve the examination of the House. But, if Mr. L. understood his plan, it was founded on a notion which was erroneous in its principle, and must be oppressive in its application.

The revenue which the impost furnishes, is paid by the consumer, and not by the merchant. It is paid in the enhanced price of the article which he buys. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to think, that, if, by excluding this article, he is forced to consume only the domestic fabric, the Government, which has not received its accustomed duty upon the importation of foreign, may collect the same amount by an excise upon domestic ar—ticles. "The money has not been carried out of the country." If, indeed, by ceasing to import the foreign fabric, the domestic article is furnished to the consumer at a lower price, he may pay a tax upon it—but the tax which was paid in the price of the article is not reduced by its exclusion; it is, indeed, so far as the farmer is concerned, increased—he pays more for the articles which he buys; his expenses are greater; his clear revenue less. Is there any legerdemain by which, under these circumstances, his ability to pay taxes can be increased? You tell him that he paid before a certain tax to the Government, and that he does not pay it now; he answers you, that he pays a higher tax, because he pays a higher price now than he did formerly, and that it is not his fault that this tax goes into the pocket of the manufacturer, and not into the public Treasury. If, in addition to the exclusion of the foreign article, you lay an excise upon the domestic product, it is evident that the country must pay a double tax, although the Government will not receive it. It is hardly possible, however, to reason upon this subject. The ability to pay taxes must be diminished by every thing which adds to the expenses (as the exclusion of foreign goods must do) of those who are to pay them.

* This statement was founded upon the supposition that one million and a half would be borrowed. If the loan, as appears now to be probable, should be of three millions, the actual reduction of debt in the year 1820 will be only one million.

Something had been said of the expenses of collecting a duty upon domestic goods, and the higher expense of excluding foreign goods seemed to be forgotten.

Some gentlemen admit that the proposition of his friends from Virginia, that individuals would pursue that course of industry which would be most profitable to themselves and the country, would be true, if other nations, as well as we, would "leave trade to itself." Their concession was injudicious. If all nations admitted a free trade, the arguments for restriction on our part would be just the same as they are now. What would be the inducements to us to admit this trade? That it furnished us in exchange for products which to us were worth a hundred millions, products which were worth one hundred and fifty millions; that what we bought was worth more to us than what we sold; and if those nations could not or would not buy the hundred millions, if they could not or would not buy more than fifty or twenty millions, the argument would still be unchanged even in its form. However reduced might be the amount of trade, it must still consist in an exchange of what we wanted less, for what we wanted more. In this view of the question, which appeared to him a very simple one, it was not necessary to remark upon the argument, that our supply of agricultural produce would grow in a much larger proportion than the demand of Europe or its population. It might be better for us that their demand should grow more rapidly, but if it would be to our advantage to supply a great demand, it was to our advantage, too, though in a smaller degree, to supply even a less demand. This difference however in the agricultural produce which we should export, and the foreign demand for it, might be expected to have been illustrated by experience, as well as developed by theory. What was the fact?

All admit that the proportion of our industry, employed to produce breadstuffs for foreign consumption, ought to bear a continually lessening proportion to the general industry of the country. But is it necessary that the Government should interfere to prevent the inordinate increase in the quantity of provisions which we export, or can the people manage that matter without our interference? Whoever will take the trouble to examine the account of our exports for twenty years past will find that, while the products of our industry at home have probably quadrupled, our exportation of provisions has not increased at all. It is not, then, necessary that we should force, by legislation, the industry of the country into any new direction, in order to prevent it from glutting the corn market of Europe.

Mr. L said that he would return for a moment to the consideration of the question, how far the propriety "of leaving things to themselves," was affected by the opposite system which was pursued by foreign Powers. If China should by law admit all our produce, manufactured or agricultural, it is plain enough that we could not advantageously send there any which we do not now send. Indeed, he did not know that she prohibited any of our produce, but if she did the prohibition was nominal, and it was evident that its removal could not change the policy which it was our interest to pursue. But perhaps China belonged to a sphere of industry too different from ours, for the application of these principles. Would the admission of the products of our industry by the nations of Europe justify, in the estimation of the friends of this bill, the reciprocal admission of theirs? Of what avail would it be to us that England should consent to take our manufactures? An engagement to do so would "keep its promise to the ear, but break it to the sense." Our breadstuffs she takes now only when wheat is above ten shillings, when, by the by, it is most our interest to sell it. Suppose her laws permitted its importation when the price was low; would any friend of the bill avow that this policy, which would make the establishment of manufactures here a matter of somewhat more difficulty, would incline him to dispense with protecting duties in favor of our manufactures? He put it to the candor of his friends on the other side, to say whether they would consent to a treaty by which the raw produce of America and the manufactures of England should be exchanged without duty? They would not. Their objections to an intercourse unburdened by duties, would be still stronger than they now are, if Europe, in affording a better market for our agriculture, should oppose still stronger difficulties to the establishment of manufactures.

Yet it was true that those who wished to impose heavier duties or prohibitions upon foreign manufactures, alleged that, by doing so, the price of agricultural produce would be raised. It was equally true, and more strange, that a great many good people, interested in agriculture, had believed the allegation. The error was susceptible of easy refutation. If, indeed, the allegation were just, the manufacturer would gain nothing by the change. If the prices of what he buys and sells rise in the same proportion, he might as well leave everything as it is. But the notion that the encouragement of manufactures will give a good price to the productions of agriculture is entirely fallacious. Whatever may be the domestic demand for our grain, the supply will exceed it.

As long as there is good land occupied, the price of its produce, if there be no foreign demand, will exceed by very little the value of the labor employed in obtaining it. Such must be the case of a permanent embargo. But when there is an export trade, although the quantity exported may bear a small proportion to that which is consumed in the country, the price of that small proportion must determine that of the whole. He did not say that this was a reasonable theory, but a notorious fact. It was a plain deduction from these principles that, in an extensive and thinly peopled country, restrictions upon trade would raise the price of manufactures, but not of grain. In a populous and fully cultivated country they would raise the price of grain, and not of manufactures. The last is the situation of England; the first that of the United States.

But the opinion that the establishment of manufactures would secure a good price for our agricultural produce, had made so many converts, that it would be interesting to inquire into the causes which had produced it. He could not dwell upon the subject. But, when manufactories and banks were established contemporaneously, (and this association he believed not to be uncommon;) when manufactories were established by the aid of borrowed capital, and a profuse expenditure produced a local depreciation, the same effect was produced upon prices as an emission of paper money would have done. Everybody was willing to spend; everybody began to improve and build, and industry was stimulated to extraordinary activity, as it always is, by a depreciating currency. The remarks which he had made a few moments since, were enough to show how perfectly illusory all duties upon importation must prove for the protection of our agricultural industry. The price of our agricultural products must be determined by that part of them which is exported, and must in consequence be absolutely unaffected by duties, or even prohibitions. Gentlemen might, therefore, lay duties, or withdraw them from cotton, wheat, or tobacco, and they would change nothing but the words of their statute book.

If it were ever right that Government should impose its duties, with a view to the encouragement of particular branches of industry, Mr. L. said he had always believed that the two most reasonable modes of doing it were these: either to lay a very small and equal duty upon all manufactures, which would leave the relative inducement to engage in each unchanged, or to determine upon a very few branches, which the Government supposed to be best adapted to the situation of the country, or most necessary to its interest, and leaving others untaxed, (if revenue permitted it,) to direct the capital and labor of the country to these objects, where they might form a sufficient security against an excessive rise of prices. The last was the more vigorous plan; perhaps it was the wiser one. Yet it was best adapted to a condition very different from that of the United States; he meant that of an enlightened government and an ignorant people.

Whatever were the encouragements which should be afforded to manufactures, it had always hitherto been supposed that these were required to be greatest at their first establishment. The reasoning of his friend from Delaware supported this conclusion. Mr. Hamilton had said distinctly, that, where any branch of industry continued long to require a bounty, it afforded proof that there were obstacles to its establishment which would make it unwise to persevere in it. Yet our system was not to continue bounties, but to increase them.

A strong argument, in the opinion of many gentlemen, was deduced from the large excess of importations above exportations, in order to show that it was necessary to interfere, and prevent the people from buying more than they could pay for. He had hoped that this subject had been put to rest by his friends from Virginia. An excessive importation may, indeed, take place for a year, although the price will usually be so much lowered by it that the amount of sales of a large may not be greater than would have been those of a small importation. This disproportion, however, between the supply and demand, between the sales and the means of payment, can continue but a short time. The price of American stocks here and in England, the present rate of exchange, sufficiently prove that our interference is unnecessary in fact (as it must always be wrong in principle) to adjust the balance of payments between the two countries.

So much had been said of this balance of importation above exports, that he might be excused for another remark. Gentlemen knew the corrections (and among them, those required by a consideration of the profits of freight, commission, and trade) which ought to be applied to our custom-house accounts. These corrections would vary the balance very much, but they would leave a result in which he should feel little confidence. There is, indeed, a view very different from that which the friends of the bill have taken. The balance of importations above exports, for a series of years, may not only be considered as the proof of a profitable trade, but the measure of its profit. Our trade with foreign nations is one in which we obtain their produce in return for our produce or our labor, and the more valuable their produce is, the better bargain we have made. We should not, as individuals, think it the evidence of unsuccessful business that we obtained in exchange for an article worth but $1,000, one which was worth 2,000. Yet this is exactly the thing which is called by politicians an unfavorable balance of trade. In such a system, if the vessels which carry out your productions, and are owned by your merchants, are sunk in the sea, or carried to a market where their sales pay only their expenses, no returns can be made, the balance becomes very favorable, and the politician is satisfied. If the cargoes reach a market which enables the merchant to bring back large returns, the balance of trade becomes unfavorable. A permanent balance of importation, (in a nation that has no mines,) must always be referred to the profits of its business. It was different with the excess of a single year. This, however, when it required correction, would, as his friends observed, always be corrected by the interests of trade, without the interposition of the Government. Could it be necessary that we should interfere by law to diminish importations, at the moment when we see that an unparalleled reduction is effecting without our interference? The importation of the last quarter of the year 1819, was not more than two-thirds of that of the corresponding quarter of '18.

APRIL, 1820.

Mr. L. said that, in the detached observations which he had offered, he had endeavored to remove the impression which some of the general arguments of the friends of the bill had made. The propositions which, to his mind, it appeared necessary that they should establish, they did not prove—they scarcely noticed. Grant that it is right that the Government should encourage all the manufactures of the country, that considerable duties should be laid upon the importation of every article which can compete with our own fabrics. This we have done already. He believed that there was now no nation in the world which, in proportion to its income, paid so great a bounty to its manufacturers, as the United States. Had it ever been contended, not merely that manufactures should be encouraged, but that the bounty to be given should not be limited by any determined relation to the necessity of the manufacture, or the fair profits of the manufacturer? This mode of defending the bill was, perhaps, judicious; it was certainly embarrassing to its opponents. You say that it is important to encourage the manufacture of cotton. Be it so. We know that, however it be disguised, this can be done only at the expense of the other classes of society. Is it not proper to inquire what expense is necessary; what would be adequate? The operation of a protecting duty was simple, but he must detain the House for a few moments upon the subject, trite and familiar as it was. Where duties are laid upon the importation of articles of a kind which is not produced within the country, the additional price which is paid by the community is received into the public treasury, with a deduction only for the costs of collection. Where a duty is laid upon the importation of an article which is produced within the country, it will cause the same rise in its price as in the former case; but, of the additional sum which is paid by the community, a part will be received by the Government and a part by the manufacturer or producer of the domestic article. If, for instance, one hundred million of pounds of sugar were consumed annually in the United States, and three-fourths of this amount were furnished by domestic industry, an additional duty of one cent the pound would cause the consumers of sugar throughout the country to pay one million of dollars more in the price of the article, than they would otherwise do—would impose upon the people a new tax of one million; but, of this sum, less than $250,000 would be received by the Government, and $750,000 by the sugar planter.

The difference between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and himself, in respect to the information on which a tariff should be founded, was explained by this case. He thought, if Congress determined to encourage the production of sugar by an additional bounty, that it was bound carefully to inquire what sum was necessary for this object. To justify the tax, it was necessary to determine that the nation had such an interest in the establishment of the additional sugar plantations to which the bill was expected to give rise, that it was worth its while to contribute annually seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars to their support, and that a contribution of less than seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars would not cause their establishment. If the bounty in question were greater than the value of the object justified, in any rational view of public policy, we applied the money of the country injudiciously; but if a less bounty would produce the effect which we desired, we gave it away without object and without excuse. It was in this view that he had asked the Committee of Manufactures information to show what were the duties upon foreign importation which would give to our manufacturers a reasonable profit on their capital and labor. Every thing beyond this was not a liberal encouragement of manufactures, but a profuse and capricious donation of the public money. Suppose that the seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars which, on the supposition which he had made, were given to the sugar planters, instead of being paid to them by the consumers, were raised by a direct tax, and then paid as a bounty out of the public Treasury. This would form no distinction in the principle of the donation. Mr. Hamilton had said, with perfect correctness, that "as often as a duty upon a foreign article makes an addition to its price, it causes an extra expense to the community for the benefit of the domestic manufacture. A bounty does no more." The information which he had wished was, whether this bounty was to be given to men whose profits and wages were now less than those of the rest of the community; and what were the profits which it was estimated that this bounty would procure them; in a word, how much more public money we should give, and what was the necessity of giving it. The House, in rejecting his resolution, had determined that the inquiry was useless or impracticable. They had refused all evidence as to the proper degree of encouragement, and left the defence of the bill to the same vague considerations which would support a duty of one hundred per cent. as well as one of forty. They took they knew not how much from the people; they gave they knew not how much to the manufacturer.

The chairman of the Committee of Manufactures had intimated that information such as he had asked had never been given. He might answer that it ought to have been. But the chairman was mistaken. It had been. Mr. L. read the following sentences from Mr. Dallas's report of 1816, on the revision of the tariff: "The amount of the duties should be such as will enable the manufacturer to meet the importer in the American market upon equal terms of profit and loss." "There still, however, remains a diversity of opinion as to the amount which will be competent, and the aim of this report will be to strike the medium which appears to be best established from all the information which has been collected." This sentence proved that the rates of duty proposed in the report of 1816 were founded on evidence of the degree of encouragement which would enable "the manufacturer to meet the importer." That evidence was laid before the House. It contained, substantially, and indeed much more fully than he should require it, all the information in respect to the state of our manufactures in 1816, which it was the object of his resolution to obtain in 1820. He should have occasion to advert to this information hereafter. It proved at least that the object of his resolution was practicable, and had hitherto been supposed important and necessary.

The practicability of its object, too, although the Speaker had appeared to doubt it, had been proved by the statements which he had made in respect to two Northern manufactures. If the House were determined to give adequate protection to any branch of manufactures, the same kind of information possessed by the Speaker, as to the manufactures of which he had spoken, if extended to fifteen or twenty others in different parts of the country, would enable us to know what bounty was necessary and adequate to their support. That bounty ought not to be increased to maintain the unskilful and the improvident, and he admitted that (if granted at all) it ought not to be contracted so as to afford support only to an establishment which had peculiar advantages beyond the reach of imitation. He did not know, however, of any such in the United States. In examining the degree of encouragement which it is proposed in this bill to give to American manufactures, we were naturally reminded of the view which had been taken of the subject by Mr. Hamilton, whose principles are considered as sound, even by the friends of this tariff. He, at least, was able to elevate his view to the just importance of manufacturing industry. Let us see the price which he proposed to pay for its support. The general tenor of his argument, and indeed the particular quotation which had been made, sufficiently prove Mr. Hamilton's opinion to have been, that, whatever bounties were given to domestic manufactures should be highest at first. The duties, therefore, which he proposed in his celebrated report on manufactures, were such as he thought sufficient then, and such as, according to his principles, ought to be sufficient now. In forming his opinion, he did not overlook the advantages which the risk and expense of importation from abroad give to the American manufacturer. This protection of distance he estimates from fifteen to thirty per cent. Mr. L. said he would state, without a formal comparison, a few of the duties which Mr. Hamilton proposed for the encouragement of manufactures. On manufactures of leather he proposed a duty of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. He was willing that cotton goods should be "raised to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent." On glass, he considered the duty of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. as a considerable encouragement, and thought that, if any thing further were given, it ought to be by a direct bounty out of the public treasury. Ten per cent. on paper and gunpowder he thought a competent protection; and he proposed the same duty on manufactures of iron and brass. His principles were best explained by the application which he had himself made of them; and the enormity of the bounty which it was now proposed to give to the manufacturers could not be more strongly exhibited than by comparing it with that which was considered as adequate by so zealous and able an advocate of manufacturing industry as Mr. Hamilton. Duties four times as great as he recommended were now levied upon many of the most important articles, and were discovered to be insufficient and nugatory.

What he regretted, Mr. L. said, most, in the course pursued by the Committee of Manufactures, was, that they suggested no standard by which the sufficiency of the encouragement which they proposed could be tested, and promised, therefore, no limitation to the burden which might be imposed upon the country. The chairman of that committee had, indeed, more than once directed our attention to the duties imposed by the laws of Russia, France, and England—models which we had not yet learned to imitate. It was not extraordinary that governments which were obliged to drain every resource of revenue, should lay heavier duties upon importation than we had done. There was no part, however, of their system of exaction in which we approached so near them as in our duties upon commerce. In attempting any comparison between their duties and those of the United States, it was obviously necessary to consider the difference of our circumstances.

In estimating the protection afforded to national manufactures by duties upon importation, it was not the absolute amount of duty that constituted a protection to the home manufacturer, in the case in which there was an internal duty upon the article, but only the excess of the foreign over the internal duty. Thus if, in 1786, (before the commercial treaty between France and England,) the duty payable upon the importation of English hardware into France had been fifty per cent., as the internal tax upon French hardware, if his memory did not greatly deceive him, was about thirty per cent. on its value—the true amount of the protecting duty would have been but twenty per cent. The inquirer, then, who should wish to know the real encouragement afforded by foreign duties, must apply to all of them the correction deduced from this principle; and it would probably reduce many of them, which appeared greatly to exceed our own, to an amount less than was exacted even under the present law in the United States.

The high duties of European nations, when they were not counteracted in the manner in which he had mentioned, were mitigated by another circumstance, which should not be neglected in an estimate of their burdens. In nations of the same age, not very unequal in the density of population, and in their improvement in the arts, if trade were perfectly free, a large proportion of the necessities of life, including nearly all the coarser manufactures, would be cheapest at home. A duty upon these would, in such countries, be nearly nominal. Among the European nations, too, if trade were free, the whole amount of importations would bear a much less proportion to the whole income of the country than in the United States. He supposed it certain that the importations of England, commercial as she was, were not half as great, in proportion to her income, as were those of the United States at present; nor were our importations now by any means as large, in proportion to our wealth, as in an earlier period of our existence. The duties which we pay now would have been intolerable forty years ago, and European duties, however high, upon the articles imported, do not fall heavily upon the subject, because those articles form but a small part of his expenses.

If he did not exaggerate the deductions, which the considerations which he had mentioned required us to make from the duties of foreign nations, in comparing them with our own, he believed that no people on earth would be found to pay, in proportion to their income, so large a bounty for the support of manufacturing industry as those of the United States. He had not, however, had time to examine the details of the subject with any minuteness.

Unfair as the comparison between the duties of foreign nations and our own must be, unless the corrections which he had adverted to were made, it might well astonish the House to find that there were many articles, and important ones too, our duties on which, as proposed by the bill before the House, might vie with those of France and England, without recurring to any of the considerations of which he had spoken. He would notice a few of them.

In France, machines of all kinds, including ploughs, pay fifteen per cent.; by the proposed bill they will pay here twenty per cent. Wrought anchors pay in France ten francs the hundred kilogrammes; by the proposed bill they will pay here $3 33 the cwt.—more than three times the French duty. Hosiery is in France two francs the kilogramme; by the proposed bill it will be here thirty-three per cent.

Whatever may be the disposition of England to sustain her manufactures by protecting duties, she has been obliged in her late war with France, by necessity, and not judgment, for the support of her revenue, and not her industry, to make these duties still higher than they were before. But our manufacturers might be gratified by discovering that some of the duties now proposed were higher even than those of England. The superior liberality, at least, of this country can hardly be denied by them. England, assisted by a most rigorous system of collection, has raised her duties, from the necessity of increasing her revenue, by all possible means. The United States propose to raise theirs with the just conviction that they will impair their revenue.

In England the duty upon cast iron is £26 13 4, the hundred pounds value; by the proposed bill it will be $1 50 the cwt.; (he supposed about forty or fifty per cent. ad valorem.) Nankeen, for home consumption, is, in England, 32½ per cent. ad valorem. By the proposed bill it will here be forty. Muslins are in England 32½, and cottons, not enumerated, sixty-two per cent. By the proposed bill our duties on these articles will be from 40 to 130 per cent.

Much as such a course of observation had been discountenanced, he must now advert to another topic. What were the duties which would afford to the manufacturers reasonable wages and profits? If, at a time when every interest in the State was depressed, it was right that all the rest should contribute to the support of one, at least it should be only to its necessary and reasonable support. He had before spoken of the evidence laid before the House in 1816. That evidence had led Congress to the conclusion that, where the capital was prudently invested, and the manufactory conducted with common skill, a duty of 25 per cent. on cotton and woollen manufactures would sufficiently protect those of our own country. But the circumstances of the times now make the duty of 25 per cent. much more effectual than it has hitherto been. The appreciation of our money is, in this view, all important. In the specific duties this is obvious. If, for instance, the duty of three cents upon the pound of sugar were a competent protection four years ago, the advanced value of money, of which the same nominal amount would produce much more of every article of consumption, must make it now much higher than is necessary. But even in relation to the articles which pay a duty on their value, if the fall in the value of our produce be greater (as it certainly is) than in the articles which we import from foreign countries; although the nominal duty be unchanged, the real tax is much larger than it was. We still pay six and a quarter cents upon a yard of the coarsest cotton; but the same amount will purchase much more of provisions or labor than it would do formerly. The duty, then, is substantially increased; and if it has hitherto, with exaggerated prices and an unsound currency, proved inadequate, would it not be prudent, now that a change in these circumstances gives to the present tariff its fair operation, to wait the result of that operation?

The depression in the price of property and labor was confined to no section of the country, and to no branch of business. The manufacturer, like the farmer, should estimate his profits, not on the supposed value of his capital four years ago, not on what it then cost, or would have then have sold for, but at the price which it would now cost, or would now sell for. Against this general depression we could not indemnify him; but there was a loss peculiar to manufacturers, from which no Government could insure them, and which many of them felt very severely at this time. While an improvement in machinery is useful to the country in which it is made, its immediate effect is often greatly to impair the capital of manufacturers. The old machinery must be abandoned. What relief would higher duties give to the owners of manufactories which had not adopted the improved machinery? It might encourage them to struggle a little longer with inferior machinery, but without permanent benefit, even to themselves; it must produce a real waste of the capital and labor of the nation.

Among the causes which at this moment depress the manufacturing industry of the country, one of the most considerable is to be found in that general diminution of income which affects the demand both for foreign and domestic productions. The carriage makers, for instance, suffer probably as much from want of employment as any other class of manufacturers. There is here no foreign competition. It is a distress from which our tariff can give no relief. On the contrary, its effect must be by increasing the expenses, and diminishing, therefore, the clear income of the community, greatly to increase the difficulties of those classes of manufacturers who suffer from a diminished demand.

His friends who had preceded him had referred to instances of manufactories which were prosperous even now, when every other industry was depressed, and particularly to that of an establishment (at Waltham) which was understood to have divided 12 per cent. and reserved a considerable surplus. The Committee of Manufactures, in declining to give any detailed statements upon the subject, had obliged him to resort to the sources of information which were within his reach. He should state to the House the opinion which his inquiries had enabled him to form, and he should state it in the words of a letter written by a man who was as well acquainted with the subject as any other in the United States. [MR. BALDWIN asked the name of the writer, which Mr. L. declined to give:]

"Many manufacturers have been ruined, and many others lost money; but very little reflection and inquiry will make the cause evident. Perhaps the business has been conducted to the best advantage, when, in addition to the want of capital and experience, is added that of incorporated companies, where the principal meaning of the charter is to exonerate each holder of the stock, as well as the president, director, and agents, from individual responsibility for any debts due from the company. Consequently, in all purchases for the establishment, the agent would be obliged to give at least ten per cent. more than the individuals could purchase it on their own responsibility.

"But perhaps a greater cause of loss may be in the general fall in price of every article used by manufacturers, and in all kinds of manufactured goods, whether foreign or homemade, and also in the price of labor and improvement in machinery, compelling those that did not sell immediately on the goods being finished, to make heavy losses, for we suppose it is admitted that the cost of making any goods of which cotton or wool is the article of chief value, is not more than half the cost of making the same goods in 1816."

"In order more clearly to show the consequences of not immediately selling, we give the following example arising in our own business: We supply a maker of candlewick with cotton, and sell all the wick he makes; and, during the year 1818, the business having been good for many years, he, with others engaged in the same business, has accumulated a considerable quantity on hand, which, during the year 1818, had been worth from five to fifty-five cents per pound, when the raw material of cotton was worth from thirty to thirty-three cents, paying the spinner an average of twenty cents the pound for his labor and expenses; but, on the 1st of August last, the same kind of cotton could be purchased in this market at fifteen cents the pound, and the price of the wick had fallen so low as thirty-one cents, but yet paying sixteen cents for the labor and expenses, which, we are convinced, is a profitable business. Hence, on the 1st of August last year, he could afford to sell his wick at what the cotton of his 1818 wick cost him, and at the time we were selling his new made wick at a profit, that made the year before was selling at a loss of the whole cost of making; and many other kinds of American goods have fallen in nearly the same proportion from the same cause, and some still greater from other causes; for instance, we suppose the price of weaving is not at this time more than half as high as it was in 1816, owing to the introduction of power-looms and the general low price of living.

"Next, let us examine the cost of four yards of American brown shirtings, three-quarters of a yard wide, (which may be considered the staple of American cotton goods,) say the present price of cotton is sixteen cents, that will make four yards of shirting: Twelve cents for spinning the same; eight cents for weaving four yards, at two cents per yard; four cents for all other expenses, say commissions, freights, cartages, packages, &c. Added, is forty cents for making four yards, equal to ten cents the yard, and when the same goods are now worth from twelve to twelve and a half cents the yard cash, at auction, leaving a profit to the manufacturer of at least twenty per centum; and when we reflect that the coarsest piece of cotton goods of the same size cannot be imported without paying duty at the rate of six and a quarter cents per yard, equal to $4 68½ cents, or within about one and a half cents of the whole cost of making the same piece of goods; hence we must be satisfied that foreign competition is very much out of the question, for the lowest rate of duty on any kind of cotton or woollen goods (made to any extent in this country) is twenty-seven and a half per centum on the value at the place of manufactory.

"We do believe that manufacturing establishments well conducted, and the goods immediately sold at auction, have averaged a profit of at least ten per centum during the last two years, when, at the same time, imported cotton and woollen goods have averaged a loss of at least fifteen per centum."

MR. LOWNDES said, that he would say no more as to the degree of additional encouragement which was required by our manufactories.

But he had a few observations to make as to the principles which appeared to have been adopted in the tariff proposed by the Committee of Manufactures.

Among the most objectionable of these was what he considered as the proscription of the East

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

India trade, the principal articles afforded by which were subjected to a duty of forty per cent.

The ground of this proscription was, that the East Indies took from us scarcely any article of our produce.

He had occasion on a former day to advert to one of the most interesting branches of this trade—to that in which neither specie nor produce was exported, but in which the enterprise and industry of our seamen formed the capital which a harsh, and, he thought, a mistaken policy would condemn to inactivity. They took nothing from your country; but they explored the most distant seas—they climbed almost inaccessible rocks—they pursued their hardy and dangerous employment between the ports of savage nations, and earned by their freights a capital which fortune had not given them. You would encourage manufacturing industry because it was productive; but the industry of the brave men of whom he spoke created the capital which they brought back to our country. They did not twirl the spindle, or fling the shuttle; but when they brought home a cargo of India fabrics, (peculiarly suited to the wants of the poorest class of our society,) was their industry less worthy of encouragement, because they had made these fabrics on tempestuous seas, or because, in pursuing their own interests, they acquired and perfected the naval excellence which made them our pride and our defence? We gave them the hospitality of our ports; they might take in wood and water, and sail in search of some strange land, from which these products of American industry are not yet excluded! The policy appeared to him unjust and cruel.

But the other branches of the East Indian trade merited encouragement rather than prohibition. He had already spoken of the fallacy which represented a trade to be injurious, in which the imports exceeded the exports; and the East Indian trade furnished a good illustration of the fallacy. It takes, if you please, nothing of domestic produce from us; it gave to the consumption of the country, in the year when he had last examined the subject, an amount of goods to the value of five millions. How were these goods paid for? Specie had undoubtedly been shipped both from America and Europe for their purchase. But our sales of East India articles in foreign countries had exceeded the amount of our purchases in India. Five million of goods then consumed in the United States were paid for by the mere profits of the trade. Three thousand seamen, supported by the requisite capital, added in one year five millions to the clear amount of national income. There was no exportation of our produce to pay for these fabrics, because they were paid for already; they were the acquisitions of American industry.

He would not detain the House by talking of the injury which the Indian trade was supposed to do us by draining our specie. How the purchase of merchandise, either in India or anywhere else, of which we kept the part that we wanted, and sold the remainder for more than we gave for the whole, could lessen the specie which we retained, it would be a little difficult to explain.

Another characteristic of the proposed tariff, is its raising the duty on articles which had been lowered in the act of 1816, because from their small bulk, in proportion to their value, it had been found impracticable to prevent their being smuggled into the country. Watches, jewelry, and laces, had, among other articles, been reduced to seven and a half per cent. The reduction had been proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and adopted by the House on this ground. Had any examination into the fact been made by the Committee of Manufactures? They had raised other articles also which were known even at the present duties to have been introduced clandestinely—for instance, coffee from five to six cents, segars, from $2 50 to $5. A large class of articles, of which the supply is almost exclusively afforded by the industry of the country, and on which an increased duty if it have any effect at all can only have that of unnecessarily increasing the price, is taxed in the proposed tariff considerably higher than now. Thus, carriages and furniture are raised from thirty to thirty-five per cent.; boots from $1 50 to $2; candles from three to five cents; molasses from five to ten cents; nails from four to five; soap from three to four; brown sugar from three to four. He might make the list much longer.

It might have been expected that articles essential to the equipment of ships would have been protected from an increase of duties by a double motive. As materials of our most important manufacture, they were entitled to the favor of the committee; but there was in regard to some of them another reason for light duties—that it was necessary to prevent the practice of ships being sent out imperfectly equipped and completing their equipment in foreign ports. Even under the present duties this was sometimes done. The committee, however, had disregarded both these considerations. As instances of this, iron in bars was raised from seventy-five cents, to $1 25; iron spikes from three to four; hemp from $1 50 to $2 50; tarred cables and cordage from three to four. The tendency of the whole system to discourage our commerce with foreign nations, and by making returns more difficult to sink yet lower the price of every article of our produce, could not be disguised. He would not enlarge upon it; but he could not sit down without adverting to a consideration on which the House could not reflect too seriously.

The best security for the fair collection of the revenue was to be found in the force of public opinion. The activity of our little Navy, if it were to be employed in such a service, would furnish but a poor substitute for it. In the fair collection of the public revenue the interests as well as the principles of our citizens co-operated with the efforts of the General Government. They knew that they must contribute to the support of that Government, and the impost was the easiest mode of contribution; to evade it was to defraud the Government of its dues, and to expose themselves to the necessity of a much more inconvenient contribution. But could it be expected when the object of duties was not to obtain revenue, but to enhance the profits of a particular class of society, that the same scruples would prevail universally? In purchasing an article intended to be prohibited, the loss would fall upon the manufacturer, who might be considered as the object of unjust and inordinate favor, rather than upon the revenue. The law ought to be obeyed because it was the law. But for himself he had no hesitation in expressing the opinion that the present duties, enforced as they were by a general approbation of their objects, furnished a much better encouragement to the manufacturer than higher duties which should be believed by half the nation to be partial and unjust.

Mr. L. said that he knew he had trespassed quite unreasonably upon the time of the House, but he believed the bill under consideration to be injurious to the Government, oppressive to the people, and dangerous to the stability of manufacturing industry.

Mr. BALDWIN replied to Mr. LOWNDES and others.

Mr. Foor observed, having spent the whole of his life in commercial and agricultural pursuits, and being a practical friend to domestic manufactures, he felt it to be his duty to state the reasons which induced him to move the postponement of this bill to the first day of next session.

Sir, this subject is not only very important, but very intricate, involving the interest of every portion of the community. A radical or very material alteration of a commercial tariff must of necessity produce a sensible shock in every community. It ought never to be adopted without much deliberation, and a careful attention to its effects upon the several interests which must of necessity be affected by any change in the system.

If the Committee of Manufactures had confined their attention to the several articles of foreign manufacture which interfere with our domestic manufactures alone, the bill would have received my vote without any hesitation. But, sir, when it is proposed to alter the whole system, ostensibly for the encouragement of American manufacturers, and proposes, among the first articles, to impose an additional duty of $6\frac{1}{2}$ per centum on the dyeing materials essential to our own manufacture, and increases the duty on the most necessary articles, while it reduces the duty on wines and luxuries; and when we are told by the Chairman that our system of revenue from imports is rotten, and that our dependence on commerce as a source of revenue must be abandoned,—sir, I think we should pause before we rashly adopt a measure calculated—yes, sir, and even avowed as a measure—to prohibit the importation of many articles from which most of our revenue has always been obtained, to the amount of more than three hundred millions of dollars; and when we have been also sarcastically threatened, that if we complained of a duty of ten cents on a gallon of molasses, because of its unequal and partial operation upon the interests of our constituents, that fifteen cents should be imposed. Sir, I think the system, as well as the views of those who advocate it, demand our serious attention.

Sir, gentlemen declare this measure has been requested by the merchants of our country, and that the agricultural interest does not object to it. If, sir, the commercial and agricultural interests of this country had as many Representatives on this floor as there are gentlemen of one profession in Congress, you would hear their voice in “tones of thunder” against the passage of this bill. Would they consent to pay direct taxes to the amount of twenty millions of dollars annually? Who must pay your additional duties? The consumers, all will acknowledge: and it has been truly said, that the agricultural interest composes nine-tenths of the whole population. If gentlemen who so strenuously advocate this bill would encourage domestic manufactures, by using them in their dress, rather than those very articles of foreign manufacture which have driven the American manufacturer to ruin, sir, you would afford them more efficient aid than by any legislative provisions.

Sir, it is with a view of affording to those who are interested in this subject an opportunity to be heard, and for a fair investigation of the merits of this bill, (which has been before the public but about one week;) and as at this late period of the session there is not sufficient time to digest and mature a proper system; and with a full conviction that this bill will not aid the manufacturer, but will materially injure the two great interests of agriculture and commerce, and most sensibly affect the revenue of the country,—that this motion is made. And I do hope gentlemen will consent to its postponement until the next session.

I presume a large majority of this House will support the bill for laying duties on sales at auction, which, in my opinion, will afford essential encouragement to the manufacturing interest and the regular merchant, without any material injury to any portion of the country.

But, sir, I am not prepared to give my vote in favor of this bill, which will, in my opinion, materially affect the interests of the agricultural and commercial portion of the Eastern section of the Union, by its unequal operation upon the East India trade, with but a doubtful prospect of benefit to the manufacturer.

It is acknowledged that a general embarrassment pervades every class of our citizens. Repeated calls have been made upon this Committee for information respecting the real situation of the manufacturers, and what encouragement it would be proper to give them. These calls have been met with the assurance that this bill is designed for the benefit of the community at large, as well as the manufacturer. Sir, as I have but little faith in the efficacy of this bill to afford aid to any particular class, or the whole, and as particular returns of the state of manufactures are required to be made by the census bill, it would seem at least but an act of ordinary prudence to postpone this subject until those returns are received.

Mr. SILSBEE, of Massachusetts, made a few remarks in reply to Mr. BALDWIN; when—

Mr. SIMKINS moved that the bill and amendments be postponed until the first day of the next session. In favor of which motion, Mr. HAR-DIN withdrew his motion for indefinite postponement.

Mr. PARKER, of Virginia, then demanded the previous question, but the call was not sustained by a majority of the House.

The question was then, about six o'clock, taken on the motion to postpone the bill until the first day of the next session, and was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Brevard, Bryan, Buffum, Burton, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Clagett, Cobb, Cocke, Crafts, Crawford, Crowell, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Davidson, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Foot, Fuller, Garnett, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hill, Holmes, Hooks, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Livermore, Lowndes, McCoy, McCreary, Mallary, Mercer, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Overstreet, Parker of Virginia, Pinckney, Plumer, Rankin, Reed, Rhea, Richards, Ringgold, Robertson, Settle, Silsbee, Simkins, Slocumb, B. The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole to the said bill, were then concurred in by the House.

Mr. NELSON, of Massachusetts, moved further to amend the bill, by adding to the end of the first section the following proviso:

“Provided, That no goods, wares, or merchandise, which shall be imported into the United States, on or before the 30th day of April, 1821, if from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope; or, on or before the 31st day of October next, if from places not situated beyond the Cape of Good Hope, in vessels that sailed from the United States before the passage of this act, shall be subjected to any higher duty than is required by laws now in force.”

And, on the question to agree to amend by adding the said proviso, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. SILSBEЕ moved further to amend the said bill, by striking out the word “June,” in the third line of the printed bill, and, in lieu thereof, to insert “September,” so as that the said bill commence and be in force from and after the 30th day of September, 1820, instead of the 30th of June, 1820.

This motion was rejected by the House.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, then moved further to amend the bill, by reducing the duty on salt imported, from twenty-five cents per bushel to twenty cents per bushel.

The yeas and nays being ordered on this question, Mr. METCALF moved the previous question, (the effect of which would be to decide forthwith the main question, viz. the engrossment of the bill for a third reading;) but the call was negatived—71 to 60.

The question was then taken on reducing the salt duty, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—For the amendment 93, against it 71, as follows:

Mr. HILL, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill by reducing the duty on imported molasses from “ten” cents to “five” cents a gallon; on which motion the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PARKER, perceiving that all the amendments which had been discussed and rejected in Committee of the Whole would probably be again offered, and the time of the House occupied in the tedious process of deciding them again, by yeas and nays, moved again for the previous question.

The call for the previous question was sustained by a vote of 86 to 62; and the previous question, "Shall the main question be now put?" was stated accordingly, and was decided, by yeas and nays, in the affirmative—yeas 92, noes 71, as follows:

The said main question was then put, to wit: Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time? and passed in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 69, as follows:

The House then (having rejected ten or twelve previous motions to adjourn, at various stages of the evening proceedings) adjourned between 7 and 8 o'clock, after a sitting of more than nine hours.

SATURDAY, April 29.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Conrad Laub, deceased; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCCOY moved that the House do now proceed to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John H. Piatt;" which motion was rejected by the House.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the benefit of Christopher Miller," was read, and concurred in by the House.

The House took up the amendment of the Senate to the bill concerning the banks of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MERCER moved that the House disagree to the amendment; which motion was negatived; and then the House agreed to the amendment of the Senate without a division.

The bill from the Senate granting certain privileges to the Ocean Steamship Company, of New York, was read a third time.

The bill was opposed by Mr. MCLEAN, of Kentucky, who moved to recommit the bill, and by Mr. FOOT, and was supported by Messrs. GROSS, of New York, and NEWTON; and after some remarks from Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, who wished further time to examine the bill; it was recommitted.

THE NAVY.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, rose, and said he should take the liberty to submit to the House several propositions growing out of the vote last evening on the tariff bill. If that bill passed into a law, of which he thought there was little doubt, since the vote had been taken, a radical, a total change would be effected in the system of policy heretofore pursued. It appears to me, sir, that we have been happy, that we have flourished, in a pre-eminent degree, under the operations of the system so much reprobated by the friends of the new tariff. In lieu of a tax on consumptions, we must, it seems, now resort to a system of internal taxation. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BALDWIN,) under whose auspices this bill was ushered into the House, and carried through with a triumphant majority, had always been favorable, if he was not mistaken, to a system of internal taxation. That gentleman voted against the repeal of the internal duties, when a longer continuance of them was manifestly unnecessary, and when the President had recommended their abolition. But without the former votes of the gentleman, the whole of his present project is evidence unequivocal to my mind that he wishes to re-establish a system of internal taxation.

The gentleman had distinctly said that the system of revenue which was now in operation had been tried; that it had failed; and that we must change it. Mr. W. said he was not disposed to think or to act with the gentleman from Pennsylvania; that he denied to the gentleman the force of his argument, founded upon the inadequacy of our present system. But admitting it to be inadequate, Mr. W. denied the propriety or policy of such a remedy as that gentleman proposed. Sir, said he, what is the real cause of the deficit in the revenue? Is the deficiency owing to any fault in the system itself, or does it proceed from the enormous expenditures of money? I say it boldly, and without fear of contradiction, that the beggared condition of the Treasury arises from the improper expenditures of money, and not from any fault in the revenue system. The friends of the present revenue system have not been disappointed. It has produced all the good they expected would result from it at the time it was adopted. But, sir, many heavy expenditures have since been authorized, and which were not contemplated at the period the system was adopted. This is the real cause of the insufficiency of funds in the Treasury.

No doubt a portion, and perhaps a serious portion, too, of the failure arises from the present deranged state of the circulating medium; and this is no fault of the system; and notwithstanding all these embarrassments, it would have answered every purpose, provided the expenditures had not been unreasonable and improper. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, however, had uniformly opposed, Mr. W. said, every effort to retrench, to economise, and to save the public money. So far, then, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania was concerned, the deficiency of revenue had been owing more to the course of policy pursued by him in this House than to any defect in the system. The system, Mr. W. repeated, had not failed; it had answered every purpose contemplated by its friends at the period of its adoption. But the Congress of the United States had failed, if there was failure anywhere. They had authorized excessive expenditures, not contemplated. Had the Army been reduced, as often proposed in this House, there would not now be a deficiency of money in the Treasury. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania had opposed, at all times, any reduction of the Military Establishment. Not only so, but the gentleman had opposed every attempt to reduce the expenditures appertaining to the Army. Even the Yellow Stone Expedition, condemned by the deliberate judgment of this House, as not only useless and expensive, but dangerous, the gentleman supported by his vote.

Mr. W. said it was a source of some little consolation at least, that, if the tariff bill went into operation, the Army would be reduced as a matter of course. It would, in that state of things, be less necessary than it had been, and its most determined advocates in this House would not any longer be able to sustain it. In any difficulties we might calculate on with Spain, there appeared to be no occasion for the Army in its present size. But thinking the reduction of the Army would ensue, as a matter of course, upon the passage of the tariff bill, he should not say any thing more on the subject; nor had he provided any resolution specifically for that object. The next branch of public expenditure rendered wholly unnecessary, if the bill should pass, was the appropriation for the gradual increase of the Navy.

Sir, it is proposed that we adopt a Chinese policy; that we shall always stay at home, and never go abroad. Of what use, then, can be your Navy? The Navy was created to defend your maritime and commercial rights. If you have no commerce of what use can be your Navy to defend the very rights which you have declared you will not exercise? Mr. W. said he would never agree to tax his constituents, in the first place, to support manufacturing establishments, and then to support an army and a navy, rendered wholly useless and unnecessary by the policy proposed to be pursued.

Mr. W. said, further, that, when the commercial interest suffers; when their rights are invaded, petitions flow in upon us; are referred to the Committee on Commerce, and by that committee are duly considered. If any law is necessary to provide for the commercial interests, the committee report a bill, and it is passed into a law. Thus, the commercial interest is guarded and defended. At this session we have, also, a distinct Committee on Manufactures. The mass of petitions and documents laid on our tables, and, above all, the bills reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, tend to show the great vigilance with which the manufacturing interest is guarded. Gentlemen say that there are, in this country, three interests, the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing. And how happens it, sir, that the agricultural, the great leading and substantial interest in this country, has no committee—no organized tribunal in this House to hear and determine on their grievances? If the commercial or manufacturing interests are affected, the cry resounds throughout the country; remonstrances flow in upon us; they are referred to committees appointed for the purpose of guarding them, and adequate remedies are provided. But, sir, when agriculture is oppressed, and makes complaint, what tribunal is in this House to hear and determine on the grievance?

H. OF R.

The Army.

APRIL, 1820.

Now, I suppose agricultural petitions could not be referred to the Committee on Manufactures! The policy pursued by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is at the head of that committee, shows you that agriculture can get nothing from manufactures. Let us, then, have a distinct and separate committee on agriculture, to hear and determine on the grievances of which that interest may complain. Sir, I wish to hear the agricultural voice of the country; let the farmers and planters speak. They constitute an interest which to all other interests is as ten to one, twenty to one, or one hundred to one. They are patient and long suffering, they will bear a great deal without murmur or complaint. But there is a point beyond which they cannot bear. Beyond that point I fear we are about to go. For the purpose, therefore, of having some tribunal before whom the agricultural interest may appear, I shall submit a resolution to establish a committee on that subject. They are the majority, they have a right not only to be heard, but to control. Oppress them only a little longer, and they will rise in the majesty of their strength; they must and will demand suitable relief. Mr. W. concluded by offering the following resolutions; which were read:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill repealing any law or laws making appropriations for the increase of the Navy of the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill calling home the squadron in the Mediterranean sea.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted, also, the following resolution to amend the rules, which lies on the table one day of course:

Resolved, That an additional standing committee be appointed, to be denominated "The Committee on Agriculture."

THE ARMY.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, rose and said, he was glad to see the course taken by his friend from North Carolina. His intention was to offer another resolution, pressing the same object still farther. Mr. F. had no hesitation in saying, that if the present tariff passed, from the effects he believed it would produce upon the country, that it would cause a radical change in all his opinions, as it regarded the Army and Navy of the United States. He felt it due to himself to say, that heretofore he had been friendly to the Army and Navy; but would rather dispense with both than oppress the country with a system of excise and taxes. He knew there was, some time ago, a political party in the United States, who thought that method most wise and best, of supporting the Government, which looked to direct taxes; but he was not one of that number; his antipathy to that system was still the same. The motion, therefore, which he was about to submit, proceeded from a strong conviction, that, unless we reduced our expenditures in this way, this oppressive and ruinous system, which we are threatened with, must very shortly be brought into operation, which will require at least eight or ten millions annually of direct tax—a sum which the community, in times of greater prosperity, could not bear, and, in these times of difficulty and distress, cannot be paid unless by a sacrifice of property, perhaps at less than a fifth of its value.

Mr. F. believed the revenues of the country would, for several years, be less and less; that each year would show a still greater deficit, until the trade of the world settled down to the proper point, which the wants and situation of all would ultimately determine. Whilst a navy could be of no use to us, having no commerce to protect, as we were about to become a nation of weavers, he could not think it necessary to retain that which formed so large a part of our expenditures. A few small vessels, to protect our coasting trade, whilst they took their manufactures to the South, and returned with cargoes of cotton, might be useful; more was unnecessary and burdensome, and must in a short time decay, and, with the tonnage of the country, disappear.

The Army, Mr. F. said, which likewise formed so large a portion of our expenses, could with much propriety be dispensed with. A few, very few, were necessary to take care of the fortifications which might be now finished, or which, by existing contracts or appropriations, may soon be so. The defence of every country, Mr. F. said, depended upon the security of a few important points, leaving the intermediate parts to be protected by movements from these points; though now, he believed, there would be still less cause to apprehend any thing from contact with other nations, as we were about to become manufacturers.

Mr. F. said, he did not see the necessity of an excise and direct taxes at the present time, particularly as the friends of the present measure seemed disposed to adopt the Chinese policy; an army and navy, under such circumstances, could only serve to remind us of what we once were. If there was war, or any necessity of the country, not resulting from a measure of our own, at this time, knowing it to lead directly to a system of internal taxation, he would vote for a tax as high as any gentleman would desire; but, when no necessity, in his opinion, did exist, he was averse to any thing of the sort. The particular distresses of the country, instead of prompting to impositions upon the people, required, in his opinion, great care and economy in the management of affairs, to avoid necessity for any new demands. He could not see the wonderful benefits which were to result to this people, from this Government, when they were made to feel heavy burdens to support an army and navy, which could have no other employment than protecting the weavers. This country, said Mr. F., is unlike any other; the General Government can have no subject of expense, but such as is truly national; an army, a navy, the civil list; the commerce of the country in time of peace, ought, if possible, to pay that expense, and not harass the citizen with two systems of taxation. If things were permitted to remain, the revenue of the country, with proper economy, would be, as it ought to be, equal to all the demands upon the Treasury. Mr. F. repeated, that in offering this resolution, he had no feeling hostile to the Army or Navy, but was actuated by a desire alone to reduce the expenditures of the nation, that if possible, the heavy taxes with which we were threatened, by the friends of the tariff, might be avoided. He said he had still a hope that this bill, fraught with evil, which he conceived it to be, which he saw would inevitably pass this House, would be arrested elsewhere. Mr. F. then submitted the following resolution, which was, on his motion, laid on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report a bill, reducing the Army of the United States to six thousand men, to consist of a due proportion of infantry, artillery, and riflemen.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

The engrossed bill to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage was read the third time.

Mr. BALDWIN remarked, that it would be recollected the bounty on pickled fish exported had been increased in Committee of the Whole, in consequence of an increase of the duty on imported sale—the duty on salt had subsequently been reduced, but it had been omitted at the same time to make a corresponding change in the bounty on pickled fish. He presumed there could be no objection now to make this amendment, and moved that the House agree thereto by general consent, (by which only an amendment can be made to a bill in the House on the third reading.)

The motion was objected to, and of course failed.

Mr. RHEA then rose and spoke about an hour against the passage of the bill.

Mr. SLOCUMB, of North Carolina, moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to reduce the duty on imported iron in bars, &c., from $1 25 to 75 cents per hundred weight.

This motion produced a debate of considerable duration, touching occasionally on the general merits of the bill, as well as on the expediency of committing the bill for the purpose proposed.

The motion to recommit the bill was advocated by MESSRS. SLOCUMB, PINCKNEY, SILSBEE, MERCER, NELSON, of Massachusetts, MORTON, SMITH, of North Carolina, LIVERMORE, FLOYD, HOLMES, and FOOT, and was opposed by MESSRS. KINSEY, SMITH, of Maryland, BALDWIN, STORRS, SERGEANT, and GROSS, of New York. The debate continued until about four o'clock.

Mr. KINSEY, of New Jersey, addressed the House as follows—

Mr. Speaker: Did I believe this item of the bill was either partial in its operation, or local in its effects, I should not, at present, oppose the motion; but, believing, as I do, that the increase of duty, as contemplated by the bill, is not more than necessary for the protection of one of the most valuable of our manufactures, I am necessarily compelled to oppose every attempt to withdraw from them that fostering protection they, at this time, so much require, to preserve those that are partially in operation, and resuscitate those that have gone to decay. The question, whether we shall give efficient protection to our manufactures of iron, is not confined to local or sectional districts, but spreads itself over the whole continent. Nature has extended the iron region through every State in greater quantity and superior quality than to any other portion of the globe; and it belongs to us, as the depository of the nation's highest interests, to seize the present opportunity to call into operation the dormant resources which a mistaken policy has discouraged in some instances, and in others neglected, to give energetic efficiency to this branch of national industry, so essential to our strength, wealth, and independence. "To be independent for the comforts of life, we must fabricate them ourselves," is a maxim of one of our greatest statesmen; it is a principle of national economy, self-evident, and admits not of a doubt; and yet, whilst the quantity made in the country is lessening, and our importations have very considerably increased, we are told no further protection is necessary; and several gentlemen from Massachusetts, with great plausibility of reasoning and apparent accuracy of calculation, have given you the cost of making a ton of bar iron, and, with the ore brought from New Jersey, have stated the cost at less than fifty dollars a ton; whilst, on the other hand, gentlemen of unimpeachable veracity, knowledge, and integrity, and, on a former occasion, under the sanctity of an oath, declared, that, in New Jersey, it cannot be produced under one hundred dollars per ton. Another gentleman from Massachusetts, denying all local prejudices, undertakes to show the impolicy of increasing the duty on iron, as it must operate against the interests of his constituents, in manufacturing nails, sprigs, and brads; forgetting that, on a former occasion, the duty was raised on sprigs and brads, on his own motion, from three cents per pound to five cents per thousand, equal, on sprigs of one thousand to the ounce, to eighty cents per pound, being an increase of seventy-seven cents per pound. This was again introduced into the present bill, and carried by a large majority. In answer to those gentlemen who contend that the manufacture of iron is a productive one, and, as some have attempted to prove, the most profitable of any other, I would call their attention to the quantity annually imported, and the decayed and dilapidated state of the works which, to the capitalist or adventurer, are like beacons to warn all from embarking in undertakings wherein so many have been shipwrecked, and where the mouldering monuments of political errors deter the industrious adventurer from a pursuit which has involved in loss and bankruptcy three-fourths of the individuals engaged in those useful and necessary establishments. Those districts which may be properly called the iron districts, and which for many years have supported a hardy, industrious, and enterprising race, have in a manner become depopulated, and where the busy hum of industry spread happiness and plenty, now meagre misery and want have usurped the place.

To those who contend that the protection contemplated by the present bill will eventually amount to a prohibition, and, by a course of reasoning (which I confess myself incapable of understanding) undertake to prove the present protection is too high, I have only to answer, we have imported the last year twenty thousand tons, and the present duty, though increased from forty-five to seventy-five cents per hundred weight, has had no effect in increasing the price to the consumer, decreasing the revenue, or lessening the quantity imported, which has continued to increase as our own has diminished. Thus, it is evident, contrary to the reasoning and cases stated by gentlemen, we are annually becoming more and more dependent on Europe for an article the most essential to our comfort, safety, and independence.

In travelling through those districts where once a brave, rugged, enterprising population thronged along those streams and rivers that propelled the works, and, by their productive labor, added to the national strength and wealth, a vigorous activity was manifest on every side, whilst increasing prosperity stamped cheerfulness on every countenance. At present, the withering blight of foreign competition has destroyed establishments which, for half a century, have been progressive, but, at present, are wholly abandoned, and we have become dependent on the industry of Europe for two million dollars of an article which could have been produced from our own mines and mountains by that labor which has been lost to the nation, and thousands of individuals, in place of being profitably employed, are, at present, burdensome to the community, and an industrious race of men have been forced from the place of their nativity, poor and penniless, to seek a subsistence in other districts, and by other avocations. Their knowledge in that art in which alone they were acquainted has become useless to themselves, and lost to the nation. Capitals to the amount of millions have sunk from society, which can never be restored. Thus has one of our most useful branches of industry been sacrificed at the shrine of commercial cupidity, whose advocates, not satisfied with those offerings which continue to paralyze the industry of the country, still insatiate cry, give! give! and tell you, by increasing duty on iron you increase the expense of ship building, on which they are desirous to make profit. Why will not gentlemen apply the same principles and doctrines in this as in other branches of labor, and buy their ships where they can procure them the cheapest? Must the whole interest of the nation continue to be taxed to support this commercial mania? It is time for this Government to turn its attention to those inestimable establishments resting on terra firma, which will lay the permanent basis of our future greatness and power on the solid foundation of national industry. Too long has this unsubstantial vision of commercial advancement misled the nation. She deserted, after leading us into a war; she will disappoint our expectations now we are at peace: yet, by her meretricious arts, she seeks to engross the whole of Governmental patronage, whilst the National Legislature, with maternal solicitude, seeks to shield her alone from all foreign competition. I fear the attempt will be a vain one, for, like the unstable element on which she rests, she will always continue to cast up mire and dirt. Is Government petitioned to aid the manufactures of the country—the friends of commerce exhibit to our view the wretched situation of the manufactures of England, and the gentleman from Massachusetts has, with a glowing figure, represented them by the type of hell itself. When commerce is spoken of, we are again presented with the picture of the fast-anchored isle as all-powerful and prosperous, and as the anchor of the world's last hope.

From whence originates this national sensibility to rights maritime, and this astonishing apathy to questions of the highest interest? Let the least fibre of our commercial interests be but approached, and the whole seaboard is roused as by touch electric; but when a policy is silently pursued, by which millions of capital are lost to the nation, and thousands of individuals reduced to bankruptcy and want, and whilst ruin is advancing with accelerated pace, the most stoical indifference is manifested, and many gentlemen have manifested more ingenuity in defining and describing the causes of the failures of manufactories, than they have discovered solicitude in seeking a remedy for the evil. The want of capital, the derangement of business on the withdrawal of the circulating medium—those causes had an effect; but the real cause was the want of support against foreign competition. The want of capital is disproved by the solicitude for loans and the low rate of interest: it arises not from the want of capital, but the uncertainty of returns of capitals employed. Was confidence restored to those branches of industry, capital would again revert to those channels which formerly presented a certain and most profitable return. What, then, is our present situation, and what can be done to call into operation the dormant resources of the country? Capital cannot, with any prospect of success, be employed in commerce, from the universal loss that has followed every species of foreign adventure; it cannot be employed in agriculture with any prospect of success, from the uncertainty of foreign demand; and the prospect of hope is barred in the channel of manufactures, from the threatened ruin awaiting them from foreign competition. We cannot, by any act, increase the demand for our surplus agricultural productions, as that must depend on the necessities of foreign nations. We cannot extend foreign commerce, as that depends on the caprice and contingencies of foreign Governments. But we can, and it is a duty incumbent on us, to call into operation millions of dormant, sunken, unproductive capital, already vested in the decayed and dilapidated manufactories of our country. Confidence restored to those once profitable establishments, the capitals retired from commerce and the unproductive labors of agriculture will find a sure and profitable employment; will, through this channel, return and give activity to national industry.

Notwithstanding the improved state of manufactures in England, Adam Smith has proven agriculture to be the most sure and profitable return of capital, as it is the only branch of labor over which she has control; not producing sufficient for her own subsistence, she is enabled to fix a standard value to the productions of this species of industry by her corn laws. The example of Britain, as it regards agriculture, is presented to us in manufactures; it is with us the only branch of industry to which we can give energy and efficiency, and over which we can, for many years, possess a powerful control. At the same time we give to the home trade increased activity and power, which is at all times the most lucrative and certain portion of our commerce. As in the trade with foreign nations, founded on reciprocity, the profits must be divided; therefore, one half the profits on the labor necessary to produce the article of exchange goes to the foreign merchant. Whereas, in exchanges between one State and another, the whole profit is saved to the country. Further, the capital required to carry on a foreign trade must always be greater than that necessary for the home trade, as the returns must be much slower, requiring in some instances one or two years; whereas, the home trade gives six or twelve returns in the same time. Thus, if the capitals are equal, the home trade will give twelve or even twenty-four times more encouragement to the industry of the country than the foreign trade; or, the one-tenth of the capital employed in the home trade will be more productive than ten times the same amount in foreign trade. This reasoning is proven to be correct by the situation of our country during the period of embargo, non-intercourse, and war. During the year 1814, when the exports, foreign and domestic, were short of seven millions, the price of all agricultural productions was more than double the price the last year, when our exports exceeded seventy millions. During the period first alluded to, an increased activity was given to internal industry; labor of all kinds was in demand and amply compensated; and, though foreign commerce was prostrate, the price of land and all kinds of agricultural productions was fifty per cent. above the year 1819, when an universal torpor seems to pervade every section of the country, and a paralysis has seized on all kinds of business and industry. The sympathy expressed by the advocates of commerce, for the interests of agriculture, is wholly unnecessary. The great agricultural States of New York and Pennsylvania, ever attentive to their true interests, and well acquainted with the sources of their wealth, have instructed their representatives to protect manufactures. The States of Ohio and New Jersey have unanimously done the same. Let us not be told that the agriculturist is opposed to manufactures; it is a libel on that noble and patriotic portion of the community. When did the farmer shrink from any deprivation or danger when the independence of his country was the stake to be contended for? Are the important events in our history so soon forgotten? In the last contest for our rights, maritime war, with all its evils, sacrifices, and deprivations, was submitted to, and met with a cheerfulness and dignity characteristic of the nation. The pride of independence, the hope of future prosperity, in imagination, painted some future good beyond the horizon of present ill; he was willing to sacrifice the expense of personal enjoyment for the gratifying triumph of national superiority, conscious he would sink more sweetly to the grave by leaving to his children the inheritance of liberty.

Sir, we are legislating for the same proud, calculating, brave yeomanry now, who are fully competent to estimate every act that increases the national strength or advances their future prospects. The friends of manufactures ask no sacrifices; they are alone solicitous to recall into operation millions of dormant sunken capital, which, whilst it recalls into active operation the paralyzed industry of the country, calls for the development of the sources of national wealth. The object of the present tariff is to make this country independent of the world, to lay the foundations of its future greatness on the solid basis of its own internal strength, and, from the profitable employment of the labor of the country, create durable riches. Keep firmly to your purposes and the voice of the Republic will sanction the act. By such a course of policy we disconnect ourselves from the entangling alliances of Europe, and become what we ought to be, a nation truly American. These observations were necessary, in answer to the several gentlemen who have endeavored to prove the interest of manufactures adverse to agriculture. But, with respect to the question immediately before the House, the increase of the duty on iron, it may be necessary to advert to the progress of the manufacture of that precious metal in other countries.

In Russia, from whence we derive our largest supply, when Peter the Great came to the empire, he found the iron manufactories in the possession of British agents, and the trade almost wholly monopolized by English merchants. Indignant at an usurpation so detrimental to the interests of his empire, he descended into the mines; he explored and estimated the advantages of those inexhaustible sources of wealth; he became a practical workman at the forge-hammer; he appropriated to the nation the wealth previously usurped by foreigners; and, in the short space of twenty-five years, was enabled, after supplying the wants of the nation, to export to England alone, and on account of Russian merchants, forty thousand tons of bar iron. About this period, Great Britain had ceased, in a measure, to make bar iron, and, from the apprehension of the destruction of the timber in the vicinity of the iron works, by various acts of Parliament, prohibited the making of iron within twenty miles of London, thirty miles of the Thames, and in a number of the counties throughout the kingdom; so that, thirty years ago, England manufactured not more than eighteen thousand tons of bar iron. But when it was discovered that, by a chemical preparation, the coal of her mines could be appropriated to the making of iron, her works increased to that extent, that she now is capable of manufacturing 300,000 tons annually. The history of this important manufacture, as now cited, and the progress it has made in those countries, ought to be the policy of this Government. The value and importance of the article is too well understood to undertake to prove it; suffice it to say, that, in a national point of view, it is essential to our independence and safety; individually, it is indispensable to the existence of civilized society. It now becomes necessary to show the former and present situation of those manufactories whose languishing condition threatens their total overthrow; also, that, with a proper encouragement, the works already erected are capable of furnishing a supply for the consumption of the country.

In 1810, according to Cox's tables, there were one hundred and forty furnaces in the United States; producing fifty-three thousand five hundred and forty tons per annum; equal in value to - - - - - $3,457,876

The number of forges, in the same year, was 459, making 27,051 tons bar iron, equal in value to - - - - - 3,104,697

Making a total product of - - - $6,562,573

From the statement of 1810 and the present year, in New Jersey, it appears that the quantity made last year is less than the former by upwards of two thousand tons, whilst, at the same time, the increased capacity, if sufficiently protected against foreign competition, is capable of producing nearly three times the quantity produced in 1810, and it is fair to presume the same will be the result throughout the Union. From the most accurate calculation made in 1816, the quantity of bar iron required for the consumption of the country, was little rising forty-eight thousand tons; the capacity of the country, if worked to the best advantage, was equal to forty-five thousand tons. From the depression of commerce, but little is required for ship-building; and, from the depressed state of manufactures, and all other kinds of business, it is presumable the quantity required for consumption, at present, is short of forty thousand tons. The quantity imported in 1816 was twenty-one thousand five hundred and thirty-seven, in the last year nearly the same amount; it is evident, therefore, the quantity imported is greater than the quantity produced in the country. Such, then, is the situation of those important establishments at present. Such are the gloomy prospects of those who are compelled to pursue a business, the profits of which are not commensurate with the toil and anxiety connected with so laborious an avocation. But all the property they possess consists in their works, mountains, and minerals. They have, therefore, been under the necessity of keeping so much in operation as to keep together a few workmen; conscious that the inestimable value of those establishments, in a national point of view, would eventually receive that support, from an enlightened Legislature, as would render them conducive to individual advantage. Had those useful establishments received the early patronage of Government, and not have been suffered to go to decay, it is true, a protecting duty, something less than is now contemplated, might probably have been sufficient; but the duty laid by the first tariff not only failed in protecting, but hastened to ruin a great portion of those useful works. It becomes necessary, therefore, at the present, to give stimulus and excitement sufficient to recall into operation every establishment where iron can be made. The protecting the making of iron is as necessary for our national safety, as the erection of the fortifications along the seaboard, or the increase of that proud Navy to which we look up with so much confidence and pride.

And as the labor necessary to produce the article must eventually fix its relative value, a home competition will, in a short time, bring the article to the consumer at its lowest rate possible; and, in place of being dependent on foreign nations for one of the first necessities of civilized life, we will, in a short time, be able to make it a valuable article of export.

Of furnaces we have sufficient to supply all the pigs and castings required for our wants, in some instances, of a quality superior in tenacity and excellence to any in the world. It becomes us, then, as the guardians of the nation's interests and safety, to proceed with an unflinching hand, and to let the embarrassing speculation of no theorist affect the energy of our purposes; and, by passing the present tariff entire, assure the desponding halting manufacturer the strong arm of the Government will protect him, and that he may advance forward with a confidence of success. Too long has foreign trade assumed a credit and distinction which it never was entitled to. It has misled the policy of our Legislatures, and turned their attention from the solid strength and resources of the country; and, instead of exhibiting those expanding views becoming to the legislators of a great empire, they have, in too many instances, dwelt into all the narrowness of counting-house calculators. How comes it that commerce or foreign trade should be erected into a kind of necessary fabric, that we must not touch it, or, at least, with cautious, trembling delicacy?

The advocates of commerce have unjustly represented manufactures as unfavorable to agriculture and foreign trade. This is not the case. Manufactures are the surest support of agriculture; and our commerce in future must depend on the antecedent ability of the consumer, and not on the misery and convulsed state of European nations. The profits of our foreign trade must resolve itself into the previous wealth and ability of the country. The merchant must be paid by the inland consumer; his profits must be derived from an antecedent wealth, that exists independently of himself, which wealth must depend on the value of the labor of the country; which again resolves itself into the absolute value of the surplus product of the whole labor of the nation. If, therefore, the value of the exportable surplus be reduced to one half its former value, the amount of the whole profit of the foreign trade must be reduced proportionably, as you then direct the labor of the country to a more profitable and extended employment. By the extension and protection of manufactures, you increase the ability and capacity of the country for commercial enterprise. The wealth of the country consists in the absolute value of the amount, and not in the quantity, of its products. If we increase the amount of our agricultural productions to an excess over what we can dispose of or consume, it would have been better they had not been produced. The amount of our imports, consequently, depends on the value of our exports, and the extension of our commerce must be regulated by the capacity and wealth of the consumer; for it must be recollected that the price of the imported article embraces in it not only the profit of the merchant importer, but that of the different capitalists engaged in manufacturing the article in foreign countries: the profit of the foreign capitalist eventually resolves itself into the wealth of the consumer in this country. And should foreign trade be annihilated, this wealth would remain in the country, and be transferred to another purpose.

APRIL, 1820.

Revision of the Tariff.

H. OF R.

The loss of our foreign trade, to which some look with fearful apprehensions, whilst it annihilates the exportation of our surplus produce, annihilates, at the same time, the foreign article of luxurious accommodation. If the want of a profit on our export trade is to be accounted loss to the country, the reserving that profit which we paid away to foreign capitalists and manufacturers must be calculated a great gain to the country; the one balances the other, and there is no loss. The profits on one article of exports, which heretofore went to support the merchant, manufacturer, and foreign capitalist, in those countries, (from which our exports are at present excluded,) are reserved at home, and we have but to remove the manufacturer to our own country, and the whole profit is divided between the manufacturer, agriculturist, and inland consumer; it exists in the country; it gives to national industry an increased efficiency, and is a greater source of wealth and affluence than before. Does a nation become poorer by the loss of its foreign trade? It depends on the cause to which that loss is to be attributed. If it is destroyed by a voluntary change in the demand of our home consumption, from articles of foreign to articles of home manufacture, the nation has not become poorer.

We lose the foreign luxury for articles more adapted to our wants and interests; the nation has become richer; it has increased its resources and enjoyments; it has directed the labor of the country to articles of usefulness, and embraces the power of maintaining a greater portion of labor than before: and it is from labor issues imperishable riches, pure enjoyments, good morals, social prosperity, and individual happiness. Too long have we extended our views beyond the horizon of our own country for our future prosperity and greatness. For national wealth, we must call into operation the dormant resources of the fossil, mineral, and vegetable kingdoms. For defence and safety we must depend on the hard-fisted yeomanry, mechanics, and manufacturers of the country. For our weapons of war, to the rich iron mines universally extended over this wide-spread continent. Is the proud enjoyment of safety and independence to be balanced by dollars and cents? I cannot listen with patience for a moment to this mercantile per cent. calculation. We have the power, and it becomes the policy and duty of this House to save from the cruel ignominy of disgrace and poverty thousands of meritorious individuals. How cold-blooded the heart that can behold unmoved the distressing scenes that every moment, and from every direction, press upon the view, and can, with unfeeling hardihood, reject the supplications, and refuse to listen to the reasoning, of those numerous petitioners that call for protection and support! Away with this merciless spirit; let it be banished to the cheerless, grovelling bosom of the commercial foreign calculator. It becomes us to elevate our views in proportion to the vastness of our territory; to calculate the sum of our enjoyments from the variety of our climates, and the grandeur of our future destiny from the majestic conformation of our empire, to the justice and wisdom of our institutions for the preservation of our freedom, and to the God of Heaven for a continuance of our union and happiness. I will not be led further into debate, but vote decidedly against striking out this important item of the bill.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. RICH made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate to the District Bank bill was this morning agreed to; but before the question was taken, a motion was made to adjourn; and, about 5 o'clock, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, May 1.

Mr. DICKINSON presented a petition of sundry merchants and traders residing in various places in the interior of the State of New York, and other States, assembled in the city of New York, praying that a duty, not exceeding ten per centum, may be imposed on all sales at auction; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill laying duties on sales of merchandise at auction in certain cases.—Referred.

Mr. STREET, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens and Austin L. Sands, legal representatives of Richardson Sands, deceased, and others," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SILSSEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to prevent the commanders and other officers in the naval service of the United States from accepting of any present or emolument, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State, and for other purposes; which was read twice, amended at the Clerk's table, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

BOARD OF NAVY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. SILSSEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the act establishing a board of Commissioners of the Navy, as to make the Secretary of the Navy, for the time being, the presiding officer of that board; and also of so limiting the tenor of the commissions of the members thereof, as to secure the accumulating experience and talents of our naval commanders in that department, by a periodical rotation in office, made a report thereon, stating that it is inexpedient at this time to make any modification of the act under which the said board of Commissioners is established; which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.—The report is as follows:

MAY, 1820.

Adjournment of Congress.

H. OF R.

The Committee on Naval Affairs have, according to order, had under consideration a resolution directing an inquiry "into the expediency of so modifying the act establishing a board of Commissioners of the Navy, as to make the Secretary of the Navy, for the time being, the presiding officer of that board; and also of so limiting the tenor of the commissions of the members thereof, as to secure the accumulating experience and talents of our naval commanders in that department, by a periodical rotation in office;" and submit the following report: 'The act, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts for establishing a Navy Department, by adding thereto a Board of Commissioners," provides that the board so constituted shall be attached to the office of the Secretary of the Navy, and, under his superintendence, shall discharge all the duties therein specified; and that the record of their proceedings shall at all times be subject to his inspection.

As it would be often inconvenient, and sometimes impracticable, for the Secretary of the Navy to meet the Board of Commissioners, as their presiding officer, without neglecting other and more important duties, and as the Secretary is, by the aforesaid act, already vested with a supervising and controlling power of the acts and proceedings of the Board of Commissioners, the committee do not perceive the necessity of such a modification of the said act as is contemplated by the first inquiry directed by the resolution, or that the public service would be benefited thereby.

The committee are the more disposed to this opinion from the consideration that the limits of jurisdiction between the Secretary and the Board seem to be perfectly understood by each, and that no conflicting claims exist between them on this subject.

The committee are not advised whether the resolution contemplates the Secretary to be a constituent part of the board, and at the same time possessed of the control and superintendence of its proceedings, or merely the presiding officer, with a casting vote. In the latter case, the benefit to be derived from the superintendence of one officer over others, under distinct responsibilities, as well as the circumspection naturally resulting from such responsibility, would be entirely lost. In the former case the Commissioners would be little more than advisory, and, in that proportion, bereft of responsibility.

In relation to the second inquiry directed by the resolution, viz: "of so limiting the tenor of the commissions of the members of the Board of Commissioners, as to secure the accumulating experience and talents of our naval commanders in that department, by a periodical rotation in office," the committee beg leave to remark, that the duties of the Commissioners of the Navy Board are not merely such as appertain to a mere naval officer, but extend to other and important subjects, with which such officers cannot be supposed to be familiarly acquainted; they relate not only to the contracting for, and procurement of, all articles necessary for the armament, equipment, and provisioning of the public ships, but also to the constructing and repairing of those ships, to effectuate which objects, in the cheapest and best manner, requires a full knowledge, not only of the places at which materials and every thing needful for these purposes can most advantageously be procured, but also with persons in different sections of the country with whom they can, with the greatest reliance, make their contracts. The investigation of the committee has led them to the conclusion, that too much time has not yet been allowed to the present Commissioners, to obtain that intelligence and experience which is desirable to the most advantageous discharge of these duties, and to perfect such a system in their department, as will unfold to their successors all the advantages of their labors which, in the estimation of the committee, have been such as are honorable to themselves, and highly beneficial to the public interest.

The committee would only add, that a periodical rotation in office, from a given number, would preclude choice. Such a rotation, instead of "securing the accumulating experience and talents of our naval commanders," might possibly endanger the board with qualifications opposite from those intended.

Under these impressions, the committee are of opinion that, although occasional changes in the Board of Commissioners may, and probably would, be productive of public benefit, yet that these changes may with safety be left to the discretion of the Executive; and therefore that it is inexpedient at this time to make any modification of the act under which the said Board of Commissioners is established.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

A motion was made by Mr. ROBERTSON, that the committee to which is referred the resolution from the Senate, fixing a period for the termination of the present session of Congress, be discharged from the further consideration thereof; and, the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the affirmative.

The House then proceeded to consider the said resolution, when Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend the same, by striking out "24th day of April next," and inserting "8th of May, instant."

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to insert "15th of May, instant," instead of the time proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved that the resolution lie on the table; which motion was negatived.

Mr. LITTLE then moved to postpone the resolution until Monday next; when

Mr. TRIMBLE moved that it lie on the table; which motion was negatived by yeas and nays—76 votes to 75.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. LITTLE, that the resolution be postponed until Monday next, and decided in the negative by yeas and nays—98 votes to 60.

Mr. BALDWIN then moved that the resolution be recommitted to the select committee, who have been this day discharged from its further consideration.

Upon this motion, and those which preceded it, there was a great deal of debate on the points; first, whether the business necessary to be done could be transacted by Monday next; and, secondly, whether the fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress would have a tendency to accelerate the progress of public business. The latter point was generally conceded, but the discussion ended in the motion being postponed to Wednesday, on motion of Mr. HOLMES, on the ground that, in the mean time, such information might be in possession of members as would enable them to decide more understandingly on the day at which it would be practicable, with a due regard to the public interest, to adjourn.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of John H. Piatt was called up; but on the question the House refused, by a small majority, now to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The House then proceeded to the unfinished business. The first subject in order was a motion, made on Saturday last, to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment of the Senate to the District bank bill was agreed to.

Mr. MERCER supported, at considerable length, the motion for reconsideration. In the course of his speech, though he admitted there was some difference of opinion among those interested on the subject of the bill which passed this House, it was, he contended, such a difference of opinion as would exist in regard to any legislation which might be proposed in regard to these banks, and was not such as to outweigh the considerations in favor of the bill, &c. He examined, in detail, the state of the banks, and showed it to be such as, compared with that of banks in other parts of the Union, was highly favorable to them. He was of opinion, on the whole, that the question respecting these banks had better be decided now than postponed to the next session, which would be the effect of finally accepting the amendment of the Senate.

The motion for reconsideration was opposed by Messrs. McCoy and Southard, on the ground that the bill, as amended by the Senate, afforded, on the one hand, every indulgence the banks had a right to expect, and on the other would, if the banks were to be further renewed, allow of time to devise a system for that purpose, which should be generally satisfactory to the stockholders.

The question for reconsideration was decided in the negative—63 to 54. The question is, therefore, settled in both Houses of Congress; and the bill, as it has passed, and requires only the signature of the President to become a law, is in the shape in which it was put by the Senate.

CASH DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for regulating the mode of collecting duties on imports, and for other purposes.

The motion to strike out the first section of the bill being under consideration, the unnamed gentlemen delivered their sentiments for and against the principle of the bill, viz:

For the bill—Messrs. McLEAN, of Kentucky, BALDWIN, and CLAY. Against the bill—Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, SETTLE, BURTON, SIMKINS, RHEA, and HARDIN.

Mr. BURTON, of North Carolina, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, as this may be viewed as a part of that general system of measures on which there has been so much discussion, perhaps an attempt to address you may be considered an unnecessary consumption of your time; for I freely confess that neither my habits or pursuits in life, or the local situation of that part of the Union which I have the honor to represent, have ever led me to a critical examination of commercial subjects. We are mostly an agricultural people, content to live upon the product of the soil. But, sir, I most conscientiously believe that we have arrived at that eventful period of our history when the destiny of this great nation is to be fixed; and this Republic, which has hitherto been the pride of the American, and the admiration of the civilized world, is to be shaken to its centre. Whether it will survive the shock, time alone can determine. Could I, by any feeble effort on my part, throw but a dust in the scale to save my country, it is all to which my humble talents aspire.

What is the momentous question now presented to the nation? It is nothing more nor less than that we should change that order of things under which the most of us have been raised, and for which we feel a parental attachment; and, like other redoubtable knights, famed in story, go in quest of new adventures. And I beg gentlemen to remember that we, too, may come in contact with windmills. Do we not know that, in all material changes, in any system of government, we have continually to contend with the prejudices of the people; for such is the human mind, what at first may be viewed almost with indifference, in process of time becomes a beaten track, from which we are driven with the greatest difficulty. I will ask, what has been the character of the leading measures of the present session? Have they not been calculated to rouse local feelings and jealousies? Are gentlemen determined to persist in this course at the risk of all consequences? Are they apprized, that, at every step of this mode of legislation, we are weakening the bonds by which we are united? For, let the Government once lose the affections of the people, and there is an end of its existence. Has not this rock, so well calculated to destroy our political ark, been distinctly pointed out by that able pilot, the Father of his Country? And if his warning voice cannot change your course, could I speak with the sound of an angel's trumpet it would be in vain. I am afraid, sir, we have too much of that restless spirit inherent in man, the common lot of frail humanity, and, like the ancient Jews, that favored nation of Heaven, not content even with a theocracy, but led astray by the example of the idolatrous nations by which they were surrounded, they, too, must have a King—we, who have hitherto spurned, with disdain, the Governments and policy of the Old World, as unfit for the freeborn sons of America, are now about to adopt that part of their system which, in my poor judgment, will sap the foundation of our present happy institutions.

We are told that France and England protect and encourage manufactories, and that we must become manufacturers as the road to wealth and independence. Have gentlemen been sufficiently attentive to passing events, to be serious in giving this advice? The honorable gentleman from Delaware has told us that the causes of the present distressed situation of England had originated in the numerous wars in Europe, in which she had taken such a conspicuous part. With great cheerfulness I bestow my pittance of applause on the learning and ingenuity of that honorable gentleman; but, knowing the fallibility of the human understanding, and that the most learned men have erred, I cannot help thinking that this is one of those few cases in which that gentleman's judgment has failed him.

MAY, 1820.

H. OF R.

It was only necessary for him to have gone a step further to have discovered that these wars had grown out of a system of measures pursued by the individual who then ruled the destinies of France, to exclude from the continent of Europe the manufactures of Great Britain. So that, turn the subject as you will, we still have presented to our view this all-devouring monster, which, like Aaron's rod, is about to swallow up every other interest in the community.

What, then, is the situation of England, with all her protecting duties, premiums, &c.? It is true there are individuals who have amassed great wealth; but it is equally true that the larger proportion of the people who, it is contended, are to be benefited by manufactures, are ground in the dust. Are not our newspapers filled with assassinations and conspiracies to destroy those Governments which are giving their subjects all the blessings of immense manufacturing establishments?

It has been stated by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BALDWIN,) who has certainly given us an excellent specimen of that talent, the making the most of a bad cause, and to which, I have no doubt, he is in some small degree indebted for that professional reputation to which I believe him justly entitled, that commerce, agriculture, and manufactures were at their lowest ebb, and that this was an evidence of the rottenness of our present system; and from which it would seem that he inferred that the only way to retrieve our situation is by the establishment of manufactures. To say nothing of the injustice of that system which should sacrifice the interest of the residue of the community for the benefit of any particular class, I will ask, what is the situation of those nations who have turned their attention to those mines of wealth—manufacturing establishments? Are they in a better situation than we are? Are not their subjects goaded and driven to desperation? Are they not ready to turn upon those who, gentlemen would induce us to believe, had been their greatest benefactors, by bestowing upon them these great blessings, this source of wealth and happiness to a nation—manufactories? Can we not, then, find some other cause for our embarrassment, independent of the system of revenue which has been adopted by the Government? May it not be fairly ascribable to that great revolution which had convulsed the nations of Europe, and more or less had its effect on every nation throughout Christendom, which had thrown from their channel all the ordinary pursuits of life; and since the happening of which event, they have not again had time to seek their proper level? For this unnatural state of things, (if it may be so called,) we have had many remedies prescribed—the most conspicuous of which was the banking system, which, like a fairy dream, was to build splendid cities, without capital, and we were to live in the most sumptuous manner, without labor and without exertion. What has been the result? Need I state to this honorable body, when we have been assailed with a general cry for a bankrupt law, from Boston to New Orleans, and there is a universal complaint of the greatest distress from Maine to Louisiana?

And what security have we that this new scheme of wealth and independence may not prove equally fallacious? Is this the time for trying experiments? I have always understood that when an individual was hard pressed in his circumstances, that nothing but economy and industry would save him: and will not the same rules which are applicable to the proper management of the affairs of an individual, apply with equal justice to the affairs of a Government?

If, like many new beginners, we have lived beyond our income, should we not curtail our expenditure, and live within our means? No prudent man would think of trying experiments until he had spare capital; and I hope this nation will not depart from a rule founded in so much good sense. It was my intention to have gone more at length into an examination of this subject; but, sir, as any thing I could say might only have a tendency to obscure those luminous views of the subject already taken by the honorable gentlemen from Virginia and South Carolina, I forbear to make any additional remark, except to answer an argument used in the course of the debate, which has not been noticed by any other person: that is, that this protection to manufactures might be considered in the nature of a voluntary tax, at the option of our citizens to pay or not. To which I will reply, that, during the French Revolution, it was recommended to that nation to have but one tax, and that, too, should be entirely voluntary—that is, a tax upon breathing. Now, sir, although a number of these articles might have been luxuries in the first instance, to wit: tea, sugar, coffee, molasses, &c., yet, from long habit, (if I may be pardoned the expression,) they may now be considered a part of our constitution, and we should almost as soon think of living without the use of air.

Mr. SETTLE rose, and said, the bill before the Committee proposes a radical change in the system for collecting the revenue, by discontinuing the credit, hitherto allowed by law, on bonds for duties, in most cases; in others, greatly shortening the time of credit. He said, before he proceeded to consider the history of the present system, and some of the principal bearings and consequences of the proposed change, he would take the liberty to deny any analogy which the advocates of the bill had attempted to establish between the case of credit for public lands and that for duties. He said, in the former, the debt of the Government was constantly increasing with great rapidity, and annual applications have been made, and will continue to be made, to Congress, for a further extension of credit. This extension of credit we have hitherto granted. In the latter, if the debt has, in a small degree, increased, no applications have been made to extend the credit, except in some few extraordinary cases, such as the Savannah sufferers, when, he said, we should not have done injustice by wholly remitting the duties. In the former, by dividing the quarter section of land, the poor man is enabled to procure eighty acres, if he can raise an hundred dollars; he has, therefore, increased advantages in coming into the market, in competition with the adventurous speculator. Under the proposed change, all the advantages which large will give over small capitals, will be enjoyed by the large capitalist over the young, enterprising, and industrious merchants of our country, with small capitals, who depend as much, or more, on their skill and perseverance, as on their capitals; and these advantages will be given to the foreign capitalist over all the merchants of our country. But, he said, the principal and characteristic difference between the two cases was this: in the former, when the people in those States and Territories, in which the Government hold lands, became generally indebted to it, and when a wish, produced by the principles of self-defence and self-interest, prevailed amongst those people to obtain a further extension of credit, then, under such circumstances, the land itself would become the most dangerous and unsafe security the Government could hold. The friends of the law, changing the mode of disposing of the lands of the Government, have endeavored to prevent the possible occurrence of such a state of things, without inflicting injury or inconvenience on any portion of our citizens; none of those principles which argued strongly in favor of the alteration, in that law, have any application to the present bill. He said, he therefore denied that the decision of the House, in that case, was entitled to any influence on our deliberations on the present question; and he would feel much gratified to hear, on this occasion, from the same quarter, the eloquent description of agriculture, and the superior contentment, happiness, and patriotism, of agriculturists, which we are favored with on the former.

H. OF R.

Cash Duties on Imports.

MAY, 1820.

He said, the Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, (Mr. BALDWIN,) in the course of his remarks on this bill, some days since, referred to several petitions, of sundry merchants, and asked the committee if the merchants, whose interests was so warmly defended, might be permitted to decide this question. Mr. S. said, he believed those who opposed the bill might safely answer, and tell the honorable member, the merchants may decide, but, before it is determined that the decision is binding, it should be ascertained that a majority of the merchants have expressed an opinion favorable to the proposed change, not the merchants of one or two cities alone.

Mr. S. said, he presumed that the member would not pretend to say, a majority of the merchants had petitioned for the change proposed by this bill. Then, for what purpose is it asked, whether the merchants may decide this question? He said, the long petition which had been presented during this discussion, and which was extended from one side of the hall to the other, contains no prayer or wish for the contemplated change, but only a prayer for the imposition of a tax on sales at auction. Why, then, he asked, this great display of petitions, having no application to the present question? He said he would suppose, for a moment, a fact, which did not exist, that the majority of merchants had expressed an opinion favorable to the provisions of the present bill; he then would ask, if the bargain was to be concluded on by and between the manufacturers and merchants, without consulting the great agricultural interest of the Union? This interest will be materially affected by the operations of the proposed change, which, he said, he hoped would not take place until that interest had an opportunity to speak and be heard. Mr. S. said the system which is now offered to be changed was one of acknowledged excellence, and whose utility had been sanctioned by the experience of many years; under its operations, agriculture, commerce, and, he said, he would add manufactures, had increased and prospered to an unexampled extent. But it has been said, by the advocates of this bill, the Congress have at various times interfered, and changed this system. Mr. S. said, it was true, as our agriculture and commerce increased and as the latter had found and cut various and diversified channels, Congress have interposed and gradually extended the credit for duties. How, he asked, do the advocates of this bill wish to improve the system? He said, by reversing the policy by which the Government has hitherto been influenced.

Mr. S. said he would call the attention of the Committee to the amount of the revenue collected under the present system from customs. He said the Committee had been referred to it before, in the course of this discussion, and he made the call only for the reason that he believed it became necessary, in passing on to the point he had in view. He said, from the 4th of March, 1789, to 30th June, 1819, from customs alone has been collected the sum of $318,738,161 02. This enormous amount of revenue has been collected from the people, and, owing to its equality and justice, they have scarcely felt it; and he said it might be asserted, without the fear of contradiction, that it has been collected with less loss and expense under the present system than it could have been under any other. He said the sum collected, within the same period, from internal revenue, direct taxes, postage or letters, sales of public lands, and miscellaneous, but little exceeds fifty-five millions of dollars; and, he said, the people of this Union had evinced infinitely more discontent under the collection of the latter than under that of the first mentioned sum. Mr. S. said, he would here ask what this Government had been enabled to do with the revenue collected principally from customs? He said, he would say principally from customs, because the amount collected from every other source is little, indeed, when compared to that collected from customs. He said it must be answered, with it the Government has been enabled to redeem our national debt, which we owed at the close of the Revolution, with unexampled rapidity; with it the Government has built and equipped a navy, which, in its infancy, has become the pride and boast of our country; and secured for us the respect and admiration of the world; with it the Government has been enabled to adopt the policy of France, in great and expensive maritime fortifications; and, with it, provision has been made for the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war, who are poor, at an expense little short of $3,000,000. He said, he would say nothing of our standing army, the splendid and costly public edifices which have been erected, and our ability to relieve the people from the burden of taxation at the close of the late war; but would content himself in saying the Government had been enabled to do every thing which contributed to national defence, the happiness and prosperity of the people. Mr. S. said, he had not pursued this method in his remarks to secure for the present system the veneration, or even the respect, of those gentlemen who look on it as unsound and rotten, and who would place their hands on it to consign it to destruction; but solely for the purpose of arriving at the point on which the opposers of this bill can stand erect, and say to its supporters, hands off, touch not the present system, unless you can show considerable evils arising out of it, or advantages to be derived from the proposed change; and, if you cannot, as you have not, pointed out any evils arising from the present system, before you ask us for the change, give us not guesses, give us not calculations, merely conjectural, but give us certainty, or something approximating certainty, in your calculations, of advantages to be derived from this change.

Mr. S. said he hoped the Committee would bear in mind how the supporters of this bill approach the present system; they begin by giving us feeling descriptions of the pecuniary embarrassments under which our citizens are laboring. He said he would not say, as he certainly did not believe, gentlemen exaggerated in their representations of the distresses of the people; but he would say, they had been stated here, and by those who have written on measures with which this bill has connexion, to the full extent to which they exist. He said, it had been stated, by one of these writers, that numbers of our citizens, possessed of valuable talents, and disposed to be useful, but unable to find employment, are migrating to Cuba, where, under a despotic government, among a population principally of slaves, and subject to the horrors of the inquisition, they seek an asylum from the distress they suffer here. Mr. S. said he did not advert to this statement to question its correctness, but to show the avarice and cupidity with which these manufacturers have been governed. He asked what encouragement, what inducements, must the Congress hold out to these men, to retain them here; men who, eagerly in pursuit of gain, will leave this country, where civil liberty is enjoyed to the full extent to which human wisdom can improve it; where little or no taxes are paid; where provisions and raw materials are selling for nothing, when compared with former prices; and where labor is high, and go to Cuba? Must we, said he, in order to retain them, pass the tariff bill, the bill now before us, and the bill to impose a tax on sales at auction? Are we to pay them this price, at the expense of the other great interest of society? And can it be said, we shall not, at no distant period, be called on by them to go to the ultimatum mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TYLER,) and pay them premiums and bounties on exportation? He said he hoped the supporters of the bill would give those who differed from them in opinion time to reflect five or six months, within which we can deliberate and determine how far we must go in the encouragement of domestic manufactures, and within which the great agricultural and commercial interests of the country can speak and be heard.

Mr. S. said he would here tell the supporters of the bill, they had made no progress in proving the necessity or propriety of the proposed change by their representations of the pecuniary embarrassments of the people; for, with this weapon, they may, with equal propriety and expectation of success, attack any, the most fixed principles of our Government; under these, as well as under the system you are about to change, have our pecuniary distresses taken place. He said, however great, in general, our inclination may be to innovation, and however fixed may be the opinion of some, that no change can be for the worse, he would not touch the present system, unless the friends of the change can show our present embarrassments arise out of this system. He said, when the friends of the bill had been called on to point out the source from which our pecuniary distresses arise, they say from the want of sufficient protection to domestic industry; which words, he said, according to their late signification, (since the rejection of all the principles and maxims of the most approved writers on political economy,) mean nothing more or less, in the sense in which they are pressed on us, than domestic manufactures. He said the friends of the present bill argue that the repeal of the present system will contribute to the protection of domestic, by lessening the importations of foreign manufactures, from the great importations of which, our embarrassments have principally arisen. The friends of this bill further say, that foreign manufactures have been imported into this country, and sold at prices far below those at which they are purchased at the place of manufacture. Mr. S. said it appeared more probable that such a trade would ruin the sellers than injure the buyers, and that it could not continue long without ruin to the foreign importer, and to his Government, if supported by it. He said it appeared, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the amount of importations had greatly decreased. This fact, taken in connexion with the general assertion that our country is inundated with foreign goods, proves that the people have recommenced habits of economy without legislative coercion. He said he would ask, whether the importation of foreign goods had any agency in raising the price of lands from fifty to an hundred per cent., and that of all property in the same, or a greater proportion? He said it was well known that this great and rapid increase of price had taken place in most parts of the Union. He could speak more particularly of North Carolina; there, on the rivers, land had risen, within the last five or six years, from one hundred to an hundred and fifty per centum, and continued so until about twelve months since, and then, unimproved, half our lots in new towns established on the rivers, sold at six and eight thousand dollars each. No one, he said, would pretend to say that importations of foreign goods had produced this rapid increase of price in property. Mr. S. said our embarrassments arose, not from importations of foreign goods, but from other and distinct causes. They arose from the great number of banks which have inundated our country with their paper, at one period, and the necessity they were under, at another, to withdraw large quantities of that paper from circulation, to give currency to the residue; from that insatiable thirst most men have for speculation and profit, which makes them measure their wants and necessities by the degrees of facility with which they can obtain money; and from the pecuniary embarrassments of those countries with which we have carried on our principal commerce. He said, on this point, he would refer to the petition of the citizens of Pike county, Pennsylvania, lately addressed to their legislature, in which they state, at no period since the Revolution has greater distress been felt than at the present moment. We consider the banking system to have been the principal cause. Instead of becoming, as was predicted, blessings to the people, banks have become, like the scorpions amongst the children of Israel, a curse to the people, and perfect beasts of prey. He said he referred to this, as expressive of his own opinion, and he believed that of the people generally, in relation to the injuries which have arisen from the banking system, in the extent to which it has existed. He said he would repeat, that our pecuniary embarrassments have not arisen from the system for collecting duties, the repeal of which is now considered necessary in affording due protection to domestic manufactures; but from other and distinct causes, which he had endeavored to assign. He said it was not to be expected, when the friends and opposers of the bill differed so widely in relation to the causes of our embarrassments, that there should be an agreement between them in relation to the remedy.

Mr. S. said the friends of the bill have said, during this debate, that commerce had been stimulated above health point; and they tell us commerce and agriculture are now prostrate, nearly bloodless and lifeless; and, he asked, what was the remedy proposed? Sir, it is copious bleeding, severe blistering, and cupping. Yes, sir, with the tariff bill they wish to bleed; with the bill before us blister; and, he supposed, with the auction bill, as it is called, cup agriculture and commerce, to restore them to health and vigor. He said it was unnecessary to dispute about the skill of the advocates for this change—of that he would say nothing; but the remedy proposed in such a case, was so unnatural, so opposed to every principle of reason, and he had come near saying common sense, he hoped the Committee would prevent its application.

Mr. S. said, should the bill pass, it will, in its operation, draw from circulation into the Treasury, in one year, about double the sum which would be drawn in under the present system, if the amount of importations should not be materially lessened. The prospective payments into the Treasury from bonds, for twelve months, would amount to about twenty millions of dollars. The amount of duties accruing during the same period, and payable in cash, under a supposition that importations were not lessened, may be stated at twenty millions of dollars more. He said the country was not at this time able to bear such a contribution; it would greatly injure, if not destroy, every branch of national industry. Our manufacturing industry would be as much injured by it as any other interest. He said, it was a correct principle in government to leave in the pockets of the people their money, until it became necessary, to attain the legitimate objects of the Government, to call it out. The people are better qualified, until the necessity for this call exists, to employ their money most to their own advantage, and that of the Government itself.

He said, if the bill was intended as a measure to increase the revenue, and supply the defect in the Treasury, he would tell its supporters it would do no such thing, it will greatly lessen importations, by withdrawing a large capital from commerce, and consequently lessen the revenue. He said, by giving up the present system, we shall lose one on which there is infinitely more certainty of calculation than on that for which it is offered to be changed. He said, we should not sacrifice our patrimony in expectancy, for a little ready cash, nor cut after the golden egg prematurely.

He said, if the bill was intended as a measure to encourage domestic manufactures, then, in addition to the objection that it will draw such large sums of capital from circulation, he would say it operated unequally; for it is as efficacious in preventing the importation of those articles to which we have no objection, as it is in preventing the importation of those which it may be our interest to exclude.

Mr. S. said, he viewed this bill as forming a part of a great system for the encouragement of domestic manufactures, and expressed a hope that the Committee would indulge him while he noticed, and attempted a reply to some of the principal arguments urged in favor of its passage. He said it had been argued that it was the duty of all governments to employ their idle population in useful labor, and it was the duty of this so to encourage domestic manufactures, as to call into their employment that portion of our population which is now idle. He said it was true, that it is to the interest of all Governments that their population should be usefully employed, and that it is desirable we should have no idle and useless citizens; to effect this, he said, it was the duty of Government to secure to each individual the free and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property, and to leave him free to engage in the labor of his choice; and, he said, there is no doubt he will engage in that employment in which he believes he can most benefit his own interest, and, consequently, that of his country. But suppose, sir, said he, we attempt to invite to labor that portion of our citizens who wish to engage in manufactures, by encouragement to domestic manufactures, at the expense of agriculture and commerce, we shall then employ actively one man in twenty, and lessen, if not destroy, the industry and enterprise of the other nineteen of all our population. He said it certainly could not be believed we should add to the sum total of national industry, by giving this extraordinary encouragement to domestic manufactures. We should have all the branches of national industry on an equal footing, and not give one a preference over the others. He said, no Government which will interfere with national industry, and give one branch of it a preference over the other, to draw private capital from one channel to another, can justify that interference on any other principle than that the people cannot, or will not pursue their own interest, and that they are incompetent in the management of their private individual affairs. These principles, he said, however true they might be in other countries, were not true in relation to the people of this country.

Mr. S. said, it had been stated in this debate that manufactures flourished during the war, but peace destroyed them. He said if this statement proved any thing, it was the want of congeniality of interest between domestic manufactures and the other branches of national industry; that the blasts which brought pestilence and death to all other branches of industry, were pleasant zephyrs to manufactures. He said he regretted to hear this statement; he had always believed, and still believed, the three great branches of national industry could live and flourish together; and they will, unless the avarice and cupidity of those engaged in the one require and obtain too great sacrifices from those pursuing the others.

Mr. S. said our independence had been appealed to in the course of this debate, and we have been told of our degradation in depending upon foreign nations for manufactured articles. He said it was in the nature of our Government and civil institutions, to inculcate on, and foster in the midst of our citizens, an ardent attachment to independence and the principles of civil liberty; and, he said, this will continue to be the case until we become so much more wise than our fathers that we must amend and interpolate their works.

He said examples had been drawn from individual life in this debate; he, therefore, felt justified in following the example, and would ask, if any man would feel degraded, or less independent, in sending his work to the shop of his neighbor, if his neighbor took part of his surplus produce in pay? He said the understanding of the man could not be much admired, who, to become independent, would leave a profitable profession, or the calling of a respectable farmer, and turn cobbler. He said he had a respect for all honest men, be their trade whatever it may; but there is a social dependence mutually existing between men of the same country, and between different nations; and he believed its destruction would materially lessen the sum total of human happiness.

Mr. S. said he would not indulge himself in detailing melancholy forebodings of the deleterious effects of this measure, and the others with which it is connected, on our navy, on our revenue, and on the habits, morals, and condition of our citizens. He said he had them—he felt them—but he would leave them to time and experience to develop—the best crucible for the trial of measures and men.

Mr. REA said: The first section of the bill under consideration contains four principles relative to the disposition of merchandise imported into the United States. The first principle is, that the duties laid on all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States from and after the — day of —, except certain articles enumerated in the first section, shall be paid before a permit shall be granted for landing the same, excepting such goods, wares, and merchandise, as may be entered for exportation, or deposited in storehouses. The second principle includes the several articles enumerated in the first section, and excepted from the general operation of the bill, in respect to cash payment of duties thereon. The third principle includes merchandise entered for exportation; and the fourth principle includes merchandise intended to be deposited in storehouses.

The second section provides that, where the amount of duties on the articles enumerated and excepted in the first section, and included within the second principle or class of merchandise, imported in any ship or vessel on account of one person only, or of several persons jointly interested, shall not exceed one hundred dollars, the same shall be immediately paid; and if exceeding that sum, shall be paid or secured to be paid. If on teas, one-third in three, one-third in six, and one-third in nine calendar months. If on the other articles excepted and enumerated in the first section of the bill, one-half shall be paid in three, and the other half in six months, from the date of the respective importations.

The other sections of the bill contain regulations relative to merchandise entered for exportation, and to merchandise deposited in storehouses.

In the first section of the bill is an enumeration of articles excepted from cash payments. The excepted articles are, “dying drugs, and materials for composing dyes, gum arabic, gum senegal, and all articles used solely for medicinal purposes, cassia, cinnamon, cloves, chocolate, cocoa, coffee, indigo, mace, molasses, nutmegs, pepper, pimento, salt, ochre, sugar, tea.” Of these, as has been already observed, the second section provides, that duties shall be paid in three, six, and nine months, and that the duties on all the other enumerated articles shall be paid in three and six months. What, then, are the articles of merchandise imported into the United States on which, by the provisions of the bill, the duties shall be paid before a permit be granted for landing the same? They are all manufactures of wool, of cotton, of linen, of hemp, of iron, all wines, and spirits of every kind, and other articles not enumerated or provided for in the said first section. These are the principles of this bill, the enactment of which into a law is so earnestly urged.

What will be the operation of this bill if it becomes a law? or on whom will it chiefly operate? The answers to these questions are important, and ought to be duly considered. A gentleman from Maryland has informed us that, if the merchants are to pay cash for duties on merchandise, as provided for by this bill, they will, in his opinion, be compelled to lay about ten per cent. in addition to the price of the article of merchandise. The duties charged by the existing tariff on all articles of foreign growth and merchandise imported into the United States, and chargeable with duties, are now very high; in some cases amounting nearly to a prohibition, if not altogether.

This bill, if it becomes a law, will, it is believed, operate injuriously to the agriculture, to the commerce, and to the revenue of the United States, and will augment the necessity of a system of internal taxation of a general or particular kind. The effects which will be produced by this bill, if it becomes a law, may be apparent. These effects will operate on the consumers of every description of merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture, paying duties, or of domestic manufactures not subject to any duties. The agricultural part of the community is the great mass of the people of these United States, and does consume the largest quantities of merchandise; and being the chief consumer of merchandise, do pay the greatest portion of revenue arising from duties on merchandise. The principles of the Government of these United States are not similar to the principles of the Government of any other nation. In the United States the people are the sovereign, and hold in their hands the power of the Government. I will vote, said Mr. R., to strike out the first section, and I hope it will be stricken out.

The question was taken on Mr. SILSBEE's motion to strike out the first section—that is, to reject the bill, and carried—ayes 86, noes 60.

The question was then immediately taken to concur with the Committee in striking out the first section of the bill, and decided—For concurrence, 91; against it, 55, as follows:

TUESDAY, May 2.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House entitled an act for the relief of Jacob Konkopot, and others, of the nation of Stockbridge Indians, residing in the State of New York, with an amendment. They have also passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act to regulate the fees of the clerk and marshal of the district court of the United States for the State of Louisiana; and an act further to regulate the Medical Department of the Army; in which amendment and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, the Committee on the Judiciary were directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the marshal of the district of Connecticut to make use of Newgate prison, in the State of Connecticut for the purpose of confining to hard labor such prisoners as shall, by the courts of the United States in that district, be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for offences under the laws of the United States; provided such State shall make it the duty of the keeper of said prison to keep safely all prisoners committed thereto, as aforesaid.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of John H. Piatt;" whereupon the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act to regulate the fees of the clerk and marshal of the district court of the United States for the State of Louisiana," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act further to regulate the Medical Department of the Army," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Konkopot, and others, of the nation of Stockbridge Indians, in the State of New York," was read, and concurred in by the House.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act to prevent the commanders and other officers in the naval service of the United States from accepting of any

DUTIES ON SALES AT AUCTION.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. TAYLOR in the chair, on the bill for laying duties on sales at auction, the bill was read through.

The following is the first section, and contains the substance of the bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the — day of — next, there shall be levied and paid, for the use of the United States, upon all sales by way of auction, as hereinafter described, which shall be made within the United States, the respective rates and duties for every hundred dollars of the purchase money arising on the sale, by auction, of goods, wares, and merchandise, to wit: on all articles manufactured in the United States, one dollar; on all articles of foreign growth or manufacture not hereinafter enumerated, two dollars; on woollen, cotton, and linen manufactures of all descriptions, or of which wool, flax, and cotton, or either, is the material of chief value, glass, of all kinds, iron, steel, hemp, cordage, tarred or untarred, twines, silks, nankeens, ready made clothing, all articles manufactured from iron, steel, copper, brass, pewter, lead or tin, or of which these metals, or either of them, is the material of chief value, china ware, earthen ware, stone ware, musical instruments, hats, caps, and bonnets, of all kinds, umbrellas and parasols, dressed or tanned skins, cabinet wares, leather, and all manufactures of wood or leather, or of which leather is the article of chief value, paper, of every description, and all articles of the above description in part manufactured, printed books, corks, gold leaf, ten dollars; and at the same rate for any greater or lesser sum, except as hereinafter excepted. The said respective rates and duties to be paid by the auctioneer, or person making such sales at auction, out of the moneys arising from each and every such sale. And if any goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be sold at auction in any other manner, or in any less quantities, dimensions, or weight, than those contained in the original bales or packages in which they shall have been imported, there shall be levied and paid an additional sum of five dollars for every hundred dollars of the purchase money arising from such sales: Provided, That nothing in this act contained, shall extend to any sale or sales, by auction, of goods, wares, and merchandise, made pursuant to, or in execution of, any rule, order, decree, sentence, or judgment, of any court, or judicial officer of the United States, or either of them, or made in virtue, or by force, of any distress for rent, or other cause for which a distress is allowed by law; or made in consequence of any bankruptcy or insolvency, pursuant to any law concerning bankruptcies or insolvencies; or made in consequence of any general assignment of property and effects, for the benefit of creditors; or made by, or on behalf of, executors or administrators, or made pursuant to the directions of any law of the United States, or either of them, touching the collection of any tax or duty, or disposal, by auction, of public property of the United States, or of any State; nor to any such sale or sales, by auction, of ships, their tackle, apparel, and furniture, or to the cargoes of any ships or vessels which shall be wrecked or stranded within the United States, and sold for the benefit of the insurers or proprietors thereof.

This section being under consideration—

Mr. BALDWIN, the chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, delivered an exposition of the views of the Committee in reporting the bill, and the reasons by which he was induced to urge its passage. The system of auctions he described as a monopoly in the hands of a few persons in the large towns, and a fair subject for taxation. The present operation of the sales at auction of foreign merchandise, he argued, was to displace the fair trader, by inundating the country with worthless goods at reduced prices; and its effect had been, connected with other causes, to throw our commerce into the hands of foreigners, and bankrupt the fair American merchant, at the same time that it also destroyed the occupation of the helpless but industrious retailer. In support of his argument, he advanced various facts showing the great extent to which this auction business is carried on in the country, &c.

Mr. STORRS, in the course of some remarks which he made on this subject, avowed his willingness to throw some further impediments in the way of foreign merchants engaged in trade in this country, not believing it to be the interest of the country that our retail trade should be carried on by foreign capital. From considerations which he enlarged upon, Mr. S. said he should support this bill, provided the duties proposed to be laid were not so high as to prohibit sales at auction altogether. Such, he apprehended, would be the effect of the duty of ten per cent. proposed in the above section. Mr. S. assigned several reasons why he thought auction sales ought not to be wholly interdicted, at the same time that he thought them a fit object for taxation. He therefore moved to strike out of the above ten per cent., and in lieu thereof insert two and a half per cent.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, whilst he opposed this amendment, gave his general views of the bill. The committee he said had in his opinion wisely discriminated, retaining a small duty only on such goods—groceries, for example—as had always heretofore been sold at auction. That duty however he thought ought to be but one instead of two per cent. The object of the ten per cent. duty on sales of another description was to prohibit them altogether. To show the advantageous effects of such a prohibition, Mr. S. entered into a general view of the pernicious operation of such sales. The effect of the duty of ten per cent. would be to throw back the trade into the hands of the fair American merchant. The two and a half per cent. duty would not have this operation: it would be cheerfully paid, and would give a revenue of eight hundred thousand dollars. Revenue, however, was not the object, but prohibition or exclusion of these sales; and the proposed amendment, therefore, ought not to be adopted.

Mr. SERGEANT gave to the House his views of this subject, and particularly of the amendment.

H. OF R.

Duties on Sales at Auction.

MAY, 1820.

With regard to trade in general, he was opposed to subjecting it to too much regulation; but sales at auction were a fair subject of regulation, because the system itself was the creature of regulation, being subject to particular restraints, and giving particular benefits to those who carry it on, &c. He objected to the auction system, that it was inconsistent with sober and moderate habits, and induced gambling and speculating habits. He spoke of it in a limited as well as in a general sense. He had therefore no objection to the proposed prohibitory duty; but to the imposition of a duty on sales at auction as a means of revenue he had many objections, the most forcible of which was, that its operation would be too partial. Such a duty would well form a part of a general system, but certainly ought not to be selected from all other equally proper objects of internal taxation, &c. He was of course opposed to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, then took the floor. He regarded this bill as only a continuance of the system of measures commenced in one bill which has already passed this House, and proposed to be continued in the other, which was yesterday rejected—a system which he pronounced to be calculated to visit with ruin and distress one portion of the community, to the benefit of two other classes. He replied to some of the arguments advanced on this day, and on preceding days, in favor of fostering the manufacturing system, and particularly denied that the independence of the country was in any manner essentially connected with that policy. With regard to the alleged effect of this bill to promote the public interest, by preventing people from buying goods at auction, he considered the old-fashioned way the best, which left to the good people of the United States to judge for themselves of what would best promote their interests. This bill, he argued, would promote the interest of but two classes—the merchants and the manufacturers—by excluding the competition of foreign capital, and further burdening the sales of imported goods, &c. With respect to the morality of auction sales, he said that it was not the province of Congress, but of the State governments, to legislate for the preservation of the morals of the community, &c.

Mr. TRACY delivered his views in opposition to the bill. With regard to the monopoly of the auction business, he said it was the first time he had heard a serious allegation against a monopoly, the object of which was to sell goods cheaper than, without these auction sales, they would be sold. On the contrary, the effect of this bill would be, he argued, to create, instead of destroying, a monopoly. He examined the operation of sales at auction, and replied to the arguments which had been employed to show their injurious and immoral tendency. People might buy as immorally and as foolishly, he said, from the regular merchant as at auction; and more so, because in the one case they must pay cash for their purchases, and in the other might obtain extensive credits, which were always prejudicial. He denied the force of the argument that the business of selling goods would be thrown into more hands by abolishing sales at auction. He saw no reason in Congress legislating for the purpose of producing such an effect, &c. In concluding his speech, Mr. T. moved to strike out the first section of the bill; but, pending the other motion, this motion was not in order.

Mr. SILSBEE made some remarks, the object of which was to show that the proposed duties were too high, and would certainly be evaded, and evaded without fraud, by a change in the customary mode of doing business. A single package of goods, for example, would be sold at public sale to fix the price, and the rest would be sold off at private sale at the same price, and thus the duty saved, &c. He was of course in favor of the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. WARFIELD next spoke at considerable length against the principle of the bill, and in reply to the arguments used in its support. He denied that the system of auction sales could properly be considered as a monopoly, or that it produced the deleterious effects ascribed to it. He was disposed to let commerce regulate itself, as much as we could, with a due regard to the public interest. He was therefore opposed to passing any law on this subject; but, if any law respecting it were to pass, he was in favor of its being amended as now proposed by the gentleman from New York. He believed the operation of this bill would be to encroach in a certain degree, for the benefit of another interest, on the agricultural interest of the country; and he was therefore entirely opposed to its passage in any shape.

Mr. KINSEY spoke in support of the bill. He adverted to the numerous petitions which had been presented in favor of this bill, from various classes of society, as affording the strongest evidence this House could have in favor of the measure now before the House. He recounted the details of the operation of these auction sales as converting the whole business of trade into a system of hazard and of chance, having a most demoralizing effect; and, whatever gentlemen might say, he contended this was a consideration entitled to the respect of this House—our Government itself being founded on public morals. He added many other arguments, and invoked the parental care of Congress to the sinking American manufacturer and merchant from the effect of these sales at auction for the benefit of foreign competitors, &c.

Mr. BALDWIN again spoke in support of the bill. He did not consider the duty of ten per cent. as a prohibitory duty; it was not, he said, intended to be such, nor did he believe, from all the information he had received, that it would have that operation. He examined more fully the deleterious operation of the present system of trade, &c., and argued that anticipations of punctuality in the future payment of duties ought not to be formed on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on that subject; and that it would not be surprising if the loss this year, by failures, &c., should equal the losses of the thirty years preceding, or one million of dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, again addressed the House, and replied to Mr. BALDWIN's arguments; maintaining the importance to this nation of commerce and navigation, both which the system of which this bill was a part, went to destroy; and this, after a bloody but victorious war had been commenced and maintained for free trade and sailors' rights. Having achieved at such a sacrifice these great objects, he deprecated their surrender, by the policy proposed by the system of which this bill was a part, &c.

Mr. MEIGS, of New York, entered into a series of arguments, and referred to a number of facts, to show the beneficial operation which this bill would, to a certain degree, have on the domestic industry of the nation generally; to which great object he was friendly. Though, therefore, the bill might afford, perhaps, but little aid to manufactures, he was in favor of it.

The question was then taken on reducing the duty, in the above section, from ten per cent. to two and a half per cent.; and was negatived without a count.

Mr. STRONG, of New York, then, for the purpose of destroying the bill, moved to strike out the first section thereof, and followed his motion by a speech of some length against the bill, contending that the sales proposed to be so highly taxed, were not injurious to the interest of the community; that, whether the tax was intended for prohibition or for revenue, it would be partial, and would be defeated by the sales of goods in commission stores, &c.

The motion to strike out the first section was negatived—ayes 51, noes 75.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, then moved to strike out ten, and insert five per cent.

Mr. WENDOVER moved to strike out ten, and insert eight.

The latter motion, being first tried, was negatived.

The motion to substitute five per cent. for ten was also negatived—ayes 64, noes 70.

Mr. CULBRETH moved to strike out ten, and insert six per cent.; which motion he made because he was friendly to the object of the bill, and because he feared that, unless the duty were reduced, the bill would be lost.

This motion was also negatived.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to strike out the duty of two per cent. on sales of groceries, &c.; and in lieu thereof to insert one per cent. The motion was agreed to.

Various amendments were then successively offered to the details of the bill, some of which were accepted, and many rejected; in the proposition or discussion of which, Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, BALDWIN, CULBRETH, WENDOVER, WHITMAN, SILSBEE, FOOT, HILL, McLEAN of Kentucky, BEECHER, and NELSON of Virginia, were most active.

The bill was so amended, on motion of Mr. BALDWIN, as to take effect from and after the 30th of June next.

The bill having been gone through, and the blanks therein all filled, the Committee rose and reported the bill and amendments to the House, and the amendments were all concurred in; and, after receiving some further modification,

Mr. TRACY, of New York, moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed; which motion was decided in the negative by yeas and nays—for indefinite postponement 66, against it 83, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Anderson, Archer of Virginia, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Bryan, Buffum, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Cobb, Cocke, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dennison, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Fuller, Fullerton, Garnett, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Heister, Holmes, Hooks, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Livermore, Lowndes, Maclay, McCoy, Mercer, Monell, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Overstreet, Parker of Virginia, Pinckney, Pindall, Reed, Rhea, Ringgold, Settle, Silsbee, Slocumb, Smith of North Carolina, Strong of New York, Swearingen, Tarr, Terrell, Tracy, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Walker, Warfield, and Williams of North Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, renewed the motion to strike out ten and insert five per cent. as the duty; and the yeas and nays were called, but refused. The motion was lost.

Mr. STORRS moved to strike out ten and insert three per cent.; which was also negatived.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to strike out the thirteenth section, which provides that if any goods imported shall sell for more than the prime cost an additional duty of — per cent. shall be laid on such sale.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULBRETH renewed his motion to strike out ten, and insert six per cent.; which was negatived.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 77, as follows:

And so the said bill was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, then moved that the House do reconsider the vote just taken on the question to engross the said bill; when the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 3.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of the proceedings of the court martial in the trial of Colonel William King, of the 4th regiment of infantry, and a copy of the orders and documents connected therewith, communicated in obedience to the resolution of the 18th of April last; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting sundry documents and statements in relation to the receipts and expenditures of the Department for Indian Affairs, communicated in obedience to the resolution of the 10th ultimo; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the letter from the Secretary of War, of the 23d of December last, reported a bill to increase the number of clerks in the Department of War; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the House took up and proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 29th ultimo, for the appointment of a standing committee to be denominated "The Committee on Agriculture;" and the resolution was agreed to by the House; and ordered that the committee consist of seven members.

Mr. MERCER moved that the House do now proceed to consider the bill to provide for clothing the militia when called into the service of the United States; which motion was rejected by the House.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the joint resolution to extend the use of the Library of Congress to the Secretary of the Senate and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, during the recess of Congress; and the said resolution being amended at the Clerk's table,

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, moved further to amend the same, by including therein the Superintendent of the Patent Office; which motion was rejected.

The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House, entitled "An act for the relief of Abijah Hunt and William Gordon Forman," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill for the relief of the heirs of Abijah Hunt were agreed to.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of John H. Piatt was read a third time.

The bill which authorizes a settlement of Mr. Piatt's accounts on equitable principles, gave rise to a debate of considerable length, in which many gentlemen engaged.

At length the question was taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill from the Senate "further to regulate the Medical Department of the Army," was read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Susanah Stewart was also read a third time, and passed.

CHARTER OF WASHINGTON.

The House then proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate for renewing and amending the Charter of the City of Washington, with the amendments thereto reported by the committee of this House. These amendments propose, principally, that the election of Mayor shall be by Electors, instead of by the people, as the bill prescribes; and that the city shall be divided into five instead of six wards. These amendments were not agreed to, though some others of less importance were.

Mr. STREET then moved to amend the bill by striking out the clause empowering the corporation of the city to authorize lotteries for the purposes of public improvement; which motion, after some little debate, was agreed to. And, thus amended, the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the Senate's resolution, proposing to fix a day for the adjournment of Congress.

The question being on what day to fix for the adjournment—

Mr. LOWNDES, on the ground of a doubt whether the House could now decide by what day it could get through the business necessary to be done, moved to lay the resolve again on the table.

MAY, 1820.

Duties on Sales at Auction.

H. OF R.

On this motion arose a desultory debate, in which Messrs. LOWNDES, ROBERTSON, HOLMES, FOOT, FLOYD, RHEA, WALKER, and SERGEANT, took part.

In the course of this debate, Mr. HOLMES suggested that it was more than probable that a communication would shortly be made to Congress by the Executive, respecting our foreign affairs, which would require two or three days' deliberation.

On this suggestion, Mr. FLOYD remarked, in advocating an early adjournment, that he should yet not be unwilling to sit longer, if there was any occasion for legislation in respect to our relations with Spain; but on that subject the House had had message, and report, and re-report, until he was reminded of the fable of the shepherd and the wolf, &c.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was negatived by a small majority.

Mr. NEWTON then moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to Saturday next, on which day, he said, it was expected that a message would be transmitted by the Executive, containing information respecting our relations with Spain, without which it would be highly impolitic to adjourn.

This motion was negatived.

The question was then taken on fixing on the eighth day of this month (next Monday) for adjournment, and negatived by a considerable majority.

Mr. TRIMBLE then moved to fix on the 12th instant, as the day of adjournment; which motion was also negatived.

Mr. HOLMES then moved to fix on the 15th for adjournment; which was agreed to; and, thus amended, the resolution was passed, and returned to the Senate for concurrence in the amendment.

DUTIES ON SALES AT AUCTION.

The House then took up the motion, depending on yesterday's adjournment, to reconsider the vote rejecting the bill for laying duties on sales at auction. Whereupon,

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, withdrew his said motion, and submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, an estimate of the deficit in the revenue, which may ultimately arise from the adoption of the proposed tariff, and also what amount of revenue may be derived from a duty on sales at auction and on spirituous liquors distilled from grain and other domestic materials.

And the question being taken, that the House do now proceed to consider the said resolution, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. STORRS then renewed the motion to reconsider the vote rejecting the bill laying duties on certain sales at auction.

And after a few remarks from Mr. METCALF and Mr. WOOD in favor of reconsideration, and from Mr. WARFIELD in favor of a postponement till to-morrow, which was negatived; the question was taken by yeas and nays, on Mr. STORRS's motion, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs Adams, Allen of New York, Baker, Baldwin, Bateman, Beecher, Bloomfield, Brown, Brush, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Clark, Cocke, Cook, Crawford, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Edwards of Pa., Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hendricks, Herrick, Hill, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Little, Linn, Lyman, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Mason, Meigs, Metcalf, R. The bill then received sundry amendments.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the duty of ten per cent. on sales of certain enumerated articles (dry goods, &c.,) was stricken out, so as to leave that item blank.

Various rates of duty were proposed by way of substitute to the ten per cent., viz:

Mr. STORRS proposed four per cent.

Mr. SERGEANT proposed seven and a half.

Mr. DENNISON proposed three.

Mr. CASE proposed six.

Mr. TRACY proposed two.

Mr. TAYLOR proposed eight.

The question was first taken on the highest rate proposed, (eight per cent.,) and negatived; the question on the two next highest rates proposed, as above, were also decided in the negative; but,

On the question to fill the blank with five per cent., it was decided in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, the bill was amended by striking out the words "on articles manufactured in the United States, one dollar."

Mr. DENNISON moved to amend the bill by striking out the following clause:

"And if any goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be sold at auction in any other manner, or in any less quantities, dimensions, or weight, than those contained in the original bales or packages in which they shall have been imported, there shall be levied and paid an additional sum of five dollars for every hundred dollars of the purchase money arising from such sales."

And the question on this motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. CULBRETH then moved to amend the above clause by striking out the word five, and inserting in lieu thereof, two and a half. And the motion was negatived.

The question was at length taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of New York, Baker, Baldwin, Bateman, Beecher, Bloomfield, Brown, Brush, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Clark, Cocke, Cook, Crawford, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Earle, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Ervin, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hendricks, Herrick, Hill, Hostetter, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Little, Linn, Lyman, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Mason, Meigs, Metcalf, R. The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

THURSDAY, May 4.

On motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to prepare and report to this House, at the next session of Congress, such modification of the existing system regulating the commerce, navigation, and revenue of the United States, as he may consider necessary, and peculiarly applicable to the northern and northwestern frontier thereof.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis, deceased," with an amendment. And they have passed a bill, entitled "An act to revive the powers of the Commissioners for ascertaining and deciding on claims to land in the district of Detroit; and for settling the claims to land at Green Bay and Prairie des Chiens, in the Territory of Michigan;" in which amendment and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

A resolution on its third reading, for extending the use of the Library of Congress to certain officers of the Government, in addition to those who are now allowed the use of it, gave rise to some objections from Mr. LIVERMORE and Mr. TAYLOR, the latter of whom moved to postpone the same indefinitely. The objections were, that the extension of the permission to take the books out of the Library would tend to impair and deface what was intended for the ornament as well as for the exclusive use of Congress; that, if the use of the Library was extended as proposed, it ought also to be further extended on the same principles—but that it was altogether needless to pass the resolve, inasmuch as the Library was open three times a week during the recess, and daily during the session, and might be consulted at pleasure by the officers in question.

The motion for indefinite postponement was agreed to.

The bill from the Senate to revive the powers of the Commissioners, for deciding on land claims in the district of Detroit, &c., was twice read and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled, "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis, deceased," was read, and concurred in by the House.

DUTIES ON SALES AT AUCTION.

The engrossed bill laying duties on certain sales at auction was read the third time.

[This bill proposes to lay a duty on all sales of foreign goods at auction, (except sales under judicial process, &c.,)—of one per cent. on the amount of sales of groceries, and that class of articles, and of five per cent. on the amount of sales of woollens, cottons, and certain other manufactured articles.]

Mr. RHEA delivered at length his views in decided opposition to the bill.

Mr. WENDOVER made some remarks in reply to Mr. RHEA, and stated a number of facts illustrative of the extent and nature of the auction business, and its injurious operation on the retailing business.

Mr. RHEA made a few observations in reply to Mr. WENDOVER.

Mr. MACLAY assigned the reasons why he should vote against the bill.

The question on the passage of the said bill was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative: For the passage of the bill 89, against it 61, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Tennessee, Baker, Baldwin, Bateman, Beecher, Boden, Brown, Brush, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Clark, Cocke, Cook, Crawford, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Ervin, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hendricks, Herrick, Hill, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Little, Linn, Lyman, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Mason, Meigs, Metcalf, R. So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

THE LOAN BILL.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the President of the United States to borrow two millions of dollars, and for other purposes.

A debate arose on the provisions of this bill, which occupied the remainder of the day's sitting. What follows will serve to show the course of the debate.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, briefly explained the several provisions of the bill, and announced his intention to propose, in consequence of the proposed extent of the loan, (for twelve years,) that the interest to be paid thereon should be limited to five per cent. [If it cannot be borrowed at this rate, it may be raised by a temporary loan, at six per cent., which the Bank of the United States is to be authorized to lend.]

Mr. TRIMBLE of Kentucky, moved to strike out "two," and insert "five" in the first section, so as to create a loan for five millions, instead of two.

Mr. T. began by saying, that the first section of the bill proposes a loan of two millions, and the last section enacts that the balance of the Sinking Fund (which is $2,378,398) shall be applied, in aid of the loan, to make good the deficit of 1820. It would, therefore, be proper to keep the whole bill in view upon the motion. If it was the pleasure of the House that the balance of the Sinking Fund should be so applied, then a loan of three millions would be necessary: perhaps more, certainly not less. If it was intended to leave the Sinking Fund to act upon its legitimate objects, then a loan of five millions must be made. He was decidedly hostile to the proposed application, or rather misapplication, of the balance of the Sinking Fund. It was his settled opinion that the ten millions of dollars appropriated for the redemption of the public debt was pledged inviolably for that purpose, and that it would be a breach of national faith to divert it to other objects, except in time of war, agreeably to the 7th section of the law of March, 1817, by which the fund was enlarged to ten millions. He read several paragraphs, from acts of Congress, in support of his opinion, and commented at some length upon the operation of the Sinking Fund, and the impropriety of changing the system, for the sake of saving appearances. This proposition, he said, presents two questions:

1st. Is the fund pledged to redeem the national debt? And, if not,

2d. Would it be sound policy to appropriate it to other objects?

He had expressed his decided opinion, that it was pledged; and, if it was not, he was against the policy of the measure. It would form a precedent which he could not tolerate. He could recollect of no instance in which a sinking fund, either here or in Europe, had been withdrawn, in time of peace, from its proper purposes. Ought we at this session to set an example so pernicious? If, said he, there is any one event which the people of the United States desire above all others, it is the total extinguishment of the public debt. They at least have a right to consider the fund as pledged. They ask you, what progress you are making in the redemption of the debt? And what is your answer? Why, sir, a bill containing two of the most odious fiscal propositions which could be offered to the nation—a loan, and a diversion of the Sinking Fund to the current expenses of the year. He urged other reasons against the proposition, and said that he would leave it with the committee, and turn his attention to the first section.

A loan, said he, is wanted this year, and another next; we are fairly afloat upon the plank of loans, and, whether we shall push the debt off, or it push us, is a problem which he would leave for time and tide to solve.

He was dissatisfied with the report of the committee. He was so understood by the chairman; and he had given notice that he should make the motion which he had submitted. He commended so much of the report as recommends retrenchment, and gave it his warmest approbation. But he objected to some of the fiscal facts, the arrangement which had been made of them, and the conclusions drawn from them. He had already shown that the proposed application of the Sinking Fund is a breach of public faith; and he intended to show—

1st. That the report is delusive, and calculated, in some respects, to mislead the country.

2d. That the policy and interest of the nation is decidedly against the system of finance proposed by the committee.

To have himself clearly understood, he would take the liberty of stating some facts which, upon this occasion, ought to be remembered; and this was a proper time to say, that he would state no facts except such as had been reported from the proper offices, and that he had taken some trouble to avoid mistakes. He would remark that, in making calculations, he had cast off all below fifty cents, and all above was carried to a unit.

H. OF R.

The Loan Bill.

MAY, 1820.

In January, 1791, the public debt was $75,169,974. In 1793 we began the loan system, and continued it for twelve years, at which time the debt stood at eighty millions, vibrating during the whole time between seventy-five and eighty-five millions. He gave those twelve years to gentlemen who prefer loans to reduction. It was a section of the "road to ruin" that he would not travel in himself, nor would he advise others to go far along it. From 1805, when the loans ceased, the debt diminished rapidly until 1812, when it stood at forty-five millions. This result is an argument for those who recommend retrenchment and reduction. Experience proves that, so long as deficits are made good by loans, there is no reduction of public debt or current expenses.

The war debt, added to the last sum, made an aggregate, in 1816, of 123 millions; which has been since reduced, and on the 1st January last, stood at - - - - $88,885,203

Still leaving the 3 and 5 per cents. redeemable at the pleasure of the Treasury.

He said he would have to refer to these items hereafter, and would, therefore, waive them for the present, and take up the report of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and would—

1st. Take the chairman's facts as the basis of his calculation, and, by putting items in their proper places, show the true deficit for 1820.

2d. Upon the same basis, he would show a deficit for 1821, of certainly $4,000,000, and probably $6,000,000.

The report begins this subject by enumerating the items of revenue for 1820, to some of which, he said, he had the most decided objections, and others would be unavailing this year. The third bank bonus, or instalment, as the law calls it, does not fall due until the first day of January, 1821, and yet it is set down as available funds in 1820. This is taking a loan from next year to supply the deficit of this. It is enough if we permit each year to swallow itself. But, by this report, 1820, after devouring itself, and all the crumbs and fragments of last year, begins to gormandize upon 1821, at the rate of a bank bonus per meal. The second bonus, due in January last, is carried to the balance in the Treasury this year; and the third bonus belongs to next year; and, if he was not greatly mistaken, it would be wanted to make good deficits in that year. To use it this year is only covering the deficit with cobwebs.

Again: A bank dividend is stated for July next, at four per cent., making $280,000; and, to be consistent, the dividend in January, 1821, ought to have been carried back with the bonus, as funds for 1820. But there is no reason to believe that any dividend will be made in July; if one is made, it will be for the sake of demonstration; it will be to keep up appearances.

Again: The revenue from public lands is stated at two millions. These funds will be deposited in banks in Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, Mississippi, Alabama, and other places. The whole disbursement of public money west of the mountains is only about $1,250,000 per annum, and the balance must be remitted to Philadelphia, and placed east of that, before it is available funds for the Treasury. It is found that eight or nine months are required to transmit money from the Western country to the Treasury.

The operation is usually performed by the United States Bank, but four months' notice is demanded, and it is about four months after payments are made before they are deposited, so that a notice can be given to the bank, and requisition made upon it to effect the transmission. These moneys are paid in specie or bank notes. If in specie, it would take four months, and cost two and a half per cent. to transfer it to the Treasury. If in paper, the remittance cannot be made by the bank at an earlier day than that stated, without loss to the institution; and if the local bank notes were transmitted, the loss to the Treasury would be from five to twenty per cent. In fact, the loss upon public funds paid in the Western country is about three per cent., if the money lying idle and useless may be called a loss. Now it is admitted that Kentucky and Ohio hemp is worth two and a half more than Russia hemp, and upon these facts he would ask if it would not be wise for the Government to purchase Western hemp for the navy at five per cent. above the price of Russia hemp, and also procure clothing for the army, and other supplies, if to be had, in the Western country, at an advance of from three to five per cent. on the current price of imports? The bill which was passed a few days since, on this subject, ought to be carried into effect by the departments without delay. The people of the West would begin to look into this matter. You make us pay our dues in cash. We have neither loans nor credits. The Eastern people get all the money, all the credits, and all the loans. Surely our agriculture and manufactures may for the future expect to receive that encouragement which can be given to them without loss to the public. If he should live to take his seat here next session, he would find it his duty to inquire pretty closely into the prices which may be given by public agents during this summer for clothing and hemp, and one or two other articles of Western growth or manufacture.

He would proceed with the report. The items he had named ought to be deducted from the estimate of the available funds for the current year.

The total receipts of the year are stated at	- - - - -	$22,525,665
Deduct therefrom the bank bonus	- - - - - 500,000
Deduct therefrom the bank dividends	- - - - - 280,000
Deduct therefrom money in transit	- - - - - 750,000
		1,530,000

Leaving available funds for 1820,	20,995,665
-----------------------------------	-------------------

The current appropriations for the same year amount to	- - - - - 26,299,164
Deduct the above sum	- - - - - 20,995,665

Leaves a deficit for 1820, of	- - - - - 5,303,499
-------------------------------	---------------------

Which accords with the annual report from the Treasury Department. A single glance at the state of our foreign relations would indicate the necessity of a loan for five millions. The Secretary, of course, would only borrow so much of that sum as is wanted. A loan of less than three millions would, in his opinion, lead to a breach of public faith, or a call of Congress before December.

So much for 1820. The report of expenditures for 1821 is, he said, entirely delusive. The current expenses of the Government for the last five years has been upwards of fourteen millions of dollars: last year it amounted, including Revolutionary pensions, to $16,422,946; and this year about the same. Add the sinking fund, and the total amount is, at least, $26,000,000 per annum.

In 1819 the total expenditure was $24,812,419 This year it is, (including Revolutionary pensions,) - - - - - 26,299,164

The unexpended balance of sinking fund makes the only material difference between 1819 and 1820. How the chairman expects to reduce it for 1821, to about eighteen and one half millions, was more than he could conjecture. There is a list of items which the report says may be deducted next year. But there are items of this sort every year, which go off the estimates, and others come on, to an equal amount, and sometimes greater. There are two modes of increasing expenditures which are always in operation: 1st. By passing laws creating new heads of service, and voting funds to carry them into effect. Pension laws and Indian treaties are of this class. 2d. By incidental and miscellaneous demands, which come up every year, and have to be provided for, (private claims and the like;) and the experience of twenty years has proven that these new demands which come upon the estimates, exceed the aggregate of old ones which are omitted. This very year we have about seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars in new items. Besides, the army is put upon stint and thrift for this year, and, my word for it, we shall next year be compelled to increase the army appropriation, and I dare say we shall have some deficits to make good.

The Committee of Ways and Means, he said, made a reduction in the estimates of this year of two millions of dollars; which, if it had been allowed, would have made the expenditure upwards of twenty-eight millions, leaving a deficit of more than seven millions.

If the revenue amounts to only twenty millions for the next four years, we may expect a deficit of about four millions per annum until the year 1823, when the permanent appropriation for the increase of the navy expires; after which the deficit will be three millions, and the figures stand thus, by estimate:

Current expenses and sinking fund for 1825	- - - - - $23,000,000
Deduct the total of revenue, amount doubtful	- - - - - 20,000,000
	3,000,000
Deficit for that year	- - - - - 3,000,000
Add the public debt and interest, payable that year	- - - - - 23,310,817

Total deficit for 1825	- - - - - 25,310,817
------------------------	----------------------

The report of the honorable chairman is defective in not showing the amount of interest accruing and payable each year after 1824. The amount for 1825 is $3,440,411, and must be added to the principal, to show the aggregate payable that year. It is useless to deceive ourselves on this subject. The chairman's plan of finance will leave us without a dollar to begin the heavy reimbursements of the year 1825. He exhausts the sinking fund every year, and leaves the public faith to rest upon chance, and the revival of trade and commerce.

The laws of Congress, Mr. T. again said, had given a solemn pledge that ten millions shall be annually applied in redemption of the national debt; and he, for one, was resolved to hold it sacred. In the year 1824, the commissioners of that fund could, by law, call upon the Treasury for the balances unexpected for the two preceding years; which balances would be $9,384,460; and these balances, if called for, would make the deficit of 1825 amount to $34,695,277. It would have given him great pleasure to accord with the report in all respects, if he could have done so; more especially as it gives a view of our finances quite as favorable as the facts would warrant. What he had said gave a darker shade to the subject, but still he saw no reason to despond; for, notwithstanding the derangements of commerce and the pressure of the times, our condition is far superior to that of any other nation. A contrast, for instance, between our fiscal concerns and those of Great Britain, would make the subject sufficiently clear to be understood.

In the year 1818, her national debt, funded and unfunded, amounted to - - - $5,555,555,555

Our debt is only - - - 88,885,203

The annual expense of her Government is - - - 301,199,473

The maximum of ours is only - 26,000,000

Her deficit in 1818 was sixty-one millions of dollars, which she supplied by a loan. Ours, this year, is only five millions. The whole amount of expenses of our Government, from the 4th of March, 1789, to June 30th, 1819, a period of thirty years, was only five hundred and thirteen million five hundred and sixty-seven thousand one hundred and eight dollars; of which sum more than two hundred and fifty-three millions was paid in discharge of principal and interest of public debt, and about two hundred and sixty millions for the aggregate expenses of Government; from which it appears that the people of England pay as much in one year and nine months, as we do in thirty years. To this we must add their poor tax, which is an aggregate sum of from twenty-seven to thirty-six millions per annum.

The report of the committee, said Mr. T., gives the probable amount of revenue for next year, and various opinions have been expressed on that subject. As to the revenue from customs, he had satisfied himself that it would be at its minimum for this and the next year; and that it would afterwards gradually increase. He had a statistical table before him, showing the aggregate amount and value of imports for consumption for several periods, of seven years each, together with the average consumption of each year, and also the annual amount of customs accruing on the consumption of each year. He had selected the period from the first of January, 1794, to December, 1800, as the basis of an inference, and upon the supposition that each individual will consume as much of imports for the next seven years, as was consumed by each during that period, the amount of revenue, from the next seven years, will amount to at least twenty-three millions of dollars. This result is founded upon the tariff as it stood from 1794 to 1800, and he thought it probable that the increase of duties since that time would equal the decrease of consumption. He knew it was impossible to be exact on such subjects, because all the facts are not tangible; but it is quite reasonable to suppose that the ratio of population and consumption is about the same now as then. The amount of imports would be determined by the demand for consumption, and the ability of the nation to pay for them: or take another principle, and say that the amount of imports will equal the amount of exports; and upon either principle, or any statistical principle, it will be found that our revenue from customs will be about twenty-two millions, and a probable increase. Great allowances, however, must be made for the pressure of the times, and the results of past years may afford no criterion upon which estimates can be made for the future.

Recurring again to the report, he said that those who chose to take the trouble of examining this subject, will find, that, in the year 1816, the annual income of the Treasury was stated at twenty-two millions, and the disbursements at the same sum; but the actual receipts have greatly exceeded the estimates, and it appears that upwards of thirty-two millions of funded debt have been paid during the last three years; and that about thirty millions have, in the same period, been expended in discharge of Treasury notes, Mississippi stock, arrears of War debt unfunded, and various other demands, exclusive of the current expenses of each year, which have also been paid. From all which it appears that the deficit of this year is not owing to any mistake in the estimates of the Treasury Department, or any failure of revenue heretofore, but is chargeable mainly to the liberal manner in which Congress has authorized disbursements.

We had been flattered with a hope that the Secretary had made a mistake as to the amount of the deficit in the Treasury; but, after making the reduction of more than two millions from the estimates, there still remains a deficit to the amount stated by him in his annual report. It is now beyond question, that the disbursements of this and succeeding years will surpass the receipts at the Treasury, and any system of expedients will only react upon us, at the next session, with additional force. The best way would be to take the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury, and reduce the expenditures. We must do so at the next session, or revive the late system of internal taxation. This, he was sure, would not be submitted to by the nation, until reductions are first made, and the sooner we begin the work the better. He said he had stated such of his objections to the report of the committee as are materially connected with the loan bill; in doing which, his only object was to have the facts distinctly understood before a vote is taken. If the House should conclude to use the Sinking Fund in aid of the revenue for this year, he hoped they would raise the loan to three millions, without which, he was sure, the Treasury would be aground before the next session.

Mr. STORRS followed, on the same side of the question as Mr. TRIMBLE. He too doubted the correctness of the estimates of revenue for the present year, and therefore urged that the proposed amount of the loan was too small. He was also of opinion that a due regard to the public faith required that the surplus of the Sinking Fund should not be applied to the expenses of the current year, &c. In the course of his speech, Mr. S. gave notice that he should call up his motion looking to a system of internal revenue, with a view of amending it so as to make it a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress, at the next session, a system of internal taxation adapted to any deficiency in the revenue arising from the excess of the expenditures of the Government over its receipts.

Mr. S. SMITH replied to Mr. TRIMBLE and Mr. STORRS. He denied that there was any invasion of the faith of the Government as pledged in regard to the Sinking Fund. He defended the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, point to point, and argued that it would be absurd to borrow money and pay interest on it, that it might lie idle in the Treasury, as this money must do, if borrowed, since it could not be employed in the redemption of the public debt, unless (of which there was no probability) it should be in the market at or below par.

Mr. LOWNDES made a few remarks in favor of the bill, but also in favor of a somewhat larger amount of loan than two millions, thinking that a loan of that amount left too little surplus for contingencies. On the subject of the Sinking Fund, he took the same ground as Mr. SMITH, and entirely denied that the application of the idle surplus of that fund to the current expenses of the Government was at all inconsistent with the laws creating and regulating that fund.

Mr. BALDWIN spoke in favor of a loan of five millions, and of course against that part of the bill which relates to the surplus of the Sinking Fund, which fund, according to his construction of the law, was sacredly pledged to the sole purpose of paying the public debt, and inapplicable to any other unless during war—a case specially provided for, and therefore excluding any other contingency.

Mr. BARBOUR controverted Mr. BALDWIN'S construction of the law. He contended that any surplus of the Sinking Fund, which could not be applied to the purchase of the public debt at or under par, might be applied to the ordinary purposes of the Government—being idle and useless in the hands of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund until at the end of two years it reverts to the Treasury.

Mr. BALDWIN and Mr. TRIMBLE both spoke in reply, the latter much at large; when, after a session of about six hours, the Committee rose and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 5.

DUTIES ON SALES AT AUCTION.

Immediately after the meeting of the House, the following proceedings took place:

Mr. FORD, of New York, was speaking when the Reporter entered the Chamber. He was stating the general reasons which had induced him to vote for the tariff bill, (which was yesterday rejected in the Senate,) and which also induced him, in connexion with that bill, and, as a part of a general system, to vote on the bill for laying duties on sales at auction, which yesterday passed this House. The tariff bill, had it passed, he said, would not in his opinion have operated to enhance to the consumer the price of imported goods—believing that the whole difference between the present and the proposed duty would have accrued to the Government, without its operating as a tax on the people, &c. He approved of that bill, and of the auction duty as connected with it; but, as there was now no prospect of the passage of the tariff bill, and as he considered the auction-duty bill as necessarily connected with it, he moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday, whereby the auction-duty bill was passed. His object was, on its being reconsidered, to move to postpone the bill to the next session.

The question having been stated from the Chair—

Mr. COCKE, of Tennessee, said he had supposed this bill, which passed yesterday, had taken the course of other bills, and had been yesterday transmitted to the Senate for its concurrence, until information to the contrary had been given to the House. Had the same expedition been pursued in regard to this bill as had been pursued in regard to certain other bills, the motion for reconsideration could not have been made. Under the circumstances, he considered this motion as not a little extraordinary. The bill had been once debated and rejected; then reconsidered and amended; then debated and ordered to a third reading; and on a subsequent day read a third time and passed; and now, on the next day, it was again proposed to be reconsidered! For his part, he said, he was not made of such pliable materials as to be persuaded to go into a measure on one day, and out of it the next. For a course so inconsistent, he could not possibly give his vote. If it was right to pass this bill yesterday, it was certainly right to pass it to-day; for the same state of things exists now as did then. He therefore requested that, when the vote on the question of reconsideration was taken, it should be by yeas and nays, and that there should be a call of the House on the occasion.

[Mr. SPEAKER stated, for the information of the House, and in justification of the Clerk of the House, that he had known of no intention to move a reconsideration of the bill until this morning; that yesterday indisposition had prevented his carrying the bill to the Senate, and this morning the Senate had not yet met. The general import of the Speaker's observations was, that no blame was imputable to the Clerk on the occasion.]

Mr. BALDWIN assigned the reasons why he should vote in favor of the reconsideration. On the question to reconsider this bill the other day, with a view to revive it after its rejection, he had voted in the negative. The House would recollect that, when he moved to strike out ten per cent., the amount of duty proposed to be laid on sales of dry goods, he had done so against his own opinion, believing that in that shape the bill would not answer the object he had in view. He was opposed to the reconsideration of the bill at this time, because he was of opinion that it was better to do nothing, or do what ought to be done.

The bill had now assumed an aspect totally different from that in which it was reported by the committee; it was now a mere revenue bill, or, if it would have any other operation, it would be a partial one, confined to one class of the community. As a revenue bill, he said, it had been well remarked by his colleague, (Mr. SERGEANT,) that its operation would be partial, and therefore unjust. It was now distinctly avowed by the Committee of Ways and Means, that it was not their intention to introduce a new revenue bill. Let the House remark, said Mr. B., that the system reported by the Committee of Manufactures would have had the effect to supply the deficiency in the revenue, let what alarm may have been raised on the score of the effect of the tariff bill on the revenue. But, the other part of the system being destroyed, he was not disposed to retain this disjoined branch of it. With respect to the auction duty, he had another objection to it. Whilst it was connected with a general system, for important general purposes, the States which derived a revenue from the same object would be willing to give it up. Now, no such purpose would be answered by the bill; and, as a Representative of a State whose revenue would be impaired by it, he did not see why the interests of two States deriving revenue from this object should alone be sacrificed, not to general but to partial views. The solitary object of this bill, besides putting a little money into the Treasury, was to aid the merchants of this country in competition with those of another country in our markets. As a measure, he said, if the old system of revenue was good—if it had carried us so triumphantly through peace and through war, there was no occasion for this little accession to it; and, if it was unsound, and not to be relied on, this partial aid was not what it required. He should, therefore, in every view, vote for the reconsideration of the bill, and then for its postponement.

Mr. LIVERMORE wished, before he voted for the reconsideration, to have a distinct pledge, that the object of the reconsideration was to postpone the bill, and not to amend and repass it. There was something about this bill, he said, which he could not understand. One day it is a revenue bill; the next day, a bill for the encouragement of manufactures; and the next day something else. He expressed some surprise at the quarter in which hostility to the bill was now manifested. Who, he asked, were the fathers of the bill? The Committee of Manufactures; and yet to-day the chairman of that committee wishes to destroy the bill. This reminded him of Abraham, offering up his son Isaac as a sacrifice on the altar. With regard to this bill as a measure of revenue, Mr. L. thought there was no occasion for it. He was of opinion that the revenue was large enough for the purposes of the Government; and, if there was a proper retrenchment of the public expenditure, that there would at the present day be no complaint of a deficiency of revenue under our present system of imposts, which, he said, had been a faithful friend, and was entitled to continued confidence. Mr. L. made some other remarks, which were not distinctly heard by the reporter.

Mr. STORRS was opposed to the reconsideration of the bill. By suffering it to pass, he said, Congress would be able to ascertain the extent of the evil to which it was necessary to apply a remedy. It was important, with a view to devising hereafter a system for the protection of domestic industry, to understand with precision the extent of the evil under which it labors from the sales of foreign goods, &c. Congress would then be able to apply a remedy with some degree of certainty. The bill was of some importance, too, he admitted, as a measure of revenue. Mr. S. said he was not one of those who, because they could not have a perfect system, would not have any addition whatever to the revenue. If the passage of this bill would do no prejudice to any class of the community, what harm could it do to raise four or five hundred thousand dollars of revenue, without any expense whatever to the Government? On this subject of internal revenue, Mr. S. said he wished to be understood. Gentlemen talked of internal taxation, as if it implied direct taxation. No such thing, he said. It would be long before he consented to enter a man's doors to tax his property, or lay a tax directly on his land. But here was a bill which would produce a revenue of half a million; and he saw no reason for rejecting it. Besides, he said, the manufacturers ought to support this bill. Because they could not obtain a duty of ten per cent. on sales of foreign manufactures, would they therefore refuse a duty of five per cent.? It could not be denied, he said, that a duty of five per cent. on sales at auction would be a serious impediment in the way of sales of foreign goods at auction. Mr. S. contended that this was a very important bill, if there never passed another, in favor of the manufacturers of the country; and he would not consent to destroy it because every thing which they wanted could not be accomplished.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, said he could not give a vote on this question without expressing his hope that the motion for reconsideration would not prevail. He did not consider the three bills which had been before the House dependent on each other, but considered each of them good independently of the other; and he could see no reason why the bill now under consideration should be prevented from going to the Senate. He believed it would have the effect to prevent the vast circulation of foreign manufactures through the country, and therefore would aid our manufactures; that it would be beneficial to the revenue; and that it would also favor the real American merchant. Although in favor of manufactures, he was not opposed to the mercantile interest; and it appeared that a great portion of the business of the country was now done by foreign merchants. Believing that this bill would be beneficial to the manufacturing as well as to the mercantile interest, at the same time that it would aid the revenue, he could not but be in favor of its passage.

MAY, 1820.

Duties on Sales at Auction.

H. OF R.

Mr. CAMPBELL agreed with the gentleman who last spoke, that each of the three bills reported by the Committee of Manufactures was good, independently of each other. Though the Senate had rejected one of those bills which had passed this House, he yet thought this House should do its duty without reference to what the Senate had done. If the Senate prevented the adoption of the system, on them, where it belongs, let the responsibility be. It would not tell well, he said, to the nation, that the House had twice reconsidered and twice reversed its decision on the same bill.

Mr. RHEA made a few observations on the question. He was in favor of reconsideration now, because from the beginning he had been opposed to the bill. He remarked on the arguments in favor of this bill: at one time the bill was to create a revenue from sales of foreign goods—at another it was to exclude them from the market. These arguments, he contended, were incompatible with each other. He was content, he said, with the old revenue system, and with the old regulations of commerce, &c., notwithstanding the splendor and magnificence which gentlemen saw in this new one. Mr. R. made other observations, which the reporter was not able to hear: but the conclusion of them was, his being in favor of the reconsideration and postponement of the bill.

Mr. FOOT made a few remarks in opposition to the reconsideration of the bill. He adverted to the difficulty which attended the sale of domestic manufactures, from the immense proportion of foreign goods thrown into the market, and expressed his conviction that the passage of this bill would have an important effect, favorable to national industry, &c.

Mr. FULLER was opposed to a reconsideration of the bill. Although he had not spoken on either of the three bills which had been before this House, he had always avowed a strong inclination to do something that would promote the interest of the manufacturers of the country. Such, he was of opinion, would be the effect of this bill, creating a discrimination in their favor, in the competition with foreign goods, the sale of which at auction now fills the market, so as to leave no room for the domestic fabrics. This bill proposed to give to our manufactures, in addition to the advantage already enjoyed, a bounty of five per cent. in competition with the foreign fabrics of the same material and quality—an advantage of which the friends of manufactures ought to avail themselves. There would, he thought, be an indiscretion on the part of their friends in a reconsideration of this bill, and refusing to take what it offered, because they could not get all they wished. If this bill did not diminish the sales of foreign goods, it would serve to add, in no inconsiderable degree, to our revenue. He thought it would be wise to begin a system for the protection of manufactures, with a single experiment first. The passage and operation of this bill would prepare the different classes interested, for other measures of the same character, should others be deemed expedient, and the country would not be taken unprepared, by having the whole mass thrown on them at once. He was, in every view, very much averse to the reconsideration of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland said, that, as a friend alike to the three great interests of the country, he should vote against the reconsideration of this bill. He should, he said, have preferred that the duty had been fixed at ten per cent. on sales of dry goods; but at five per cent. much good would be effected by it. Besides, he said, it is not the wholesale sales of foreign goods that so much affect our domestic manufactures; and on sales of open goods the duty is ten per cent. Domestic manufactures could, under such a provision, be sent to auction without charge, whilst foreign goods would have to pay ten per cent. Would not that be an important advantage to the American manufacturer? It was the sales at vendue, he said, that distressed our manufacturers, by obstructing the regular sales of their goods. If the foreign goods imported were, as heretofore, opened in the dry goods stores, and sold out there to customers, our manufactures might come into competition with them; but it is the recent change of the usual habits of trade that oppresses our manufactures and recommends the passage of this bill. To the commerce of the country, this bill would also be beneficial. As a revenue bill, its passage would be important: the product of it could not be less to the Treasury than five hundred thousand dollars annually. In every point of view, he considered this bill one which it was important to pass. A little experience had taught him to believe that this bill would be even more important as an encouragement to our manufactures than the tariff bill.

Mr. JOHNSON said, that, in his vote on this bill, he should endeavor to preserve a consistency of character. He had voted against the famous navigation act of 1818; he had voted against the change in the mode of disposing of the public lands, he had had an opportunity of voting two ways already on the present question, and he should vote the third time precisely in coincidence with the votes he had already given. He inclined to think, he said, that a stranger who had attended the discussion this morning would believe that there were but two interests in the country. One gentleman said the bill would benefit the merchant; another that it would benefit the manufacturer. This was the best practical comment he had ever witnessed on the old doctrine of let things alone. Let people manage their own affairs, said Mr. J.—give no encouragement to this, that, or the other class. The people of this country understand their own interests, and will pursue them to advantage; but, whenever you attempt by legislation to make a favorite class by taxing other classes, you interfere to the prejudice of those classes, &c. Besides, Mr. J. was opposed to the passage of this bill, from regarding it as the first effort to introduce a system of internal taxation. In time of war, he said, he had already shown, by his vote, that he was willing to tax every thing; but, in time of peace, he was disposed to let every man tax himself what he pleased by his consumption of articles of foreign growth or manufacture.

Mr. LITTLE, as friendly to manufactures as his friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) could be, yet differed from him in opinion on this subject, being decidedly opposed to a reconsideration of the bill. Mr. L. in answer to a remark of Mr. RHEA, and to show what were the sentiments of the merchants of Baltimore on this subject, read an extract from their memorial to Congress, explanatory of the operation of the sales at auction of foreign goods, as destroying the business of the regular merchant, and being the cause of a great part of the failures, which for the last two years have occurred in our principal towns, and as serving as a cover for the vending of smuggled goods, &c. If the interest of the city of Baltimore alone were consulted by him on the occasion, he said he should probably vote against the bill, because she derives from sales at auction a revenue of forty thousand dollars annually; but, believing the bill would have an operation advantageous to the nation generally, he was obliged to forego the consideration of the immediate advantages of that duty to the city of Baltimore.

Mr. R. MOORE made some observations in favor of the reconsideration. He said he had been in favor of the system reported by the Committee of Manufactures, consisting of three parts. Two out of the three having been lost, one in this House, and the other in the Senate, he was opposed to retaining the third. In this course, he was governed by the law of circumstances. He could not consent that two or three States in the Confederation should be deprived of an important branch of their revenue, derived from sales at auction, when no important national object was to be accomplished by it. As to our manufactures, he did not consider the bill of any essential importance. As a measure of revenue, its operation would be partial, and would be in fact to divert the revenue from the treasuries of two or three only of the whole number of States, to the Treasury of the United States. Mr. M. extended his remarks to a greater length than they are reported, but to the effect above stated.

Mr. BALDWIN repeated, what he said he had before stated, that the bill, as it originally stood, had not been supported by him as proposing a prohibitory duty on auction sales; but because he did not believe that less than ten per cent. would place the American and foreign merchants on an equal footing in the market. With regard to this bill, it was now one thing, and, when it proposed a duty of ten per cent., it was a different thing. He begged the House to consider that the bill was now no longer the work of the Committee of Manufactures. In the minds of some gentlemen, however, it was, in its present shape, to protect manufactures as well as to aid the revenue. Gentlemen who had uniformly voted against the tariff, and some of whom had voted against this bill as it was reported by the committee, could now discover great beauty in it. It would help the revenue, they knew; it would help commerce, they knew; and it would help manufactures, too, if the House could but be persuaded by them to believe it. Gentlemen who had voted against the whole system reported by the committee; who said that no further protection was wanted for manufactures, now that the bill was so changed as to be inefficient for its intended purpose, and partial in every other view—now that it was suited to tide-water only, were warmly in favor of it, as being more important than all the rest of the system reported, and now rejected. He wondered gentlemen had not thought of this when the cash duty bill was under consideration; but gentlemen were unwilling to touch that system—not the old system of 1799, but the venerable system of 1818—it was too holy to be touched, though affording, in its operation, a bounty to the foreign merchant of six per cent., &c. Even were this bill to pass, it had been contended by a gentleman of experience, (Mr. SILSBEE,) that it would be constantly evaded; and yet this was the bill which every one was to be satisfied with as a protection to manufactures. This bill, he said, as it now stood, if executed, would serve two purposes, but not the third and ostensible purpose. For that object, to pass it would be giving nothing; it would be giving worse than nothing, pretending to give something in form, but giving nothing in substance.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said this subject had been some time before the House, and discussed at large; and he hoped that the decision then made in favor of the bill would not be hastily reversed. He had been in favor of the duty of ten per cent., but the House did not think proper to adopt it, and the friends of the bill, to insure its passage, had agreed to a less rate. The object of the bill, as it now stood, was, to bring revenue into the Treasury and to aid domestic industry. Its object, then, was precisely that of the tariff, and these two bills were correspondent and not dependent on each other. The rejection of the tariff bill by the Senate, was no reason why the friends of manufactures in this House should reject this bill. It is no reason to say, because you cannot get the whole, you will have nothing. The Senate, it is said, have inflicted a blow on the manufacturing interest of the country. Be it so. But it is a strong reason for refusing to reconsider this bill that the other bill has been rejected by the Senate. If this bill had passed with the duty of ten per cent., he believed it would have been more valuable to the manufacturing interest than the tariff bill, and at five per cent. he considered it as of great importance to that interest. It was now said, that this bill would be partial in its operation. So far as that argument would apply, it would be to the operation of the bill on our commercial cities. If the duties had remained at ten per cent., it would certainly have affected them more than it would as it now stood, at five per cent. But, he said, in the very States in which the bill would operate most, the manufacturing interest is a powerful one, and there is a strong bias in its favor. Mr. McLANE concluded, by repeating, that the obligation to pass this bill was now greater than it was before the other was rejected; and by expressing his earnest wish that the motion for reconsideration might not prevail.

The question was then taken on reconsideration.

So the bill was postponed to the next session of Congress.

SENATE BILLS, &c.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the House do now proceed to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians;" which motion was rejected by the House.

Mr. PINCKNEY moved the following amendment to the rules and orders of the House, to wit :

Resolved, That, in future, a bill that has passed and become a law shall not be carried to the Senate for two hours after the reading of the Journal the next day, except in the two last days of the session.

The amendment was ordered to lie on the table until to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose," was read the third time, and passed, as amended.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the first amendment, and agree to the second and third amendments proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for clothing the Army of the United States in domestic manufactures, and for other purposes." They have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Thomas C. Withers; and An act for the relief of Daniel Bickley, and Catharine Clark, administratrix of John Clark, deceased, with an amendment to each.

They have also passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out the road therein mentioned; and An act for the relief of James Leander Cathcart; in which amendments, and the two last mentioned bills, they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, in the chair,) on the Loan bill. Mr. TRIMBLE's proposition to strike out the words two millions, being under consideration—

Mr. STORRS rose in support of the amendment, and entered into an argument to show that the Sinking Fund was solemnly pledged to the redemption of the public debt, and that this fund could not be touched or diverted from its original purpose without violating the public faith; he spoke, also, in favor of filling the blank with five millions, and thus providing resources for any unforeseen contingency which might occur.

Mr. BARBOUR made some additional remarks to fortify the opinion which he had yesterday advanced, that it was entirely within the just power of Congress, without impinging at all on the public faith, to apply the surplus of the Sinking Fund to the public current exigencies, and that it was expedient to make such an application of the surplus to supply the existing deficit in the Treasury of the Union.

Mr. Speaker CLAY took the converse of Mr. BARBOUR's position, and maintained the propriety of adhering inviolably to the system adopted in 1816 for redeeming the public debt; and, consequently, the inexpediency of touching the surplus of the Sinking Fund—a fund which he considered as forming one of the most essential features in the permanent systems of the Government, and which should not be made subservient to temporary causes or incidental pressure on the Treasury. He remarked at some length on the present exigencies, and the probable condition of the Treasury for the future; believing that the deficit would greatly exceed the amount estimated by the Committee of Ways and Means, and that the revenue from the public lands was much overrated, he regretted that some permanent practical system had not been proposed by the committee instead of the inefficient system of loans to which he was opposed.

Mr. BARBOUR made some remarks in reply, and Mr. CLAY rejoined.

Mr. FULLER made some remarks on the nature of pledges, from which, and from a reference to the laws providing the Sinking Fund, he deduced the opinion that the only point to which the faith of the nation was pledged was to provide sufficient funds for the payment of the public debt as it should become due, and that it was no violation of that faith to use, in the meantime, for another purpose, the money set apart for that object, so that the debt was faithfully met when the day of payment should arrive.

Mr. LOWNDES concurred entirely in all that had been said concerning the necessity of observing the public faith, in paying either the interest or the principal of a debt when it becomes due. The only pledge other than this was, that ten millions of dollars should be provided annually, above the expenditure; but, if the unemployed portion of this fund be allowed to lie in the hands of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to borrow for the public exigencies would be adding to the expenditure without increasing the income, &c. He was averse to borrowing money merely to purchase up stock, and argued at some length to show that the public faith was merely pledged that there should be so much of the public debt annually paid, if to be bought—not that the machinery of the Sinking Fund should be kept up; that there was no impropriety, and that it would be expedient, to make use of the surplus of the Sinking Fund, now lying inactive. He thought it would be improper to adopt any permanent system of revenue other than the existing one, in the present exigency; because no one could foresee what would be the amount of income from the ordinary sources next year. It was proper to see what would probably be the permanent condition of the pecuniary resources of the nation before a permanent system should be adopted to meet it, &c.

Mr. CLAY again spoke in support of a steady and inviolable adherence to the system provided in 1816 for the gradual redemption of the public debt—arguing that it was this course of policy which had given such advantage to England as to enable her to contend with and almost conquer Europe; and that a strict observance of it by this Government was necessary to preserve the public credit unimpaired, and give confidence in the good faith of the Government, &c.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, entered into an elaborate defence of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the course recommended by them.

The question was then taken on striking out the word two, and carried.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland moved to fill the blank with three millions.

Mr. TRIMBLE moved five millions.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved two million five hundred thousand dollars.

The motion for five millions being first tried, was negatived; and the motion to fill the blank with three millions was agreed to—ayes 65, noes 50.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the blank left to fix the rate of interest to be given for the loan was filled up with five per cent.

Mr. LOWNDES moved an amendment, having for its object to make the loan reimbursable at the pleasure of the Government, instead of after the 1st of January 1832, and paying an interest in the meantime of six per cent.; conceiving it improper that, because at a moment of pressure the Government was obliged to contract a debt, it should, in case of more prosperous circumstances, not have the faculty of paying it off.

Considerable debate took place on this motion, chiefly on the probable revenue in years to come, and the ability of the Government to pay this loan—in which Messrs. LOWNDES, CLAY, SMITH of Maryland, and FULLER, took sides. The motion to amend the bill was negatived—ayes 30.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to insert a clause to authorize the sale from time to time of so much of the stock of the Bank of the United States, owned by the United States, as may be necessary to meet the expenses of Government for the coming year.

The motion was supported by Mr. BALDWIN, and was opposed by Messrs. CLAY, and SMITH of Maryland. The amendment was negatived—ayes 10.

The Committee then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution which was referred to it, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and lay before Congress, at its next session, a system of internal revenue.

Mr. CLAY hoped the Committee would reject this resolution. The Executive, he said, had the power of the veto, and he thought it would be going too far to give to it also the power of originating measures.

The resolution was rejected by the Committee without a division. And the Committee then rose, and reported their proceedings to the House; and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, May 6.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to revive the powers of the commissioners for ascertaining and deciding on claims to land in the district of Detroit, and for settling the claims to lands at Green Bay and Prairie des Chiens, in the Territory of Michigan," reported the same without amendment; and it was ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made an unfavorable report on the petition of William Bayard, and others, of New York, owners of United States three per cent. stocks, by David Ogden, their attorney; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to repeal certain parts of "An act to authorize the President and Managers of the Washington Turnpike Road Company, of the State of Maryland, to extend and make their turnpike road to or from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, through the said District, to the line thereof;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of James Leander Cathcart," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out the road therein mentioned," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel Bickley, and Catharine Clark, administratrix of John Clark, deceased," was concurred in by the House.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas C. Withers," was also concurred in by the House.

The House took up for consideration the message of the Senate, disagreeing to the amendment of this House to the bill providing for clothing the Army of the United States in domestic manufactures. [This amendment provides that the difference in price between the domestic material and the foreign material of the same quality, contracted for or purchased for Army clothing, shall not exceed five per centum.]

Mr. McLEAN moved that the House do insist on its amendment; and this motion was determined in the affirmative—64 votes to 47.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the annual bill for altering and establishing certain post offices and post roads; and considerable discussion took place on the amendments proposed, some of which were agreed to, and some rejected.

The bill was at length gone through; and having been reported to the House, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

LOAN BILL.

The report of the Committee of the Whole on the Loan Bill was first in the orders of the day; and, being taken up,

Mr. COCKE moved to lay the bill on the table; and assigned, as a reason therefor, the present unsettled state of certain matters which might or might not affect the expenditures of the Government, and render necessary a loan of a different amount from that proposed. He added, that there was no occasion for haste in passing the bill, there being time enough remaining to act on it after this day.

This motion was carried by a very small majority, and the bill lies on the table.

MONDAY, May 8.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made an unfavorable report on the petition of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, praying for a grant of a small tract of land, for the use of the inhabitants of Point Coupee; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SILSBEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Thomas C. Robertson and Thomas Shields, for stores lost in gunboats; of sundry inhabitants of Portland, in the District of Maine, and of sundry inhabitants of the city of Savannah, in the State of Georgia, on the subject of marine hospitals; which reports were severally ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a letter from the collector of the customs for the port of New Orleans, containing the information that the agent of the contractor for building the lighthouse on Frank's island, at the mouth of the river Mississippi, has abandoned the undertaking, accompanied with a report on the state of the building, and an estimate of certain extra work done by the contractor, &c.; which letter and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Ordered, That the committee, appointed on the 24th of February last, to inquire into the circumstances under which powder and lead have been loaned by the War Department, or by any of the officers of the United States Army, to certain individuals, be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; and, on motion of Mr. FOREST, the following preamble and resolution were agreed to by the House, viz:

Whereas it appears, by a report of the Secretary of War, dated the 12th of February, 1820, made in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives, that large loans of powder and lead, munitions of the United States, were made to private citizens by the Ordnance department; Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire, and report to this House, by whom the said loans were made, and by what authority; why the same was not reclaimed at the expiration of the loan; what time the said loans were reported to the head of department; and, if a loss should be sustained, how far, and to whom is the responsibility attached for such loss? and further, to report the proper mode of proceeding forthwith against such delinquent or delinquents, for the recovery of the same.

MESSRS. FORREST, COCKE, and McLANE, of Delaware, were appointed the said committee.

The engrossed bill to alter and establish certain post roads, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The bill from the Senate for reviving the powers of the Land Commissioners for the District of Detroit, &c., was read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

A motion was made by Mr. PINDALL, for the appointment of a committee to report a bill for suspending the operation of the act, which has passed at the present session, amending the Revolutionary pension law, until the 1st day of January next.

Mr. P. assigned as a reason for this motion, that, when the next semi-annual payment became due, Congress would not be in session, and that, in consequence of the new provisions annexed to the reception of the pension, and the want of friends or agents at the Seat of Government in the recess, many of the meritorious pensioners would be obliged to relinquish their pensions, &c. The suspension of the operation of the act would besides allow an opportunity for examining whether it might not be advantageously modified or amended, before it went into execution.

On the question now to proceed to the consideration of Mr. P.'s proposition, it was decided in the negative.

COLONIZATION—SLAVE TRADE.

MR. MERCER, from the committee on the subject of the slave trade, to whom was referred the memorial of the President and Managers of the American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States, made a report thereon; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force 'An act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy; and also to make further provision for punishing the crime of piracy.'"

The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Slave Trade, to whom was referred the memorial of the President and Board of Managers of the American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States have, according to order, had under consideration the several subjects therein embraced, and report:

That the American Society was instituted in the City of Washington, on the 28th of December, 1816, for the benevolent purpose of affording to the free people of color of the United States the means of establishing one or more independent colonies on the western coast of Africa. After ascertaining, by a mission to that continent and other preliminary inquiries, that their object is practicable, the society request of the Congress of the United States a charter of incorporation, and such other legislative aid as their enterprise may be thought to merit and require.

The memorialists anticipate from its success consequences the most beneficial to the free people of color themselves; to the several States in which they at present reside; and to that continent which is to be the seat of their future establishment. Passing by the foundation of these anticipations, which will be seen in the annual reports of the society and their former memorials, the attention of the committee has been particularly drawn to the connexion which the memorialists have traced between their purpose and the policy of the recent act of Congress for the more effectual abolition of the African slave trade.

Experience has demonstrated that this detestable traffic can be no where so successfully assailed as on the coast upon which it originates. Not only does the collection and embarkation of its unnatural cargoes consume more time than their subsequent distribution and sale in the market for which they are destined, but the African coast, frequented by the slave ships, is indented with so few commodious or accessible harbors that, notwithstanding its great extent, it could be guarded by the vigilance of a few active cruisers. If to these be added colonies of civilized blacks, planted in commanding situations along that coast, no slave ship could possibly escape detection; and thus the security, as well as the enhanced profit which now cherish this illicit trade, would be effectually counteracted. Such colonies, by diffusing a taste for legitimate commerce among the native tribes of that fruitful continent, would gradually destroy among them also the only incentive of a traffic which has hitherto rendered all African labor insecure, and spread desolation over one of the most beautiful regions of the globe. The colonies, and the armed vessels employed in watching the African coast, while they co-operated alike in the cause of humanity, would afford to each other mutual succor.

There is a single consideration, however, added to the preceding view of this subject, which appears to your committee, of itself, conclusive of the tendency of the views of the memorialists to further the operation of the act of the 3d of March, 1818. That act not only revokes the authority antecedently given to the several State and Territorial governments to dispose, as they pleased, of those African captives who might be liberated by the tribunals of the United States, but authorizes and requires the President to restore them to their native country. The unavoidable consequence of this just and humane provision is, to require some preparation to be made for their temporary succor, on being relanded upon the African shore. And no preparation can prove so congenial to its own object, or so economical, as regards the Government charged with this charitable duty, as that which would be found in a colony of the free people of color of the United States. Sustained by the recommendations of numerous societies in every part of the United States, and the approving voice of the Legislative Assemblies of several States, without inquiring into any other tendency of the object of the memorialists, your committee do not hesitate to pronounce it deserving of the countenance and support of the General Government. The extent to which these shall be carried is a question not so easily determined.

The memorialists do not ask the Government to assume the jurisdiction of the territory, or to become, in any degree whatever, responsible for the future safety or tranquillity of the contemplated colony. They have prudently thought that its external peace and security would be most effectually guarded by an appeal in its behalf, to the philanthropy of the civilized world, and to that sentiment of retributive justice with which all christendom is at present animated towards a much injured continent.

MAY, 1820.

Colonization—Slave Trade.

H. OF R.

Of the Constitutional power of the General Government to grant the limited aid contemplated by the accompanying bill and resolutions, your committee presume there can exist no shadow of doubt; and they leave it to a period of greater national prosperity to determine how far the authority of Congress, the resources of the National Government, and the welfare and happiness of the United States, will warrant, or require its extension.

Your committee are solemnly enjoined by the peculiar object of their trust, and invited by the suggestions of the memorialists, to inquire into the defects of the existing laws against the African slave trade. So long as it is in the power of the United States to provide additional restraints upon this odious traffic, they cannot be withheld, consistently with justice and the honor of the nation.

Congress have heretofore marked, with decided reprobation, the authors and abettors of this iniquitous commerce, in every form which it assumes; from the inception of its unrighteous purpose in America, through all the subsequent stages of its progress, to its final consummation; the outward voyage, the cruel seizure and forcible abduction of the unfortunate African from his native home, and the fraudulent transfer of the property thus acquired. It may, however, be questioned, if a proper discrimination of their relative guilt has entered into the measure of punishment annexed to these criminal acts.

Your committee cannot perceive wherein the offence of kidnapping an unoffending inhabitant of a foreign country; of chaining him down for a series of days, weeks, and months, amidst the dying and the dead, to the pestilential hold of a slaveship; of consigning him, if he chance to live out the voyage, to perpetual slavery, in a remote and unknown land, differs in malignity from piracy, or why a milder punishment should follow the one, than the other crime.

On the other hand, the purchase of the unfortunate African, after his enlargement from the floating dungeon which wafts him to the foreign market, however criminal in itself, and yet more in its tendency to encourage this abominable traffic, yields in atrocity to the violent seizure of his person, his sudden and unprepared separation from his family, his kindred, his friends, and his country, followed by all the horrors of the middle passage. Are there not united in this offence all that is most iniquitous in theft, most daring in robbery, and cruel in murder? Its consequence to the victim, if he survives; to the country which receives him; and to that from which he is torn, are alike disastrous. If the internal wars of Africa, and their desolating effect, may be imputed to the slave trade, and that the greater part of them must, cannot now be questioned, this crime, considered in its remote, as well as its proximate consequences, is the very darkest in the whole catalogue of human iniquities; and its authors should be regarded as hostes humani generis.

In proposing to the House of Representatives to make such part of this offence as occurs upon the ocean, piracy, your committee are animated, not by the desire of manifesting to the world the horror with which it is viewed by the American people; but, by the confident expectation of promising, by this example, its more certain punishment by all nations, and its absolute and final extinction.

May it not be believed, that when the whole civilized world shall have denounced the slave trade as piracy, it will become as unfrequent as any other species of that offence against the law of nations? Is it unreasonable to suppose, that negotiation will, with greater facility, introduce into that law such a provision as is here proposed, when it shall have been already incorporated in the separate code of each State?

The maritime Powers of the Christian world have, at length, concurred in pronouncing sentence of condemnation against this traffic. The United States having led the way in forming this decree, owe it to themselves not to follow the rest of mankind in promoting its vigorous execution.

If it should be objected that the legislation of Congress would be partial, and its benefits, for a time at least, local it may be replied, that the Constitutional power of the Government has already been exercised in defining the crime of piracy, in accordance with similar analogies, to that which the committee have sought to trace between this general offence against the peace of nations and the slave trade.

In many of the foreign treaties, as well as in the laws of the United States, examples are to be found, of piracies, which are not cognizable, as such, by the tribunals of all nations. Such is the unavoidable consequence of any exercise of the authority of Congress, to define and punish this crime. The definition and the punishment can bind the United States alone.

A bill from the Senate, making further provision for the exercise of this Constitutional power, being now before the House of Representatives, your committee beg leave to offer such an amendment of its provisions, as shall attain the last object which they have presumed to recommend.

Mr. MERCER, from the committee on the subject of the slave trade, also reported amendments to the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force 'An act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy; and also to make further provision for punishing the crime of piracy,'" which were committed to the Committee of the Whole to which the said bill is committed. The amendments are as follows:

After the third section of the bill, insert the following sections:

And be it further enacted, That, if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel owned in whole or in part, or navigated for or in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall land, from any such ship or vessel, and, on any foreign shore, seize any negro or mulatto, not held to service or labor by the laws of either of the States or Territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall decoy, or forcibly bring or carry, or shall receive such negro or mulatto on board any such ship or vessel, with intent as aforesaid, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate, and, on conviction thereof, before the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein he may be brought or found, shall suffer death.

And be it further enacted, That if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel owned wholly or in part, or navigated for and in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall forcibly confine or detain, or aid or abet in forcibly confining or detaining, on board such ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto not held to service by the laws of either of the States or Territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall, on board any such ship or vessel, offer or attempt to sell, as a slave, any negro or mulatto not held to service as aforesaid, or shall, on the high seas, or anywhere on tide water, transfer, or deliver over, to any ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto not held to service as aforesaid, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall land, or deliver on shore, from on board any such ship or vessel, any such negro or mulatto, with intent to make sale of, or having previously sold such negro or mulatto as a slave, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate, and, on conviction thereof, before the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein he shall be brought or found, shall suffer death.

WESTERN LAND TITLES.

The House then resolved into a Committee of the Whole, on the bills for the adjustment of certain land titles in Louisiana, Missouri, and Arkansas.

A great deal of debate took place on these bills, which occupied the remainder of the day. Among the various motions made, and amendments offered, on these bills, the following amendment was offered by Mr. SIMKINS of South Carolina, viz:

"And be it further enacted, That the claims, whether British or French, founded on complete British or French grants, in the State of Louisiana, reported by — Cosby for confirmation, and received at the land office on or about the 18th July, 1815, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed against any claim on the part of the United States."

This amendment Mr. S. supported at some length, and with much zeal, on the grounds that there was no reason why an act should have been passed at the latest period of the session, making the same relinquishment in favor of Spanish claims, even bottomed on inferior evidence. All he wished was, to deal out justice, with an even hand, to all the claimants under the different nations who had respectively held this country. That he well knew there were various objections urged to British grants—that they contained many conditions to be performed by the grantees, which were contained in nearly all British grants to lands throughout the Southern States; which conditions are either obsolete or void, as being impossible, or utterly unfitted to the situation of the country. That, at all events, the conditions were subsequent to the investiture of the States, and could never be divested without some regular proceeding, requiring due notice to all the grantees, and a trial of their rights. They could never be otherwise forfeited by the laws of any civilized country. But, he said, it is urged most warmly that, by a condition contained in the Treaty of 1763, by which Great Britain yielded this country to Spain, all British subjects owning land were compelled to settle or sell their claims within eighteen months. This is true; but it is equally true that, if from the value of the possessions, the proprietors should not be able to dispose of their land, &c., then it is expressly stipulated by the Spanish Government that it would grant a prolongation of the time proportioned to the end. Now, sir, will the Committee consider the state of the country at that time; scarcely settled at all, or at any rate at but very few points, and the despotism and caprice of the Spanish Government forbidding, rather than inviting, settlements? Could they have sold then? Can any gentleman, in his sober senses, dream of a possibility of selling? Well, sir, as soon as the country began to be settled, so as to enhance the value of lands, the Spanish Governor, without any regard to British claims, as expressly secured by the treaty, began to regrant the land, and to enable all sorts of people to obtain orders of survey, concessions, permissions to settle, &c., of this very land; and thus have these unfortunate claimants been first tantalized with the hope of selling, but actually prevented from so doing; and very many just claimants, some of whom I have the pleasure to know in South Carolina, have been continually defeated in their continual efforts, either to sell or to possess these valuable lands. It has, I know, said Mr. S., been asserted that the Spanish Government did give a further time—some say three years, some five, some one time, and some another; for all British claimants to come in and settle or sell, &c. But where is the evidence of this? Are hundreds of claimants to be divested of their sacred rights upon mere reports, without any reasonable or legal notice, or any notice at all, of the progress of any proceeding, if any such ever did exist? But what has operated with the most injustice, and is most complained of by British claimants, is, that you have, by your laws, appointed commissioners to receive evidence of all claims, and to report such as appeared just to Congress for confirmation. Under this legislation, British claimants have filed their evidence, which has been rendered, and whilst you have confirmed Spanish claims, bottomed on evidence quite inferior, and liable to fraud, you have utterly neglected complete British grants, although regularly filed and all the legal requisites complied with. Sir, said he, this subject was, two years ago, thought to be of such importance, that, by a resolution of this House, you required the Secretary of the Treasury to report, at the next succeeding session, a plan for the proper adjustment of claims of all kinds. [Here Mr. S. required the Clerk to read the report.] This report, sir, is submitted to the Committee to show, that, after the most mature investigation, a bill was reported, adjusting all British claims as well as Spanish and French. This was just and right, but you find this bill somehow or other got rid of, and a bill reported in favor of Spanish claims, which was passed. Mr. S. concluded, by saying, that his amendment only went to relinquish the claim of the United States to lands covered by British grants, and then to leave the parties to their legal remedies, in the courts where there were conflicting claims. It was a reasonable amendment, and he hoped it would be adopted.

Mr. S. was answered by Mr. CLAY, (Speaker,) Mr. BUTLER, Mr. HOLMES, and Mr. CAMPBELL, to whom he replied.

The amendment was, however, rejected. The bills were reported to the House, but not finally acted on.

TUESDAY, May 9.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and Richard O'Brien, late American Consul at Algiers," reported the same, with an amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. STORRS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out the road therein mentioned," reported the same, without amendment, and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill providing for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate concur in the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh, and disagree to the first, second, and third amendments of this House to the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish additional land offices in the State of Alabama." They also concur in the second, third, fourth, and fifth of the amendments of this House to the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose," and disagree to the first of the amendments to the said bill, and ask a conference upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said first amendment, to which conference they have appointed managers on their part. They have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of certain settlers in the State of Illinois, who reside within the Vincennes land district; An act for the relief of Angus O. Frazer, and others; and An act to amend the act, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes," with amendments to each. They have also passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Lewis H. Guerlain; and An act to limit the term of office of certain officers therein named, and for other purposes; in which amendments, and two bills, they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate announcing their disagreement to the first amendment of this House to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose," and asking a conference on the said amendment, whereupon it was resolved, that this House do agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the amendment aforesaid, and that managers be appointed to attend the same on their part. Messrs. KENT, COBB, and McLANE, of Delaware, were appointed the said managers.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of certain settlers in the State of Illinois, who reside within the Vincennes land district; and An act for the relief of Angus O. Frazer, and others, were severally concurred in by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House entitled an act to alter the times of the session of the circuit and district courts in the District of Columbia, with an amendment. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of the village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois;" in which amendment and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Lewis H. Guerlain; an act to limit the term of office of certain officers therein named, and for other purposes; and an act for the relief of the inhabitants of the village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois, were severally read twice, and referred; the first to the Committee of Claims, the second to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the third to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to alter the times of the session of the circuit and district courts in the District of Columbia," was read, and concurred in by the House.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana, and Territory of Missouri, and the question which was depending yesterday at the time of adjournment, again recurred, to wit: That the said bill be postponed until the first day of the next session of Congress; and being put, it passed in the affirmative: whereupon,

Mr. COBB moved that the House do reconsider the said vote; which motion was rejected.

Ordered, That the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana," be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. PARKER, of Virginia, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate, for the time being, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to adjourn their respective Houses, sine die, on Friday, the 12th day of the present month; and that the resolution heretofore passed, authorizing an adjournment on the 15th instant be, and the same is hereby, rescinded and made void.

The resolution being read, the question was taken, Will the House now proceed to consider the same? and determined in the negative.

COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

Mr. MERCER, from the committee on the subject of the slave trade, reported a bill to incorporate the American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The bill is as follows:

A Bill to incorporate the American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States.

Caldwell, Richard Smith, and John Underwood, and others, composing the society in the District of Columbia denominated the American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States, and their successors, duly elected in the manner hereinafter mentioned, be, and they are hereby, constituted and declared to be a body politic and corporate, by the name and title of the American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall not engage in any banking operations; and that the charter hereby granted shall be liable to be amended, altered, or repealed, at all times hereafter, by the Congress of the United States.

SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. MERCER, from the same committee, reported resolutions authorizing the President of the United States to negotiate with foreign Governments on the means of effecting an entire abolition of the African slave trade, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned. The resolutions are as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be requested to consult and negotiate with all the Governments, where Ministers of the United States are, or shall be accredited, on the means of effecting an entire and immediate abolition of the African slave trade.

Resolved, &c. That the President be requested to enter into a stipulation or formal declaration, with the several maritime Powers, recognising the independence and permanent neutrality of any colony of the free people of color of the United States, which shall be established on the western coast of Africa.

Resolved, &c. That the President be requested, in such use as he may deem it expedient to make of the public ships of the United States, to afford every aid, not inconsistent with the public welfare, to the efforts of the American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States, upon the western coast of Africa.

PUBLICATION OF THE LAWS.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill from the House for regulating the publication of the laws, were taken up.

On this subject there was some debate. Messrs. PINDALL and SMITH, of North Carolina, opposed the amendments, (which go to enlarge the bill, and extend the sphere of publication) and Messrs. FOOT and HOLMES supported the amendments.

Mr. ANDERSON was in favor of the amendments, but he was opposed to the whole bill, and desirous to leave the law as it now stands. He, therefore, moved to postpone the bill indefinitely.

A good deal of debate took place on this motion, in which Messrs. PINDALL, ROBERTSON, RHEA, BATEMAN, FLOYD, and TAYLOR, took part.

The question on indefinite postponement was decided in the negative—ayes 44; and then the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

SPANISH TREATY.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress a correspondence which has taken place between the Secretary of State and the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, since the Message of the 27th March last, respecting the treaty which was concluded between the United States and Spain, on the 22d February, 1819.

After the failure of His Catholic Majesty, for so long a time, to ratify the treaty, it was expected that this Minister would have brought with him the ratification; or that he would have been authorized to give an order for the delivery of the territory ceded by it to the United States. It appears, however, that the treaty is still unratified, and that the Minister has no authority to surrender the territory. The object of his mission has been to make complaints, and to demand explanations respecting an imputed system of hostility, on the part of citizens of the United States, against the subjects and dominions of Spain, and an unfriendly policy in their Government, and to obtain new stipulations against these alleged injuries, as the condition on which the treaty should be ratified.

Unexpected as such complaints and such a demand were, under existing circumstances, it was thought proper, without compromising the Government, and as to the course to be pursued, to meet them promptly, and to give the explanations that were desired, on every subject, with the utmost candor. The result has proved, what was sufficiently well known before, that the charge of a systematic hostility being adopted and pursued by citizens of the United States, against the dominions and subjects of Spain, is utterly destitute of foundation; and that their Government, in all its branches, has maintained with the utmost rigor that neutrality, in the civil war between Spain and the colonies, which they were the first to declare. No force has been collected, nor incursions made from within the United States, against the dominions of Spain; nor have any naval equipments been permitted, in favor of either party, against the other. Their citizens have been warned of the obligations incident to the neutral condition of their country; the public officers have been instructed to see that the laws were faithfully executed; and severe examples have been made of some who violated them.

In regard to the stipulation proposed, as the condition of the ratification of the treaty, that the United States shall abandon the right to recognise the revolutionary colonies in South America, or to form other relations with them, when, in their judgment, it may be just and expedient so to do, it is manifestly so repugnant to the honor, and even to the independence of the United States, that it has been impossible to discuss it. In making this proposal, it is perceived, that His Catholic Majesty has entirely misconceived the principles on which this Government has acted, in being a party to a negotiation, so long protracted, for claims so well founded and reasonable, as he likewise has the sacrifices which the United States have made, comparatively, with Spain, in the treaty, to which it is proposed to annex so extraordinary and improper a condition. Had the Minister of Spain offered an unqualified pledge that the treaty should be ratified by his Sovereign, on being made acquainted with the explanations which had been given by this Government, there would have been a strong motive for accepting and submitting it to the Senate, for their advice and consent, rather than to resort to other measures for redress, however justifiable and proper; but he gives no such pledge; on the contrary he declares, explicitly, that the refusal of this Government to relinquish the right of judging and acting for itself, hereafter, according to circumstances, in regard to the Spanish colonies, a right common to all nations, has rendered it impossible for him, under his instructions, to make such engagement. He thinks that his Sovereign will be induced, by his communications, to ratify the treaty; but still he leaves him free either to adopt that measure or to decline it. He admits that the other objections are essentially removed, and will not, in themselves, prevent the ratification, provided the difficulty on the third point is surmounted. The result therefore is, that the treaty is declared to have no obligation whatever; that its ratification is made to depend, not on the considerations which led to its adoption, and the conditions which it contains, but on a new article, unconnected with it, respecting which a new negotiation must be opened, of indefinite duration and doubtful issue.

Under this view of the subject, the course to be pursued would appear to be direct and obvious, if the affairs of Spain had remained in the state in which they were when the Minister sailed. But it is known that an important change has since taken place in the Government of that country, which cannot fail to be sensibly felt in its intercourse with other nations. The Minister of Spain has essentially declared his inability to act in consequence of that change. With him, however, under his present powers, nothing could be done. The attitude of the United States must now be assumed on full consideration of what is due to their rights, their interest, and honor, without regard to the powers or incidents of the late mission. We may, at pleasure, occupy the territory which was intended and provided, by the late treaty, as an indemnity for losses so long since sustained by our citizens; but still nothing could be settled definitively without a treaty between the two nations. Is this the time to make the pressure? If the United States were governed by views of ambition and aggrandizement, many strong reasons might be given in its favor. But they have no objects of that kind to accomplish; none which are not founded in justice, and which can be injured by forbearance. Great hope is entertained that this change will promote the happiness of the Spanish nation. The good order, moderation, and humanity, which have characterized the movement, are the best guarantees of its success. The United States would not be justified, in their own estimation, should they take any step to disturb its harmony. When the Spanish Government is completely organized, on the principles of this change, as it is expected it soon will be, there is just ground to presume that our differences with Spain will be speedily and satisfactorily settled.

With these remarks I submit it to the wisdom of Congress whether it will not still be advisable to postpone any decision on this subject until the next session.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 9, 1820.

The Message and documents were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. PINDALL then introduced, with some observations, showing the grounds on which he deemed it necessary, a joint resolution, the object of which was, to declare, that the instalments of Revolutionary pensions which will become due on or before the 4th day of September, should be paid in like manner as if the act to amend that act, passed at the present session, had not become a law.

The question to consider this resolution was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 57.

The resolution was then read a second time.

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

MAY, 1820.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, moved to refer it to a Committee of the Whole, and make it the order of the day for to-morrow. On this motion there took place some debate: at length, the yeas and nays being ordered, on the suggestion of Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. McLEAN withdrew his motion to save time. Mr. REID renewed the motion, and Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, supported it.

The yeas and nays were then again ordered on the question, on suggestion of Mr. TAYLOR. It was decided in the negative—yeas 79, nays 62.

Whereupon, a debate arose, which consumed much time, on the principle of the resolve, in which debate the following gentlemen engaged: For the resolution—Messrs. TAYLOR, PINDALL, MERCER, SMITH, of Maryland, WHITMAN, and WOOD. Against it—Messrs. McLEAN, of Kentucky, BURTON, BLOOMFIELD, SIMKINS, BROWN, and BARBOUR.

Those who opposed the principles of this resolution objected, first, to its form, and the invasion proposed in the ordinary mode of legislation, in suspending by resolution the operation of a law. Next, the resolution was spoken of as being in effect a repeal of the law until the next meeting of Congress; that the cause which had just made the amendatory law necessary, namely, the evasions and frauds under the original law, required a corrective now as much as when, under that conviction, the amendatory law had passed; that the House was now thin, and the attempt to suspend the law was taking advantage of the absence of so considerable a portion of the House.

To these objections it was replied, that a joint resolution, approved by the President, was as much a law as in any other form, and was justified by many precedents on the Statute book. The proposition, it was urged, was not to repeal a law, but to prevent the suspension of the operation of the pension law, by the want of time to re-examine all the cases before the next semi-annual payment becomes due. As to the frauds under the old law, they were very limited, it was generally believed, and an amendment of the resolution would obviate that objection. It was further said, that there was every reason to believe it would take two years to examine anew and adjudicate the pension cases under the amendatory law. As to the House being thin, leave of absence had been granted to the absentees; and there yet remained as appeared by the last vote, one hundred and forty members, which could not be called a small portion of the House.

Mr. PARKER, of Virginia, moved to lay the resolution upon the table; which motion was negatived—yeas 70, nays 65.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, the resolve was amended by annexing a proviso, that the Secretary of War be and hereby is directed to suspend the payment of the pension to any person who, in his opinion, is not entitled to a pension under the original act.

The question was at length taken, by yeas and nays, on ordering the resolve to be engrossed for a third reading, and agreed to—yeas 85, nays 67.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, respecting the amendments of this House to the bill for the establishment of certain land offices. The Senate agrees to the amendments of this House, except that one which proposes to establish an additional land office in Indiana.

Mr. ANDERSON moved that this House do recede from this amendment. No hardship could result from so doing; there being, without this, already three land offices in Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS proposed that the House do insist on its amendment, and assigned the reason why he thought it ought to be insisted on. As to the number of land offices, he said there were not as many as the extent and population of the State required; and the Legislature of the State had, by the memorial adopted, he believed, unanimously, requested the establishment of this office.

On the question to recede from this amendment, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 57, nays 53.

WEDNESDAY, May 10.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1820;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. CULBRETH, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of James Leander Cathcart," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of his proceedings and expenditures, under the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings, and for furnishing the Capitol and President's House;" which was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, a committee was appointed, jointly with such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to inquire and report what subjects before the two Houses are proper to be acted on during the present session of Congress; and Messrs. TAYLOR, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, SMITH of Maryland, SERGEANT, and LOWNDES, were appointed of the said committee on the part of this House.

Mr. STRONG, of New York, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to ascertain, and report to the next session of Congress, the amount of claims upon the United States, in favor of American citizens, growing out of the last war with Great Britain, the Creek war, and the Seminole war, designating the names of the claimants, and the sum or sums which, in their opinion, shall be equitably and fairly due to each: and, as to the expediency of providing for the payment of the same by an issue of stock, bearing an interest of — per centum, per annum, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, out of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

mittee of Accounts were authorized and directed to make the same allowance for extra services to each person serving this House, as was granted at the end of the last session.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their disagreement to the first amendment proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the clothing of the Army of the United States in domestic manufactures, and for other purposes;" and they have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to authorize the legal representatives of Elisha Winter and William Winter, and the Attorney General, on the part of the United States, to take the examination of witnesses by commission;" and "An act to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out a canal in the State of Ohio;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

NEXT MEETING OF CONGRESS.

MR. TAYLOR, from the committee on the subject, introduced a bill to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress, viz., the second Monday in November next, instead of the first Monday in December.

In assigning the reasons of the committee for reporting this bill, Mr. T. stated the number of bills now pending in this House, the consideration of nearly the whole of which would be necessarily deferred to the next session of Congress. Of bills originating in the House, there are now pending, of a public nature, 38; of a private nature, 16. Of bills which originated in the Senate, there are, of a public nature, 21; of a private nature, 31—making a total number of bills pending, 106.

The bill was twice read; and, after some little debate, the question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Baldwin, Beecher, Bloomfield, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Case, Clagett, Clark, Cocke, Cook, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cushman, Darlington, Dewitt, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Folger, Foot, Forrest, Fullerton, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hardin, Hibshman, Hill, Holmes, Hostetter, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Little, Livermore, Lyman, Mallary, Marchand, R. Moore, S. REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

The engrossed resolution to suspend for a limited time the act in addition to the act "to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war," was read the third time.

A short debate took place on the question of its passage, in which Messrs. SIMKINS, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, CULPEPER, ALEXANDER, WARFIELD, and PINDALL, took part.

MR. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, said, he was in favor of the passage of the resolution, although he voted for the law which it is designed to suspend. Though he was in favor of the object of the law, he was not satisfied with its form; but, inasmuch as the House had been occupied several days on the subject, and had rejected various propositions to amend the law, he believed it better to pass the bill, than to do nothing. It had been represented in the House, he said, that many men of influence were receiving a pension under the law of March, 1818, and he could not consent to loan money nor lay a tax upon the people, while such men were enjoying the bounty of the Government, contrary to the true intent of the law under which they received it.

MR. B. said he had voted for every proposition to diminish the expenditures of the Government, so as to bring them within the limits of the receipts. Taxes were odious, he said, to the people, and he would not resort to them unless there was an absolute necessity.

MR. B. said, he was aware the law, which the resolution proposed to suspend, would impose a burden upon many honest and indigent soldiers of the Revolution, and delay them in obtaining the just reward of their country, and he was, therefore, disposed to suspend the law, that they might have time to comply with its requisites. He said, he had expected the law would have been modified by the Senate, but he was disappointed, and could not, therefore, vote against the resolution, as it would render the act less exceptionable. He did not believe, with the gentleman from Virginia, that there was any impropriety in varying or suspending an act by a resolution passed at the same session; nor could he perceive that there was any Constitutional objection to such a mode of legislation.

MR. B. said he had strong objections to the act which had been passed, though he voted for it, and he was willing, at the present session, to make it more acceptable, by the passage of the resolution.

On motion of MR. HOLMES, the previous question was required and taken—being decided in the affirmative.

The question on the passage of the resolve was decided affirmatively, by yeas and nays, 78 to 69, as follows:

SOUTH AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union; and the following resolves were taken into consideration:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law a suitable outfit and salary for such Minister or Ministers as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may send to any of the Governments of South America, which have established, and are maintaining, their independence on Spain.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made for requesting the President of the United States to cause to be presented to the General the most worthy and distinguished, in his opinion, in the service of any of the independent Governments of South America, the sword which was given by the Viceroy of Lima to Captain Biddle, of the Ontario, during her late cruise in the Pacific, and which is now in the office of the Department of State, with the expression of the wish of the Congress of the United States that it may be employed in the support and preservation of the liberties and independence of his country.

When Mr. CLAY rose and said: It is my intention, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw the latter resolution. Since I offered it, this House, by the passage of the bill to prevent, under suitable penalties, in future, the acceptance of presents, forbidden by the Constitution, to prohibit the carrying of foreigners in the public vessels, and to limit to the case of our own citizens, and to regulate, in that case, the transportation of money in them, has, perhaps, sufficiently animadverted on the violation of the Constitution which produced that resolution. I confess that when I heard of Captain Biddle receiving from the deputy of a King the sword in question, I felt greatly mortified. I could not help contrasting his conduct with that of the surgeon on board of an American man-of-war, in the Bay of Naples, (I regret that I do not remember his name, as I should like to record it with the testimony which I with pleasure bear to his high-minded conduct,) who, having performed an operation on one of the suite of the Emperor of Austria, and being offered fifteen hundred pistoles or dollars for his skilful service, returned the purse and said that what he had done was in the cause of humanity, and that the Constitution of his country forbade his acceptance of the proffered boon. There was not an American heart that did not swell with pride on hearing of his noble disinterestedness. It did appear to me, also, that the time of Captain Biddle's interposition was unfortunate to produce an agreement between the Viceroy of Lima and Chili, to exchange their respective prisoners, however desirable the accomplishment of such a humane object might be. The Viceroy had constantly refused to consent to any such exchange. And it is an incontestable fact, that the barbarities which have characterized the civil war in Spanish America have uniformly originated with the Royalists. After the memorable battle of Maipu, decisive of the independence of Chili, and fatal to the arms of the Viceroy, this interposition, if I am not mistaken, took place. The transportation of money, upon freight, from the port of Callao to that of Rio Janeiro, for Royalists, appeared to me also highly improper. If we wish to preserve, unsullied, the illustrious character which our Navy justly sustains, we should repress the very first instances of irregularity. But I am willing to believe that Captain Biddle's conduct has been inadvertent. He is a gallant officer, and belongs to a respectable and patriotic family. His errors, I am persuaded, will not be repeated by him or imitated by others. And I trust that there is no man more unwilling than I am unnecessarily to press reprehension. It is thought, moreover, by some, that the President might feel an embarrassment in executing the duty required of him by the resolution, which it was far from my purpose to cause him. I withdraw it.

There is no connexion intended, or, in fact, between that resolution and the one I now propose briefly to discuss. The proposition to recognise the independent Governments of South America offers a subject of as great importance as any which could claim the deliberate consideration of this House.

Mr. C. then went on to say, that it appeared to him the object of this Government, heretofore, had been, so to manage its affairs, in regard to South America, as to produce an effect on its existing negotiations with the parent country. The House were now apprized, by the Message from the President, that this policy had totally failed; it had failed, because our country would not dishonor itself by surrendering one of the most important rights incidental to sovereignty. Although we had observed a course towards the Patriots, as Mr. Gallatin said in his communication read yesterday, greatly exceeding in rigor the course pursued towards them either by France or England; although, also, as was remarked by the Secretary of State, we had observed a neutrality so strict that blood had been spilt in enforcing it—still Spanish honor was not satisfied, and fresh sacrifices were demanded of us. If they were resisted in form, they were substantially yielded by our course as to South America. We will not stipulate with Spain not to recognise the independence of the South; but we nevertheless grant to her all she demands.

Mr. C. said it had been his intention to have gone into a general view of the course of policy which has characterized the General Government; but, on account of the lateness of the session, and the desire for an early adjournment, he should waive that purpose, and, in the observations he had to make, confine himself pretty much to events subsequent to the period at which he had submitted to the House a proposition having nearly the same objects as this.

After the return of our Commissioners from South America; after they had all agreed in attesting the fact of independent sovereignty being exercised by the Government of Buenos Ayres, the whole nation looked forward to the recognition of the independence of that country as the policy which the Government ought to pursue. He appealed to every member to say, whether there was not a general opinion, in case the report of that mission should turn out as it did, that the recognition of the independence of that Government would follow as a matter of course. The surprise at a different course being pursued by the Executive at the last session, was proportionably great. On this subject, so strong was the Message of the President at the commencement of the present session, that some of the presses took it for granted that the recognition would follow of course, and a paper in this neighborhood had said there was, in regard to that question, a race of popularity between the President of the United States and the humble individual who now addressed the House. Yet, faithless Ferdinand refuses to ratify his own treaty, on the pretext of violations of our neutrality, but, in fact, because we will not basely surrender an important attribute of sovereignty. Two years ago, Mr. C. said, would, in his opinion, have been the proper time for recognising the independence of the South. Then the struggle was somewhat doubtful, and a kind office on the part of this Government would have had a salutary effect. Since that period, what had occurred? Any thing to prevent a recognition of their independence, or to make it less expedient? No; every occurrence tended to prove the capacity of that country to maintain its independence. Mr. C. then successively adverted to the battles of Maipu and Bojaca, their great brilliancy, and their important consequences.

Adverting to the union of Venezuela and New Grenada in one Republic, he said one of their first acts was to appoint one of their most distinguished citizens, the Vice President Zea, a Minister to this country. There was a time, he said, when impressions are made on individuals and nations by kindness towards them, which last forever—when they are surrounded with enemies, and embarrassments present themselves.

Ages and ages may pass away, said Mr. C., before we forget the help we received, in our day of peril, from the hands of France. Her injustice—the tyranny of a despot—may alienate us for a time; but the moment it ceases we relapse into a good feeling towards her. Do you mean to wait, said Mr. C., until these Republics are recognised by the whole world, and then step in and extend your hand to them, when it can no longer be withheld? If we are to believe General Vives, we have gone about among foreign Powers, and consulted with Lord Castlereagh and Count Nesselrode, to seek some aid in recognising the independence of these powers. What! after the President has told us that the recognition of the independence of nations is an incontestable right of sovereignty, shall we lag behind till the European Powers think proper to advance? The President had assigned, as a reason for abstaining from the recognition, that the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle might take offence at it. So far from such an usurped interference being a reason for stopping, Mr. C. said, he would have exerted the right sooner for it. But the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle had refused to interfere, and on that point the President was mistaken. Spain, it was true, had gone about begging the nations of Europe not to interfere in behalf of the South Americans; but the wishes of the whole unbiassed world must be in their favor. And while we had gone on, passing neutrality bill after neutrality bill, and bills to punish piracy—with respect to unquestioned piracy, no one, Mr. C. said, was more in favor of punishing it than he; but he had no idea of imputing piracy to men fighting under the flag of a people at war for independence: whilst we had pursued this course, even in advance of the legitimates of Europe, what, he asked, had been the course of England herself on this head? Here Mr. C. quoted a few passages from the work of the Abbe de Pradt, recently translated by one of our citizens, which, he said, though the author was not very popular among Crowned heads, no man could read without being enlightened and instructed. These passages dwelt on the importance of the commerce of South America, when freed from its present restraints, &c. What would I give, exclaimed Mr. C., could we appreciate the advantages which may be realized by our pursuing the course which I propose! It is in our power to create a system of which we shall be the centre, and in which all South America will act with us. In respect to commerce, we should be most benefited; this country would become the place of deposit of the commerce of the world. Our citizens engaged in foreign trade were at present disheartened by the condition of that trade; they must seek new channels for it, and none so advantageous could be found as those which the trade with South America would afford. Mr. C. took a prospective view of the growth of wealth, and increase of the population of this country and of South America. That country had now a population of upwards of eighteen millions. The same activity of the principle of population would exist in that country as here. Twenty-five years hence its population might be estimated at thirty-six millions; fifty years hence, at seventy-two millions. We now have a population of ten millions. From the character of our population we must always take the lead in the prosecution of commerce and manufactures. Imagine the vast power of the two countries, and the value of the intercourse between them, when we shall have a population of forty millions, and they of seventy millions! In relation to South America the people of the United States will occupy the same position as the people of New England do to the rest of the United States. Our enterprise, industry, and habits of economy, will give us the advantage in any competition which South America may sustain with us, &c.

But however important our early recognition of the independence of the South might be to us, as respects our commercial and manufacturing interests, was there not another view of the subject, infinitely more gratifying? We should become the centre of a system which would constitute the rallying point of human wisdom against all the despotism of the Old World. Did any man doubt the feelings of the South towards us? In spite of our coldness towards them, of the rigor of our laws, and the conduct of our officers, their hearts still turned towards us, as to their brethren; and he had no earthly doubt, if our Government would take the lead and recognise them, that they would become yet more anxious to imitate our institutions, and to secure to themselves and to their posterity the same freedom which we enjoy.

On a subject of this sort, Mr. C. asked, was it possible we could be content to remain, as we now were, looking anxiously to Europe, watching the eyes of Lord Castlereagh, and getting scraps of letters doubtfully indicative of his wishes; and sending to the Czar of Russia, and getting another scrap from Count Nesselrode? Why not proceed to act on our own responsibility, and recognise these governments as independent, instead of taking the lead of the Holy Alliance in a course which jeopardizes the happiness of unborn millions? Mr. C. deprecated this deference for foreign Powers. If Lord Castlereagh says we may recognise, we do; if not, we do not. A single expression of the British Minister to the present Secretary of State, then our Minister abroad, he was ashamed to say, had moulded the policy of our Government towards South America—an expression which, like Mr. Adams's definition of republicanism, had been construed to mean any thing or nothing. We look too much abroad Mr. C. said. You may find our Ministers in England at one time at the door of the Horse Guards, and the next moment in Paternoster-Row, purchasing literature for this country. Our institutions, said

Mr. C., now make us free; but, how long shall we continue so, if we mould our opinions on those of Europe? Let us break these commercial and political fetters; let us no longer watch the nod of any European politician; let us become real and true Americans, and place ourselves at the head of the American system.

Gentlemen all said they were all anxious to see the independence of the South established. If sympathy for them was enough, the patriots would have reason to be satisfied with the abundant expressions of it. But something more was wanting. Some gentlemen had intimated that the people of the South were unfit for freedom. Will gentlemen contend, said Mr. C., because those people are not like us in all particulars, they are therefore unfit for freedom? In some particulars, he ventured to say, that the people of South America were in advance of us. On the point which had been so much discussed on this floor during the present session, they were greatly in advance of us. Grenada, Venezuela, and Buenos Ayres had all emancipated their slaves. He did not say that we ought to do so, or that they ought to have done so, under different circumstances; but he rejoiced that circumstances were such as to permit them to do it.

Two questions only, Mr. CLAY argued, were necessarily preliminary to the recognition of the independence of the people of the South; first, as to the fact of their independence; and, secondly, as to their capacity for self-government. On the first point, not a doubt existed. On the second, there was every evidence in their favor. They had fostered schools with great care; there were more newspapers in the single town of Buenos Ayres (at the time he was speaking) than in the whole kingdom of Spain. He never saw a question discussed with more ability than that in a newspaper of Buenos Ayres, whether a federative or consolidated form of government was best.

But, though every argument in favor of the recognition should be admitted to be just, it would be said that another revolution had occurred in Spain, and we ought therefore to delay. On the contrary, Mr. C. said, every consideration recommended us now to act. If Spain succeeded in establishing her freedom, the colonies must also be free. The first desire of a government, itself free, must be to give liberty to its dependencies. On the other hand, if Spain should not succeed in gaining freedom, no man could doubt that Spain, in her reduced state, would no longer have power to carry on the contest. So many millions of men could not be subjugated by the enervated arm and exhausted means of aged Spain. In ten years of war, the most unimportant province of South America had not been subdued by all the wealth and all the resources of Spain. The certainty of the successful resistance of the attempts of Spain to reduce them would be found in the great extent of the provinces of South America—of larger extent than all the Empire of Russia. The relation of the colonies and mother country could not exist, from the nature of things, under whatever aspect the Government of Spain might assume. The condition of Spain was no reason for neglecting now to do what we ought to have done long ago. Every thing, on the contrary, tended to prove that this, this was the accepted time.

With regard to the form of his proposition, Mr. C. said, all he wanted was to obtain an expression of the opinion of the House on this subject; and whether a Minister should be authorized to one or the other of these governments, or whether he should be of one grade or of another, he cared not. This Republic, with the exception of the people of South America, constituted the sole depository of political and religious freedom; and can it be possible, said he, that we can remain passive spectators of the struggle of those people to break the same chains which once bound us? The opinion of the friends of freedom in Europe is, that our policy has been cold, heartless, and indifferent towards the greatest cause which could possibly engage our affections and enlist our feelings in its behalf.

Mr. C. concluded by saying that, whatever might be the decision of this House on this question, proposing shortly to go into retirement from public life, he should there have the consolation of knowing that he had used his best exertions in favor of a people inhabiting a territory calculated to contain as many souls as the whole of Christendom besides, whose happiness was at stake, and which it was in the power of this Government to do so much towards securing.

The resolve was reported to the House.

Mr. Cook moved to amend the resolve, by adding: "and that it is expedient to provide for the occupation of East and West Florida." Whereupon,

Mr. Coker required the previous question (which precludes all debate and amendments.)

Mr. Smith, of North Carolina, moved to lay the subject on the table; and the motion was negatived—112 to 42.

The previous question having been determined in the affirmative—

The main question, on agreeing to the said first resolve, as above stated, was decided as follows:

[After Mr. CLAY sat down, there was considerable debate on the first resolve, the second being withdrawn. Mr. SERGEANT, in particular, spoke at some length in reply to parts of Mr. CLAY's speech. Besides, Messrs. STEPHENS, LOWNDES, NELSON, WILLIAMS, FLOYD, SILSBE, TRIMBLE, BRUSH, COOK, BROWN, MERCER, OVERSTREET, and SMITH, of North Carolina, took part in the debate. The sketches which we have preserved were not perfect enough to justify our attempting a report of them, at this distant day, the first we have been able to devote even to a hasty sketch of Mr. CLAY's remarks, which it was just to him, as the mover of the resolution, to publish. The result was, the adoption of the first proposition above stated, by a majority of five votes, in the House of Representatives. No ulterior proceedings, however, took place in regard to the subject.—Eds. Nat. Int.]

THURSDAY, May 11.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act to limit the term of office of certain officers therein named, and for other purposes," reported the same, without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. S., from the same committee, to which was also referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act to regulate the fees of the clerk and marshal of the district court of the United States for the State of Louisiana," reported the same, without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. S. also reported the bill from the Senate entitled "An act to provide for the building an addition to the custom-house now erecting in the city of New Orleans, for the use of the district court of the United States for the State of Louisiana," without amendment; and it was laid on the table.

Mr. KENT, from the managers appointed on the part of this House, to attend the conference with the managers appointed on the part of the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on an amendment of this House to the bill from the Senate entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed for that purpose," made a report: whereupon the House agreed to recede from their first amendment to the said bill, and agreed to the amendment recommended in the report of the Committee of Conference.

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act to authorize the legal representatives of Elisha Winter and William Winter, and the Attorney General on the part of the United States, to take the examination of witnesses by commission," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out a canal in the State of Ohio," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

An engrossed bill entitled an act in addition to the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1820," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SIMKINS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to report to this House, at an early period of the next session of Congress, such plan or plans for a Navy Peace Establishment as he may deem expedient, with a view to a reduction of the expenditures of that establishment.

The said resolution was read and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House entitled "An act to alter and establish certain post roads, with amendments;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate for the further prevention of the crime of piracy.

The Committee were occupied some time in discussing the details of this bill and the amendments reported by the select committee of this House.

The amendments of the select committee were finally all agreed to in Committee of the Whole, concurred in by the House, and, with the bill, ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. Foor submitted the following amendment to the standing rules and orders of this House, to wit:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Enrolled Bills to correct any error in date in any engrossed or enrolled bills, and report such correction to the House."

The amendment was ordered to lie on the table for one day.

The House proceeded to consider the message of the Senate, informing that they insist on their disagreement to the first amendment proposed by this House, to the bill "to provide for clothing the Army of the United States in domestic manufactures, and for other purposes." Whereupon, Mr. COBB moved that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; which motion was negatived; and, on motion of Mr. MERCER, the subject was then ordered to lie on the table.

The bill, in addition to the general appropriation law, making provision for a small additional appropriation for the pay of members of Congress, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House then, on motion of Mr. COCKE, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "respecting the Military Establishment of the United States."

[The provisions of this bill are as follows, viz:

SEC. 1. That, so soon as vacancies shall happen, the Army of the United States shall be commanded by one major general and two brigadier generals only; and that, after a vacancy shall have happened in the office of major general, no more than one adjutant general, one inspector general, and one deputy quartermaster general, shall be retained in service.

SEC. 2. That the assistant adjutant general, the assistant inspector general, the deputy commissioners of purchases, the regimental quartermasters, and the clerks in the office of the adjutant and inspector general, shall be dismissed from service.

SEC. 3. That the company officers of the ordnance department shall be transferred to the corps of artillery, and shall hereafter receive the pay and emoluments of officers of that corps; and it shall be the duty of the officers of the corps of artillery, when detailed for that purpose, to perform such duties as shall be assigned to them in providing, distributing, and preserving ordnance and ordnance stores.

SEC. 4. That the field officers of the corps of artillery shall consist of two colonels, two lieutenant colonels, and four majors.

SEC. 5. That one half of the monthly pay of each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private of the army, shall be retained until the soldier entitled thereto shall have been honorably discharged from service, or shall die therein.

SEC. 6. That officers of the army shall, while on furlough, be entitled to half pay only, and no other emolument.

SEC. 7. That officers, of whatever grade, ordered to attend courts martial, or to travel on any other occasion, not requiring a change of residence, shall be allowed — cents per mile for travelling, instead of an allowance for the transportation of baggage.]

The first section of this bill being read—

Mr. COCKE moved to amend the bill, by striking out the first section, and inserting in lieu thereof a provision that, from and after the passage of this act, the army shall be commanded by one brigadier general, and there shall be retained in the service no more than one adjutant general, one inspector general, and one quartermaster general.

In connexion with this motion, should it be agreed to, Mr. C. proposed to add another new section to the bill, the purpose of which was to abolish the office of adjutant and inspector general, and that the duties of the office shall hereafter be performed by an officer of no higher grade than captain; and that the assistant adjutants and inspectors general shall be dismissed from the service.

The question being stated on the first of these amendments—

Messrs. BRUSH, SIMKINS, and BLOOMFIELD, opposed the amendment, and Mr. COCKE supported it.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

MR. TRIMBLE moved to lay the bill on the table, with a view to enable him to offer for consideration sundry propositions, to the following effect:

1. That a retrenchment of the expenses of the Government ought to be made in all instances, where the public service will permit.

2. That it is expedient to create a Naval Peace Establishment.

3. That the Military Peace Establishment ought to be reduced to six thousand men, rank and file.

4. That the President of the United States cause plans of reduction, on the plan of these resolutions, to be laid before Congress at the next session.

MR. TRIMBLE elucidated and explained his views at considerable length.

The motion to lay the bill on the table was opposed by MR. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and was negatived.

The question recurring on MR. COCKE's proposed amendment—

MR. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, spoke at considerable length in support of it.

MR. SMITH, of Maryland, and MR. BRUSH, spoke against the amendment, but generally in favor of the original bill; and MR. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and MR. FLOYD, in support of it.

On the question, MR. COCKE's amendment was negatived by a vote of 65 to 42.

MR. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then moved to amend the first section of the bill so as to make it effective from the time of its passage, and exclusive of the contingency of resignations.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. SIMKINS and JOHNSON, and supported by MR. COBB.

MR. CLAY then moved to lay the bill on the table, to give him an opportunity to move the resolve, which will be found below.

The laying the bill on the table was opposed by Messrs. WARFIELD, CANNON, and FLOYD; but was agreed to—63 to 59.

MR. CLAY then submitted a resolution, which, being immediately amended, stood in the following form:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a plan for the reduction of the army to six thousand officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, and preserving such parts of the corps of engineers, as, in his opinion, without regard to that number, it may be for the public interest to retain; and, also, what saving of the public revenue will be produced by such an arrangement of the army as he may propose in conformity to this resolution.

After some few remarks from different gentlemen, this resolution was agreed to.

MR. SIMKINS then offered the following resolution, the subject thereof being in a manner connected, as he had observed, with that just agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to report to this House, at an early period of the next session, such plan or plans for a Navy Peace Establishment as he may deem expedient, with a view to a reduction of the expenditures of that establishment.

On the question to agree to this resolve, it was decided in the negative—60 to 49.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then rose, and reported to the House the resolution, which had been agreed to.

MR. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to amend the resolve, by striking out the word "officers," so as to leave the number six thousand, exclusive of officers. This motion was agreed to—58 to 52.

MR. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved further to amend this resolve, by inserting after the word "men," the words "including such reduction of the general staff required by the state of the army as herein proposed;" and the motion was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

MR. SIMKINS then renewed the motion which he had made when in Committee of the Whole; and, on motion of MR. FLOYD, it was ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, May 12.

MR. On motion of Mr. Foor, the House proceeded to consider the following proposition, submitted yesterday by him, viz:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules and orders of this House: It shall be the duty of the Committee on Enrolled Bills to correct any error in date in any engrossed or enrolled bills, and report such correction to the House."

And the said proposition was agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Babbitt," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Two Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

The first of said Messages was read, and is as follows:

WASHINGTON, May 12, 1820.

The Message and accompanying documents were ordered to lie on the table.

The House again proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to alter and establish certain post roads;" and the amendments were concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Babbitt," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act authorizing the employment of additional naval force,'" was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, "to continue in force an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy, and also to make further provision for punishing the crime of piracy," was read the third time, as yesterday amended at the instance of Mr. MERCER, and was passed, and returned to the Senate for concurrence in the amendment, after refusing to agree to a motion of Mr. RICH to recommit the same.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, moved that the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to continue in force the act, entitled "An act to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy;" the bill to incorporate the President and Managers of the American Colonization Society, and the resolutions authorizing the President of the United States to negotiate with foreign Governments on the means of effecting an entire abolition of the African slave trade, be discharged from the further consideration thereof; and, the question being taken thereon, it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. EDWARDS then moved that the said resolutions lie on the table.

A division of the question on that motion was called for; and, on the question Shall the first of the said resolutions, which is in the following words, lie on the table? to wit:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to negotiate with all the Governments where Ministers of the United States are or shall be accredited, on the means of effecting an entire and immediate abolition of the slave trade.

And determined in the negative.

The question was then also taken, Shall the third resolution (which is in the following words) lie on the table? viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, in such use as he may deem it expedient to make of the public ships of the United States, to afford every aid, not inconsistent with the public welfare, to the efforts of the American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States upon the western coast of Africa:

And passed in the affirmative.

Mr. BRUSH then moved that the first resolution be postponed to the next session of Congress; which motion was negatived.

The first resolution was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BRUSH the second resolution was postponed to the next session.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to authorize the President of the United States to borrow a sum of money for the use of the Government.

Mr. LOWNDES moved to amend the bill, by striking out that part of it which authorizes the loan to be taken for an extended time, at an interest of five per cent., so as to leave the loan to be taken at a rate not exceeding six per cent., and redeemable at the pleasure of the Government.

Mr. L. was of opinion that there was occasion, in the present circumstances of the country, to tie up the Government from redeeming this loan when they should choose; and that it would be setting a bad example to begin now, in a time of peace, to borrow money, and make the loan so long irredeemable.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the motion. He was well informed, he said, that, on the terms proposed by the bill, the loan could be obtained at five per cent.; and he thought it desirable to obtain a loan at five per cent. to pay off a debt on which an interest of six per cent. was now paid. The owners of the Mississippi stock, so far as they had claims on the Government, would, perhaps, invest the whole in this loan. He was not moved by the pride of opinion, in opposing this motion, but he believed that the substantial interest of the country required the commencement of a system of loans at the interest of five per cent., and he was told that this was a favorable time for doing it.

Mr. LOWNDES said, he was not willing that the Government should be debarred, by its own act, from making use of its unappropriated lands, at any time, in the redemption of temporary loans like this. If the Government should have money thus lying idle, the gentleman would see that they would lose by it in one month what they would gain in twelve months by the difference of the rate of interest. We ought not to set the example of creating, in time of peace, a debt which it would be out of the power of the Government to extinguish at its pleasure.

Mr. SMITH said that, if he could believe that in one or two years the Treasury would be in the condition the gentleman supposed, he should not, perhaps, object to the proposed amendment. But he had no expectation that such would be the result.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then moved to strike out three millions, (the proposed amount of the loan,) and in lieu thereof insert two millions. [This motion was declared not to be in order, the House having already changed the amount from two to three millions.] Mr. W. then moved to strike out three millions, and insert, in lieu thereof, two and a half millions.

Mr. W. said, he had made this motion on the ground that he had no idea that we should be able to keep in the Treasury a million of dollars for contingencies. He had no wish, he said, that Government should ever have a dollar in the Treasury more than was necessary for the authorized expenditure; believing that the expenditure would keep pace with the money in the Treasury. If more money should be necessary, the President had it always in his power to convene Congress for the purpose of providing it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he should oppose the motion, though he believed it not very material. If the money was not wanted, it would not be borrowed. The bill contained no absolute injunction to borrow, but an authority to borrow if necessary. Mr. S. made a statement to show that, even if the whole amount of three millions of the loan should be borrowed, it would not increase the debt of the country, inasmuch as, besides the outstanding Mississippi stock, there was $2,800,000 of the principal of the public debt to be paid off this year.

Mr. LITTLE suggested, that calling Congress would not be a very economical process for effecting what could so easily be effected now, by leaving the bill as it stands.

Mr. FLOYD made a few remarks in favor of the motion, and then the motion was negatived.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—the yeas and nays being required by Mr. COCKE, but not sustained by a sufficient number.

The bill respecting the enlistment of seamen for the Navy of the United States, was then taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the Senate, providing for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, passed through a Committee of the Whole.

Several amendments were recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, among which was the striking out two sections of the bill providing for erecting an hospital at New Orleans, and appropriating money for purchasing a building for the same purpose at Savannah. This question gave rise to considerable debate, being warmly opposed by Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, and Mr. CUTHBERT, but was decided in the affirmative. A new section was also added, authorizing and requiring the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be deducted, at the rate of twenty-five cents per month, from the pay of the officers and seamen of the Navy of the United States, for the purposes of this bill.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time.

SMALL VESSELS OF WAR.

The bill from the Senate, authorizing the building of certain small vessels of war, passed through a Committee of the Whole, after being amended, so as to reduce the number from seven to five.

[The object of these vessels is to protect the revenue, and pursue pirates, &c., in the waters of our Southern coast, which are too shallow to be navigated by the vessels now in service.]

The bill was opposed by Mr. CANNON, as unnecessary, and also because the cost of the vessel ($60,000) was not to be taken from the moneys already appropriated for repairs. It was supported by Messrs. SILSBEE, JOHNSON, and NEWTON, on the ground of its being required for the security of the revenue, and the detection of smugglers and pirates.

The question on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, was decided by yeas and nays—78 votes to 37, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Allen of N. York, Anderson, Archer of Md., Archer of Virginia, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Bateman, Bloomfield, Brush, Burton, Butler of Louisiana, Case, Cobb, Crawford, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Darlington, Dennison, Dickinson, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Folger, Fullerton, Hill, Hostetter, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Kinsley, Little, Livermore, Lowndes, Lyman, McCoy, McLane of Delaware, Meigs, Mercer, S. The bill was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

NAVIGATION LAW.

The bill from the Senate, supplementary to the bill commonly called the Navigation Law, passed through a Committee of the Whole, where it was decidedly supported by Mr. NEWTON, Mr. CLAY, and Mr. FOOT.

The vote on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading was decided affirmatively by yeas and nays—94 to 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of N. York, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Bateman, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brush, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Clagett, Cobb, Crafts, Crawford, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dickinson, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Fullerton, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hall of New York, Hibshman, Heister, Hill, Jones of Virginia, Kent, Kinsley, Little, Linn, Livermore, Lowndes, Lyman, Maclay, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, S. TONNAGE DUTY ON FRENCH SHIPS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to impose a new tonnage duty on French ships and vessels.

[The first section of the bill provides that, in lieu of the tonnage duty now paid on French ships or vessels, there shall be paid a duty of eighteen dollars per ton, on all French ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States, any act to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to prevent the extension of the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between the goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels, and vessels of the United States," to French ships and vessels, and the goods imported therein, whenever the Government of France shall accede to the provisions of the act above referred to.

Sec. 2. That the tonnage duty laid, and directed to be paid by this act, shall be collected and paid according to the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine.

Sec. 3. That this act shall commence, and be in force, from and after the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty.]

Mr. NEWTON, the chairman of the Committee of Commerce, gave a brief exposition of the causes which rendered expedient the passage of this bill. The documents laid before Congress on the subject, he said, showed that all attempts at negotiation on it had failed. The policy of the United States had been just and liberal. We had offered every thing that could be offered, on terms of reciprocity, to induce France to abandon her policy, so injurious to our commercial and navigating interest. We had offered her the same terms as had been accepted by Russia, by the Netherlands, and by the Hanseatic cities; but we had offered it in vain.

Mr. N. said he was very sorry that it became his duty now to advocate a policy which was abhorrent to his mind—that of restrictions on commerce. He was happy that our Government had shown to the nations of the world the example of placing commerce on the most liberal footing; but, as France had refused to reciprocate that liberality, it has now become our imperious duty to come back, in regard to France, to the policy which she herself pursues. In consequence of her illiberality, in this respect, we are compelled to resort to the measure now under consideration. She is now in possession of a positive advantage over us, by her regulations. Will she voluntarily give it up? It has been already shown that she will not; and she will continue to refuse to give it up, until she finds that, by persisting in it, she has subjected her own commerce to inconvenience. In order, therefore, to enable the President of the United States, between this time and the next session of Congress, to negotiate with the French Government to some effect, it was necessary to pass this bill. There is in the bill a provision that, if the French Government feels disposed to enlarge its policy in regard to us, all restrictions on her commerce in our ports will be done away, and her vessels will be placed on the same footing in the ports of the United States as those of Great Britain now are. If we do not resort to this measure, the door of negotiation will remain, as it now is, shut in our face. These considerations being taken into view, he hoped the Committee would see the necessity of passing this bill.

Without further debate, the Committee rose and reported the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was subsequently read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

And the House adjourned to meet at nine o'clock on Monday.

MONDAY, May 15.

Ordered, That the Committee of Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions, bills, and other matters and things, to them referred at the present session, and upon which they have finally acted.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House cause to be prepared and printed, for the use of the members, a list of business remaining undetermined, which, by the existing rule, is to be resumed and acted upon at the next session of Congress; designating bills, reports, and resolutions committed, from those laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report to the House, at the next session of Congress, such offices of the customs as may be properly suppressed on account of their inutility or from any other cause.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for carrying into effect the treaty lately concluded with the Chippewa nation of Indians, was read the third time and passed.

Ordered, That the title be "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect the treaties concluded with the Chippewa and Kickapoo nations of Indians;" and that the Clerk carry the said bill to the Senate, and ask their concurrence therein.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate concur in the first, third, fourth, and fifth, and disagree to the second and sixth amendments proposed by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to provide relief for sick and disabled seamen." They have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to borrow three millions of dollars and for other purposes," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. TRIMBLE moved that the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act granting certain privileges to the Ocean Steamship Company of New York," be discharged from the further consideration thereof. This motion was rejected by the House.

The Loan bill, returned from the Senate with amendments, the object of which was to increase the authority to borrow five millions, instead of three, and to strike out what relates to the surplus of the Sinking Fund, and to the funding of the Mississippi stock, was taken up.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, who regarded the amendment as going to do covertly what the bill proposed to do openly, moved that the House disagree to the amendments, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreement. This was agreed to.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, stating their disagreement to the second and sixth of the amendments proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to provide relief for sick and disabled seamen;" whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth insist on their said second amendment, and recede from their sixth amendment to the bill aforesaid.

The House proceeded to consider the bill to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the recovery of debts in the District of Columbia: Whereupon, the bill was again ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act designating the ports within which, only, foreign armed ships shall be permitted to enter;" with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act designating the ports, within which, only, foreign armed vessels shall be permitted to enter," was concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland,

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, such sum as he may deem just, not exceeding the compensation of the regular clerks of his department, for the same period, to an assistant clerk, during the present session.

The House proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for building an addition to the custom-house now erecting in the city of New Orleans, for the use of the district court of the United States for the State of Louisiana;" when it was ordered that the said bill be read a third time to-day. It was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved that the House do now proceed to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate certain boundaries;" which was rejected by the House.

On motion of Mr. STREET, the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act granting certain privileges to the Ocean Steamship Company of New York," were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

The House then proceeded to consider the said bill; when it was, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland, laid in at the Clerk's table sundry statements, marked A B C E and F, in relation to the expenditures of public moneys in the Navy Department; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Public Buildings, and the Committee on the Expenditures in the War Department, respectively, be discharged from the further consideration of the several matters and things to them referred during the present session, and upon which they have not finally acted.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House, of the following titles, to wit: "An act to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war, and for other purposes;" and an act in addition to the act, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1820;" with amendments to each, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The Senate insist on their amendments disagreed to by this House to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to borrow three millions of dollars, and for other purposes; and have agreed to the conference asked by this House thereon, to which they have appointed managers on their part.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1820;' was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendment; the Committee rose, and reported their agreement thereto; and the amendment was concurred in by the House.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force an act, entitled 'An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war, and for other purposes,'" was concurred in by the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the managers on the part of this House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments depending to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to borrow three millions of dollars, and for other purposes," made a report: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House insist on their disagreement to the first and fourth of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the said bill, and recede from their disagreement to the third of the said amendments.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The House, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, in addition to the acts providing for the better organization of the Treasury Department.

[This bill provides a summary process for the recovery of moneys belonging to the United States, in the hands of individuals, collectors, and other public agents, &c.]

The bill gave rise to a debate, begun by Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, in opposition to the bill, which was supported by Mr. SERGEANT and others.

The objection set up to the bill was, that it proposed to violate the right, secured by the Constitution, of a trial by jury, &c., and also the other right, that no man should be deprived of his property without due process of law.

In reply to this objection, it was argued, that there was nothing proposed but what was sanctioned by numerous precedents, such as sales for non-payment of taxes, &c. The moment a man receives the public money, he is the agent or instrument of the Treasury, and ought to be subject to its power, so far as to compel him to account for the money which he has received, and refuses or neglects to account for.

The bill having been reported to the House, a motion was made by Mr. CROWELL to postpone the further consideration thereof to the first day of the next session; which was negatived.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time; and was subsequently read a third time, and passed—by yeas and nays—89 to 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Baldwin, Bloomfield, Brevard, Buffum, Burton, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Cobb, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Darlington, Dennison, Dickinson, Dowse, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Ervin, Fisher, Folger, Forrest, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hibshman, Heister, Hill, Hostetter, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Kinsey, Little, Linn, Lowndes, Maclay, McCreary, Meigs, Metcalf, R. Moore, S. Moore, Monell, Murray, Neale, Newton, Overstreet, Parker of Massachusetts, Patterson, Philson, Rankin, Rhea, Rich, Ringgold, Rogers, Russ, Sampson, Sawyer, Sergeant, Silsbee, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, Storrs, Street, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Taylor, Terrell, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tucker of South Carolina, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warfield, Wendover, Whitman, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, and Wood.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen of New York, Ball, Bateman, Brush, Butler of Louisiana, Crowell, Edwards of North Carolina, Foot, Garnett, Hendricks, Herrick, Nelson of Virginia, Ross, and Swearingen.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Conrad Laub, deceased," with an amendment. The Senate recede from their first and fourth amendments to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to borrow three millions of dollars, and for other purposes."

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Conrad Laub, deceased," was read, and concurred in by the House.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

The House having got through the business before it—

Mr. WARFIELD, of Maryland, rose and observed, that although it had been customary, whenever there existed a disposition on the part of the House by an unanimous vote to express their unqualified approbation of the course pursued by the Speaker, to delay the expression of that opinion until the termination of the period for which he was elected, yet he was induced, on this occasion, to depart from that course, having distinctly understood that it was the intention of the Speaker to decline the duties of the Chair at the close of the present session. Any observations, said Mr. W., to enforce the justice and propriety of unanimously adopting the resolution would be altogether superfluous. Every member of the House, in common with himself, had witnessed, during the present laborious and protracted session, the dignity, ability, and impartiality, with which the Speaker had discharged the duties of his station; and he was persuaded there was not a member of that body to whom it would not afford the truest gratification to offer the small tribute of respect and approbation intended to be expressed in the resolution then before them. Mr. W. then submitted the following resolution, the question on which being put by the Clerk, it was adopted unanimously:

Resolved, unanimously, by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That the thanks of this House be given to the honorable HENRY CLAY, Speaker thereof, for the dignity, ability, and impartiality with which he has discharged the duties of that station.

Upon which Mr. CLAY rose, and addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: The House of Representatives has, on former occasions, honored me by a vote of its thanks. I then felt that the sole claim which I had to a testimony of the public approbation, so distinguished, was the zeal with which I have ever sought to discharge the highly responsible duties of the Chair; and I am now sensible that I am indebted to your belief of the continued exertion of that zeal for the fresh proof of your favorable sentiments towards me, in the resolution which you have just adopted.

If, gentlemen, the traveller parts with regret from those agreeable acquaintances which he casually makes, as he journeys on his way, how much more painful must be the separation of those who have co-operated many months in the anxious endeavor to advance the prosperity of a common country; who have been animated by mutual sympathies; and who have become endeared to each other by an interchange of all the friendly offices incident to the freest social intercourse? Addressing you as I now do, probably the last time from this place, I confess I feel a degree of emotion which I am utterly unable to express. I shall carry with me into that retirement which is necessary to the performance of indispensable private duties, a grateful recollection of all your kindnesses; of the respectful and affectionate consideration of me which you have always evinced; of the generous and almost unlimited confidence which you have ever reposed in me; and of the tenderness with which you have treated even my errors. But, interesting as have been the relations in which I have stood, for many years, to this House, I have yet higher motives for continuing to behold it with the deepest solicitude. I shall regard it as the great depository of the most important powers of our excellent Constitution; as the watchful and faithful sentinel of the freedom of the people; as the fairest and truest image of their deliberate will and wishes; and as that branch of the Government where, if our beloved country shall unhappily be destined to add another to the long list of melancholy examples of the loss of public liberty, we shall witness its last struggles and its expiring throes.

Gentlemen, I beg you to carry with you my sincerest wishes for your individual happiness, and the prosperity of your respective families.

MR. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. VAN RENSSELAER having been appointed to wait on the President, reported to the House that the President had no further communication to make; and

The House adjourned to the second Monday in November next, being the thirteenth day of the month.

APPENDIX

TO THE HISTORY OF THE SIXTEENTH CONGRESS.

[FIRST SESSION.]

COMPRISING THE MOST IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS ORIGINATING DURING THAT CONGRESS, AND THE PUBLIC ACTS PASSED BY IT.

DANISH BRIG HENRICK.

[Communicated to Congress, December 28, 1819.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

On the 23d of February, 1803, a Message from the President of the United States was transmitted to both Houses of Congress, together with the report of the then Secretary of State, Mr. Madison, upon the case of the Danish brigantine Henrick and her cargo, belonging to citizens of Hamburg, recommending the claim to the favorable consideration of Congress. In February, 1805, it was again presented, by a Message from the President, to the consideration of Congress, but has not since been definitively acted upon.

The Minister resident* from Denmark and the Consul General from Hamburg having recently renewed applications in behalf of the respective owners of the vessel and cargo, I transmit, herewith, copies of their communications for the further consideration of the Legislature, upon whose files all the documents relating to the claim are still existing.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 24, 1819.

From the Consul General of Hamburg to the Secretary of State.

HAMBURG CONSULATE GENERAL,
Philadelphia, Nov. 9, 1819.

SIR: On behalf of several of the citizens of Hamburg, I have the honor to solicit your attention to the subject of their interests in the cargo of the Danish brigantine Henrick, Peter Scheelt, master, which was captured by a public armed vessel of the United States in the year 1799, with a request that you will be pleased to lay the case before the President of the United States, that, if he shall see proper, he may submit it to the consideration of Congress.

This vessel and cargo have been heretofore within the view of the Executive of the United States, and have been the subject of a very favorable representation from the Department of State. It will not, therefore, be necessary that I should enter into a minute detail of the circumstances attending it, as the public records of the Government contain a full and faithful statement of them.

I deem it proper at this time, sir, to present the case before you in this summary way. The vessel in question was Danish property; the cargo on board belonged exclusively to citizens of Hamburg; and, of course, the whole was neutral in the then existing war. She sailed from Hamburg, bound to Cape François, on the 3d of October, 1799. She was taken by a French privateer, and on the 8th of the same month was recaptured by the American public vessel called the Pickering, and carried into St. Christopher's. At this British island the vessel and cargo were libelled for salvage; one-half of the gross amount of sales was decreed to the recaptors, and the other half, after deducting costs and expenses, to the owners. Of the value of the cargo, amounting to upwards of thirty-four thousand dollars, nearly the whole was lost, as appears by the documents heretofore exhibited on this subject to the Department of State.

In the past consideration of this affair, it seems to have been plainly conceded that it was the duty of the American commander to have brought the property recaptured under the authority of the United States within their jurisdiction, and that if this duty had been performed the vessel and cargo would have been released either altogether, or upon payment of the most moderate rate of salvage. By a different line of conduct from that which should have been pursued, the property was involved in a sentence proceeding from a palpable misconception and misapplication of a law of the United States, and its almost total loss was the consequence. The owners, thus heavily suffering from the conduct of the American commander of a public vessel, had no remedy for the injury they had sustained but an appeal to the justice of the American Government. This appeal was made on behalf of the whole interest, and its justice was in various departments of the Government distinctly recognised; but the redress suited to the case has never yet been afforded.

It is supposed that the conduct of the Danes towards American property may have had its effect upon the American Government in postponing its just purposes towards the owners of the property in question. But it is respectfully submitted that this consideration, if it has any existence, ought not to affect the interests of the owners of the cargo, who are citizens of Hamburgh, and who now separately make their claim to retribution.

Most respectfully inviting your attention, sir, to the documents in the Department of State, in relation to the brigantine Henrick and cargo, and to several reports of committees of the House of Representatives in Congress on the subject of this claim, I do earnestly submit the claim of the owners of the cargo to your consideration, and request that it may be laid before the President of the United States, in order that a just recompense may be had for the heavy injuries which have been thus sustained.

Permit me, sir, to assure you of my particular regard and consideration, wherewith I have the honor to remain, sir, your most obedient servant,

C. N. BUCK,

Consul Gen. of Hamburgh to the U. S.

Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS,

Secretary of State.

[The following report on the same subject was made February 8, 1820.]

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the 24th of December last, recommending to Congress the consideration of the case of the Danish brigantine Henrick and her cargo, respectfully report, that they have thought it right to present to the House that view of the circumstances of the case which is contained in the report made by Mr. Madison on the 22d of February, 1803:

"The Secretary of State has the honor to report to the President of the United States, upon the note of the Minister of His Danish Majesty, dated on the 9th instant, as follows:

"That it appears that the Danish brigantine Henrick, Captain Peter Scheelt, sailing from Hamburgh, loaded with an assorted cargo, and bound to Cape François, was captured on the 3d of October, 1799, by a French privateer, and, on the 8th of the same month, she was recaptured by an American public armed vessel called the Pickering, and carried to the British island of St. Christopher, where she arrived on the 10th.

"That, from an authenticated transcript of the proceedings in the case of the said vessel, had before the court of vice-admiralty at the said island, it appears that the said court took cognizance of the case, and awarded one-half of the gross amount of the sales of the brig and her cargo to be paid to the recaptors, and the other half, after deducting costs and expenses, to be restored to the owners. That this rate of salvage appears to have been adopted from the laws of the United States, as then applicable to recaptors of American property, and of such as belonged to belligerent Powers in amity with the United States; but it is believed that these laws had, according to decisions of our own courts, no reference to recaptures of neutral property. That admitting, what has received the sanction of some recent authorities, that, in certain peculiar cases of danger of a neutral being condemned by a belligerent, the recaptors are entitled to a proportionate salvage, there is much reason to believe this is not such a case, as the vessel was bound from a neutral to a French port, the whole of the property being neutral, and, according to the assurance of Mr. Lindemann, the Governor of the Danish West India islands, most of the Danish vessels carried into Guadaloupe, for a year before this capture, were released, and some of them with damages. That the courts of the United States have, in cases much more strongly marked by circumstances indicating a danger of a neutral being condemned, allowed much smaller rates of salvage.

"That the laws of the United States required vessels captured under their authority to be brought within their jurisdiction; and it is conceived that it was the duty of the American officers, in this case, to repel the attempt of the foreign judiciary to take cognizance, much less ought they to have directly submitted their recapture to its decision, which, as it could not be revised or rectified, in case of error, by the tribunals of their own country, might tend to involve it in claims on its responsibility from others.

"That, according to the representation of the agent for the owners of the Danish vessel, of the sum of $44,500, the value of the vessel, freight, and cargo, there remained, after satisfying the decree for salvage and expenses, no more than $8,374 41.

"That, as the policy and interest of the United States lead them, in a special manner, to respect and promote the rights and facilities of neutral commerce; as the sentence in this case was permitted, if not procured, by officers of the United States, to be made in a foreign, and therefore improper tribunal; as there remains no doubt but that a court of the United States, pronouncing thereon, would either have rejected the claim for salvage altogether, or reduced it to the most moderate scale, as the declared basis of the sentence; as the law of the United States was inapplicable to the case; and as it is understood that a remedy is now unattainable, in the ordinary judicial course, it is the opinion of the Secretary of State that, under all the circumstances, the case ought to be referred to the just provisions of Congress thereon.

"All which is respectfully submitted.

"JAMES MADISON.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 22, 1803."

The examination of the subject by the committee has led them to an entirely different conclusion, as to the obligations of the United States, from that which seems to be intimated in the foregoing report. The laws of the United States required that the French vessels of which it authorized the capture should be brought into the ports of the United States for condemnation. They provided for the restoration of American property which might be recaptured from a French captor, upon a salvage to be determined either upon the mutual agreement of the parties, or by a decree of a court of the United States, and they do not seem to have provided at all for the case of the capture from the French of property belonging to a third nation. The proceedings in the court of vice admiralty in St. Christopher's, by which so large an allowance of salvage and costs was made as to absorb a very great proportion of the amount for which the vessel and cargo were sold, were submitted, in 1800, to three of the most distinguished lawyers of this country, who concluded, from the papers laid before them, that the sentence of the court was in consequence of proceedings exhibited on the part of the owners of the vessel and cargo, and not on the part of the recaptors. In this opinion, (which the committee have subjoined to their report,) it is suggested to be unadvisable for the Danish Consul to apply either to the Government of the United States for indemnity, or to institute any suit in the courts of justice here against the captors.

This claim of indemnity against the Government is, indeed, of an unusual character. It is alleged that a foreign court, in a case to which an American officer was a party, awarded an unjust sentence, and that the costs of this legal proceeding were excessive. The claimants have abstained from the natural remedy for correcting the errors of an inferior court, which the justice of civilized nations provides, by constituting tribunals of appeal. They abstain, too, in conformity with sound legal advice, from prosecuting any legal remedy in our own courts against the officers of whose misconduct they complain, and they choose to prefer their claims to indemnity against the Government which, as they say, did not authorize, and whose laws, indeed, according to their construction, forbade the proceeding.

This claim has several times been recommended to the attention of Congress by the Executive. Committees have made reports in its favor, and a bill to provide for it passed the House of Representatives, January, 1804, by a majority of one hundred and eight to fifteen members.

The committee recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is not expedient to make provision to indemnify the owners of the Danish brigantine Henrick and her cargo for the injury alleged to have resulted from the sentence of a British court of vice-admiralty in the island of St. Christopher.

A.

Copy of a paper filed in the Navy Department, purporting to be a copy of an opinion given by Edward Tilghman, William Lewis, and Peter S. Duponceau.

On the case of the Danish brig Henrick, taken by a French privateer from Guadaloupe, on her voyage from Hamburgh to Cape François, retaken by the United States brig Pickering, after being more than ninety-six hours in the power of the French, carried into St. Christopher's, and there labelled by Peter Scheelt, master of the said Danish brig, on behalf of the owners, underwriters, and others concerned, in the court of vice-admiralty, who ordered the said brig Henrick and her cargo to be sold, and adjudged one moiety of the gross proceeds to the recaptors, for salvage; as far as we are able to judge from the papers laid before us, which do not contain the whole of the record, it appears to us that the sentence of the judge of admiralty was in consequence of proceedings exhibited on the part of the owners of, and others concerned in the vessel and cargo, and not on the part of the recaptors; which proceedings, it is reasonable to conclude, were for restitution. Under these circumstances, we do not think it advisable for the Danish Consul either to apply to the Government of the United States for indemnity or recompense for the great loss sustained, or to institute any process in the courts of justice here against the captain of the Pickering.

It must, we think, be left to the discretion of the owners, underwriters, and others who may happen to be interested, whether they will or will not prosecute an appeal to the courts in England.

EDWARD TILGHMAN,
WILLIAM LEWIS,
PETER S. DUPONCEAU.

Copy of a letter from Commodore Tingey, the commander of the United States squadron in the West Indies at the time the Danish brig was recaptured.

NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON,
January 19, 1820.

SIR: In pursuance to your directions, I have endeavored to call to my remembrance as many of the facts as came to my knowledge relative to the recapture of the Danish brigantine Henrick from the French, by the United States brig Pickering, Captain Hiller, in the month of October, 1799, during the period of my having the command of our West India squadron. Captain Hiller, in the brig Pickering, pursuant to orders from the Secretary of the Navy, having joined my command, received my orders relative to what part of the station he should cruise in, so as to have the squadron distributed in such a manner as should be most effectual in protecting our defenceless commerce, and annoying the enemy; when, some time in the month of October above mentioned, Captain Hiller fell in with the above-mentioned brig Henrick, in possession of a prize-master and crew from a French privateer, by which she had been captured some short time before; he, of course, recaptured the Henrick, as it was his duty to do, and carried her to the port of Basseterre, in the island of St. Christopher, which was the general rendezvous of the squadron. At this time I was, as my duty strictly enjoined, cruising in the United States ship Ganges, for the purposes before mentioned. On my next meeting with the Pickering, some few days afterwards, Captain Hiller reported this recapture to me, merely as a part of his transactions, in his general report; but, in an interview with him on board my ship, (the Ganges,) I learned that an adjudication for the salvage (agreeably to the act of Congress) had been given at St. Christopher's, at the instance of the captain or agent of the Henrick, or of a compromise with said captain or agent—my memory, at this distant period, does not enable me to say which. Thus, the whole transaction had commenced and terminated without my having any view or knowledge thereof until it had passed.

From the celerity with which the business was conducted at St. Christopher's, I cannot entertain a doubt that the adjudication or compromise was effected with the assent, or, as more probable, at the instigation of the captain or agent for the Henrick; for Captain Hiller was too correct an officer (scrupulously so in regard to his duty) to have of himself commenced on any decisive measures against the recaptured vessel, until I should have arrived, (as commander-in-chief of the squadron,) to have decided on the most proper mode of procedure, in conformity with my instructions from our Government.

Had the captain or agent of the brig Henrick awaited my arrival at St. Christopher's, he could readily, on a proper representation of his case, have been conveyed to either of the Danish islands to leeward, as the time allotted for the cruise of the Ganges in those seas had expired; Commodore Morris, with the United States ship Adams, had already arrived to relieve me, and had brought my instructions from the Secretary of the Navy to return home; and it being my duty to touch at all the neutral ports in my way, to collect all our homeward-bound merchantmen, and take them under convoy, which duty I did perform; and, consequently, the Henrick could have been protected to either of the Danish islands, St. Croix or St. Thomas; from the latter of which I sailed with a large convoy a very few days afterwards; for, on the 10th of November, I was in the river Delaware, conformably with my instructions from the Secretary of the Navy.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.

THOMAS TINGEY.

The Hon. S. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

GOVERNMENT OF ST. DOMINGO.

[Communicated from the Secretary of State to the House of Representatives, March 27, 1820.]

The Secretary of State, to whom, by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th of February last, the petitions of Samuel G. Perkins and others, merchants of Massachusetts, and of William Patterson and others, merchants of Baltimore, were referred, has the honor of submitting to the House the following report:

In the month of January, 1817, in consequence of a memorial to the President of the United States from sundry persons interested in the claims set forth in these petitions, Septimus Tyler was appointed an agent to proceed to the Island of St. Domingo, for the purpose of claiming the indemnity which appears to be justly due to the petitioners for property so unjustly taken from them. He accordingly proceeded thither, but was denied access to the Government of Christophe upon the alleged ground of informality in the style of his powers. Mr. Tyler did not live to return to the United States.

In the Spring of the year 1818, a second attempt was made to send an agent to make the demand, and authority was given to present himself in a manner which there was reason to expect would have discarded every question of form. The result, however, was a refusal again to receive him. A formal recognition of the kingdom of Hayti not being deemed expedient, no further measures have been found practicable on the part of the Executive in the case; those suggested by the memorialists being within the exclusive authority of the Legislature.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 20, 1820.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The petition of Samuel G. Perkins, Ezra Davis, Ebenezer Francis, Jonathan Low, Benj. Smith, and others, whose names are undersigned, merchants dwelling in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and citizens of the United States, respectfully represents:

That they and those whom they represent, and others, were, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and ten, engaged in a lawful commerce with the ports and places in the Island of St. Domingo under the dominion of Henry Christophe; that, during that year, they shipped a large amount of property to Cape Henry and Gonaives, in the expectation of procuring return cargoes of the produce of the island, but, owing to the scarcity of crops that season, it was impracticable to procure return cargoes immediately; and, by the then existing laws of that Government, they were prohibited from reshipping the cargoes they had landed there, or from bringing away specie; that some of the persons having the charge of the cargoes thus situated sold the same on a credit, to be paid for in produce at the opening of the ensuing season, and directly returned home with their vessels in ballast, while other persons thus situated preferred to wait for their cargoes; that, during this period of delay, Christophe, perceiving a large amount of American property within his grasp, and tempted by the prospect of great plunder, under pretence of having an unsatisfied claim against certain merchants in Baltimore, in the month of October of the same year, forcibly detained all the American vessels then in his ports, some of which had been brought in by his cruisers, and arrested their officers and crews, and held them thus under detention until the month of January following; and on the third day of the said month of January, passed a decree, (a copy whereof accompanies this petition, and which he immediately caused to be executed,) by which he seized and confiscated to his own use property belonging to your petitioners and other citizens of the United States, of the value, by his estimate, of one hundred and thirty-two thousand dollars and upwards—a decree so manifestly wicked and unjust, that even Christophe, while he endeavors to shelter himself under his supposed necessity, acknowledges it to be as much against sound policy and good faith in him as it is arbitrary and contrary to the laws of all civilized nations. And your petitioners further state that, after unavailing attempts to procure a restitution of their property, or of some part thereof, from Christophe, they applied to the President of the United States for redress, setting forth the injuries they had sustained, and the outrage committed upon the Government of the United States itself. That, during the late war, the application of your petitioners was but partly acted upon, amidst the multiplicity of great and important business which then occupied the attention of that high officer of the Government; but that, on the return of peace, the President of the United States, after investigation of the facts, and having satisfied himself of the justice of the claims of your petitioners, sent out to Cape Henry an agent, in the name of the United States of America, and in one of the vessels of war (the Congress frigate) belonging to the United States, to demand restitution in behalf of your petitioners, and other sufferers by the same outrage; which said agent failed to accomplish the object of his mission. That the President of the United States, not unmindful of the great injuries sustained by your petitioners, and of the outrage committed against the Government of the United States, but nevertheless desirous of preserving peaceable dispositions towards Christophe, sent out to Cape Henry another agent of the United States, once more to demand of Christophe to make compensation to the sufferers under his decree aforesaid. That said agent was unable to procure any satisfaction from the said Christophe, and returned conclusively to establish the fact that all demands upon Christophe to do justice to your injured petitioners will continue to prove unavailing, unless such demands are enforced by the strong arm of the Government. And your petitioners would further respectfully state that they have been credibly informed that the commanders of the ships of war of the United States, since their visits to Cape Henry, are clearly of opinion that a blockade of that port by a single frigate even, or a demand of restitution accompanied by a power to enforce such demand, would be attended with the success so much desired by your petitioners, and so much an object heretofore with the head of our Government. In considering this case, your petitioners would respectfully suggest that no questions of doubtful rights present themselves for discussion or compromise, nor do they perceive such points of policy or expediency to arise as will suffer the Government to acquiesce and submit to so great injuries committed upon its faithful citizens. Relying on the energy of our Government and the wisdom of its councils, it cannot be necessary to urge the importance of protecting the rights and interests of every class of men in the community, and especially in times like the present, against every outrage committed by any Power, civilized, piratical, or barbarous; and your petitioners, submitting the remedy for their wrongs, and the mode in which it is to be pursued, to your wisdom, humbly request your aid, and, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

CLAIMS AGAINST RUSSIA.

[Communicated to the Senate, April 18, 1820.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 17, 1820.

The Secretary of State, to whom, by a resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant, was referred the petition of Eliphalet Loud, and others, to consider and report thereon, has the honor of reporting:

That the facts relative to the representations made on the part of this Government to that of Russia, by the petitioners, are correctly stated by them; and that, since the 7th day of July, 1818, the latest date mentioned by them, another memorial has been addressed by the Minister of the United States at St. Petersburg to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, a copy of which is herewith submitted. It does not appear, by any of the despatches from Mr. Campbell since received, that any answer to this memorial has been returned.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

Mr. Campbell, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States to Russia, to Count Nesselrode, Minister of Foreign Affairs at St. Petersburg.

ST. PETERSBURG, June 6, 1819.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to inform his excellency Count de Nesselrode, Secretary of State, that he has it in special charge from his Government to invite the attention of the Government of His Imperial Majesty to two cases of individual claims thereon by citizens of the United States, of long standing.

Of these, one is that of the brigantine Hector, belonging to Israel Thorndike, of Boston, commanded by Captain Luke Thorndike, which was captured by His Imperial Majesty's frigate Venus, carried to the island of Tenedos, and there condemned with her cargo as lawful prize, in June, 1807, by sentence of a committee of prizes assembled on board His Imperial Majesty's ship of war the Iverday; the other, that of the ship Commerce, belonging to the Weymouth Importing Company, in the State of Massachusetts, commanded by Captain Joseph Penel, which was taken by a privateer under the flag of this Empire, carried into Corfu, and there condemned, with her cargo, as lawful prize, in —, 1807, by a decree of the committee of prizes of that island.

These vessels, with their cargoes, belonging to citizens of the United States of high respectability, who were not only conscious of the purity of their own motives in the instructions given respecting their voyages, but also convinced, from the most satisfactory evidence, that in conducting those voyages no violation whatever of the laws and usages of nations had been committed, they applied to their Government, soliciting its aid in making their cases known to that of His Imperial Majesty; feeling entire confidence, that to procure the reversal of those condemnatory decrees, and obtain that restitution to which they conceive themselves entitled, it was only necessary to have the circumstances under which those captures and condemnations took place, so laid before the view of His Imperial Majesty that the merits and justice of their claims might fairly appear. For this purpose, full statements of those cases were laid before the Imperial Government in October, 1809, by Mr. Levett Harris, then Consul General of the United States at St. Petersburg, with ample testimony to prove, it is conceived, the injustice and irregularity of the captures, as well as of the condemnations consequent thereon; and, at the same time, a due claim for indemnity was made in behalf of the respective claimants for the heavy losses they had sustained.

On reviewing these statements, and the evidence accompanying the same, they appear so ample, and to support so conclusively the justice of those claims, that the undersigned forbears entering into new details on the subject, and satisfies himself, for the present, by referring his excellency the Secretary of State to those documents already in possession of the Imperial Government.

He would not, however, fulfil his duty conformably to the instructions of his Government, if he did not bring to the recollection of his excellency on this occasion the length of time that has elapsed since the appeals in those cases were brought before the Imperial Government, being nearly ten years, during which the repeated applications in favor of the claims, in the name of their Government, have been allowed to remain unanswered, and without procuring for them either that indemnity to which they conceive themselves so justly entitled, or a knowledge of the grounds upon which it has hitherto been considered proper to withhold it; and he is satisfied his excellency will duly appreciate the motives by which he is actuated in urging the revision and final determination of those cases with that zeal and earnestness which their obvious justice, as well as the hardships necessarily resulting from privations so long continued, appear to him imperiously to demand.

With the expression of the high and perfect confidence reposed in the justice, equity, and impartiality of the decisions the tribunals of his Imperial Majesty in the last resort shall pronounce, the undersigned has the honor to renew to his excellency the Secretary of State the assurance of his high and very distinguished consideration.

G. W. CAMPBELL.

SWEDEN—INDEMNITY.

[Communicated to the Senate, April 21, 1820.]

To the Senate of the United States :

I lay before the Senate, in pursuance of their resolution of the 21st of last month, the accompanying report and documents from the Department of State.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 28, 1820.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 17, 1820.

The Secretary of State, to whom a resolution of the Senate of the 25th of March has been referred, requesting the President to lay before that House copies of the correspondence between the Ministers or other agents of the United States, and the Ministers or Government of Sweden, relative to the seizures, sequestration, or confiscation of the ships or other property of citizens of the United States, under the authority of Sweden, has the honor respectfully to submit to the President the copies of the papers desired by that resolution.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

Mr. Russell to Count d'Engestrom, Minister of Foreign Affairs at Stockholm.

STOCKHOLM, Sept. 3, 1816.

The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acquaint his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, that the instructions which he has received make it his indispensable duty to call the serious attention of his excellency to the claims of American citizens for indemnity for their property sequestered, confiscated, and sold at Stralsund, a few years since, by the order, and for the account of the Swedish Government.

It is believed that to present, without comment, a simple statement of the facts belonging to this transaction, such as they appear to have been from the documents left by Mr. Speyer with the American legation, will be quite sufficient to manifest the indubitable justice of these claims, and to prevail on His Swedish Majesty's Government to provide for their immediate liquidation.

The Swedish Government represented itself to have been compelled by the French Government to sequester, in the month of June, 1810, the American property at Stralsund; and afterwards repeatedly expressed its solicitude to obtain the termination of that sequestration, for the avowed purpose of restoring the property which it affected to the rightful owners.

The sequestration was, in fact, raised with the consent of the French Government, about the beginning of August, 1811, and the property to which it attached placed at the sole disposition of His Swedish Majesty.

Immediately after it thus came within His Majesty's exclusive control, it was, notwithstanding all the assurances previously given, and the rights of the American owners, confiscated and sold by the order, and for the sole account of the Swedish Government.

Since that time until the present day no indemnity whatever, although frequently promised, has ever been made by the Swedish Government to the injured citizens of the United States.

Such, according to the archives of the American legation, appear to be the simple facts belonging to this transaction, and with regard to the nature and consequences of which it is believed there can exist no diversity of opinion. These facts alone would have been amply sufficient to have secured the success of the American claims, had not the justice of these claims been already repeatedly acknowledged by the Swedish Government itself.

During the original sequestration by the Swedish Government, at the instance, as is stated, of that of France, the Baron de Wetterstedt, who was then charged with the affairs of Pomerania, assured Mr. Speyer that the participation of Sweden in that proceeding was for the purpose of protection, and not of confiscation; that more than thirty despatches had been transmitted to Paris in order to obtain the release of the sequestered property, or the permission to sell that property, either on Swedish account, or the joint account of Sweden and France; assuring Mr. Speyer, at the same time, that, in case such release or permission were obtained, a just proportion of the property, or its proceeds, should be restored to the rightful American owners.

Even after the confiscation and sale of the property, the Swedish Government, on its part, never urged any right in justification of the proceeding, nor even the pretext of foreign coercion for its palliation. The only question which appears to have been agitated at that time related not to the justice, but to the practicability of the indemnification. There was no controversy as to the principle; and even a proposition to give it effect, by the delivery of iron cannon, was suggested by the Baron de Wetterstedt.

The doctrine that the property of the citizens of a friendly State, lawfully imported into an ultramarine province of Sweden, was not entitled to the same protection from the Swedish Government as when imported into Sweden itself, (which, it seems, his excellency the Count d'Engestrom once permitted himself to intimate,) it is not necessary here to examine. The question now presented is not whether the Swedish Government was bound, in good faith, to protect the American property at Stralsund against the violence and injuries of foreign nations, but whether it was not bound to refrain, itself, from voluntarily confiscating that property, and converting it to its own use, without the form of a trial, or even the pretext of foreign compulsion.

The note which his excellency the Count d'Engestrom addressed to Mr. Speyer, on the 22d of May, 1813, and which appears to be the last communication made on the subject, states that the sequestration took place upon the demand of the French Government, and in conformity to the Treaty of Paris; but his excellency does not pretend that the final confiscation of this property, and the appropriation of its proceeds, were at the dictation or for the benefit of that Government. Such a pretext, indeed, would have been inconsistent with the previous declaration of his excellency himself; for, on the 12th of August, 1811, he informed Mr. Speyer, as appears from Mr. Speyer's note to his excellency of the 14th of that month, that "the sequestered property at Stralsund was then at the sole disposal of His Swedish Majesty." It is not of the original act of sequestration, whatever might have been its origin, or however unjust and injurious its operation, that the undersigned now specially complains; but it is for the final and voluntary confiscation and sale of the property by the Government of Sweden, for its own account, that he is instructed to demand an indemnity. In the note above referred to, his excellency does not even insinuate a doubt of the justice of such a demand; but, on the contrary, he implicitly admits it when he states that his Swedish Majesty had hoped to have been able to indemnify the American citizens from the revenues of his German provinces. In thus speaking of indemnity, the relative injury is certainly acknowledged; why the funds for this indemnity should have been exclusively sought for in the revenues of the German provinces, it is difficult to determine. The American citizens, who trusted their property in a port of Swedish Pomerania, had a full reliance not on the local authorities and resources only, but on the universal good faith and entire power of the Swedish Government for justice and protection. The impossibility, therefore, which his excellency suggests, on account of the then recent invasion of Pomerania by the French, to accord any indemnity whatever, appears to have been founded on a supposition erroneous and inadmissible. It still proves, however, that, even at that time, it was the ability and not the obligation to accord the indemnity which was wanting in the view of the Swedish Government.

What inference his excellency wished should be drawn from the fact which he stated, that even Swedish subjects had suffered, without indemnity, a participation in the evils of the act of sequestration, has not been discovered. It is not believed that his excellency intended to say that the sovereign of a country has the right to treat alien friends, who are transitorily within his jurisdiction, for the purpose of trade, in the same manner he might think proper to treat his own subjects—to levy on them the same taxes, and to subject them to the same requisitions. Were such a doctrine to prevail, there would be an end to all international commerce. Whatever the sovereign of a State may deem fit to do, within his own jurisdiction, in relation to those who are within his allegiance, cannot, indeed, be found to be wrong by any other Government; but there certainly cannot be deduced from this principle a right to extend oppressive measures to the citizens of other independent States, nor can these citizens be supposed to find any alleviation of their sufferings in the mere knowledge of the fact that they do not suffer alone.

If, contrary to all reason and usage, it could be admitted that the revenues and resources of Pomerania were alone to be regarded as responsible to the American claimants for the property there confiscated by Sweden, and the invasion by the French destroyed, at that time, those means of making indemnity, yet that invasion was of brief duration, and that province has since become an ample source of wealth and empire to the Swedish Government, in having not only furnished an equivalent at the Treaty of Kiel for the acquisition of Norway, but, subsequently, a sufficient consideration for three millions and a half of dollars received from Prussia. It is, indeed, to be regretted that, while the Government of Sweden applied much of these funds to objects in no way connected with Pomerania, it should have totally neglected all satisfaction of the American claims, which it had before affected to consider as the special debt of that province.

The circumstance that the duties had been paid on the merchandise previous to its confiscation, and never returned, not only proves the lawfulness of the importation, but singularly aggravates the injury inflicted on the American proprietors.

From this view of the subject, it is believed that His Swedish Majesty's Government will no longer hesitate to afford that indemnity which the admitted justice of the case demands, and which the Government of the United States confidently expects from the known integrity and good faith of His Majesty. The inability of the Swedish Government, at any moment, to provide this indemnity, cannot be admitted; and, after its recent success and aggrandizement, it would be offensive to suggest the possibility of such a pretext being again urged on its part.

The value of the property, at the current price, when it was first sequestered, and which would furnish the just rule to measure the indemnity, is not precisely known to the undersigned. It was, however, considerably greater than that at which this property was afterwards either estimated or sold.

This property was estimated, when it came to the free disposal of the Swedish Government, at one hundred and ninety-two thousand rix dollars, Pomeranian currency; and was actually sold to a single merchant for one hundred and fifty-one thousand dollars of the same money.

According to an estimate communicated by Mr. Speyer to the Baron de Wetterstedt on the 5th of October, 1811, the first cost of the property in the United States was one hundred and ten thousand Spanish dollars.

In whatever way, therefore, this property be valued, the amount is too small to embarrass the Swedish Government for an instant in providing the requisite funds for the indemnification of the American claimants. Small, however, as this amount may be, and little as it is calculated to justify a refusal of indemnity under the pretext of inability, it has unfortunately been found sufficient seriously to injure the American owners, and to reduce some of them to insolvency and ruin.

The undersigned believes it unnecessary to say more; and he confidently trusts that what he has said will not have been in vain. He trusts that, while the relations of the two countries are placed on so liberal a basis with respect to the future, the prospect they open may not be overshadowed by any disagreeable recollection of the past, which might perplex either party with doubts of the justice and good faith of the other.

The undersigned prays his excellency the Count d'Engestrom to accept the assurances of his highest consideration.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

The Count d'Engestrom to Mr. Russell.

STOCKHOLM, Sept. 6, 1816.

The undersigned, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note addressed to him by Mr. Russell, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, claiming an indemnity for certain property sequestered, confiscated, and sold some years back at Stralsund, by order and for the account of the Swedish Government.

Before giving a positive answer to that note, the undersigned considers it indispensably necessary to apply to the former Department of the Affairs of Pomerania for the required information on the subject in question. He will not fail, on receiving it, to lay the affair before the King, and to communicate immediately His Majesty's answer to the Government of the United States, either through Mr. De Kantzow, or by addressing it directly to Mr. Russell.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to Mr. Russell the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

COUNT D'ENGESTROM.

Mr. Russell to the Secretary of State.

STOCKHOLM, Oct. 16, 1818.

SIR: Before making any further communication in relation to the Stralsund claims, I believed it to be proper to prepare the Swedish Minister for its reception. I availed myself accordingly for this purpose of the interview which I obtained on the 3d instant.

Count d'Engestrom, as usual, approached the subject with much repugnance, and was evidently embarrassed in finding an apology for his extraordinary silence in relation to it. He did remind me, indeed, that the business was not originally of his department, but appeared to be aware that this circumstance could no longer account for his perseverance in avoiding all discussion. He therefore abandoned this ground, confessed himself in fault, and assured me of his prompt attention to any communication which I might now think expedient to make on the subject. With regard to the merits of the claims, he observed that the Swedish Government had much to say in its defence, but he acknowledged that he found great difficulty in getting over a sort of promise that had been given to accord an indemnity.

Relations with Sweden—Indemnity.

In reflecting on this conversation, I conceived it might be useful still to make one effort more, before I took leave of the subject, by communicating the declaration which you had prescribed to me in your last instructions. The expressions of the King, at the time I presented my credentials, were, as I have already informed you, more precise against the justice of the claims than any I had before heard from him; and I had reason to believe that Count d'Engestrom had been instructed to take, in the conversation which I have mentioned above, that ground. To prevent, if possible, such a course, I believed it might be useful to anticipate the contemplated movement, and to interpret the silence in respect to our claims into a recognition of their justice, and to profit of the confession of Count d'Engestrom, "that there had been a sort of promise of indemnity." In this view, a strong and rather spirited note appeared to me alone calculated to have the desired effect. I therefore, on the 5th instant, presented to the Count d'Engestrom a note, of which the enclosed (A) is a copy.

I did not hear any thing in reply from the Count until the 13th instant, when I received from him a note inviting me to repair to the Foreign Office on the day following.

When I waited on him, on the 14th, agreeably to his appointment, he began the conversation by observing that he had not yet been able to obtain a definitive decision on my propositions relative to commerce, although he was in daily expectation of being authorized to communicate to me such a decision. He then stated that he had been commanded to invite me to dine with the King the next day, as His Majesty desired to converse with me concerning the Stralsund claims; but he added, with evident embarrassment and much hesitation, "I dare not present your note to His Majesty, and I hope you do not wish to quarrel with us." I could not but be surprised at his alarm, and I assured him that if my note had been well translated he could have found nothing in it of a hostile character; on the contrary, it had been dictated by the most unqualified confidence in the justice and friendship of his sovereign. He rejoined, that it had caused him great affliction, and he hoped that I would not insist on his communicating that note to the King, as it would be the most disagreeable act that he had ever performed during the long period that he had been in office. He entreated me to allow him to return it, and to consent to address to him another, which should simply remind him of my previous communications, which, he remarked, had been quite strong enough, and he engaged that such a note should have a full and early answer. I replied that, as the note already delivered appeared entirely fitted to the occasion, I could not consent to withdraw it, nor abandon the ground that had been taken. If he found, contrary to what had been intended or expected, any thing harsh in that note, still it might be well for him to retain it, as a memorial of the feelings that had been excited by the conduct of the Swedish Government. Willing, however, to place him at his ease, I consented to write another note, in the manner he had requested. He acceded to these proposals, and agreed to keep the note which had occasioned so much inquietude. On my part I addressed to him, on the same day, another note, of which the enclosed (B) is a copy.

It has appeared necessary to trouble you with these details, in order to explain to you the successive delivery of two notes, so different in character, in so short an interval of time.

My views in writing the first, and the circumstances under which the second was delivered, have been already stated; but I cannot forbear to acquaint you with the real reasons for my proceedings in relation to the latter.

It was not from any deference to the sensibilities of Count d'Engestrom, or to those of the King, (however reluctant I might be unnecessarily to wound them,) that induced me to acquiesce in the wishes which the Minister had expressed to be saved from the painful necessity of acting on my note of the 5th instant. Notwithstanding his declarations, I was fully persuaded that the contents of that note had actually been communicated to the King. This persuasion was induced, not only by the time which had elapsed (a period of seven days) between the receipt of that note by Count d'Engestrom, and his discovery that he dared not deliver it to the King, but by the invitation for me to dine with the King the next day, in order to converse concerning these claims; for this invitation must have resulted from a knowledge of that note. From this fact I was reluctantly obliged to infer that my note had failed in its main object, that of obtaining indemnity without further discussion. I was now reduced to the alternative of either delivering a new note, and listening to a tardy attempt at justification, or of running the risk, by pressing that already delivered, of furnishing a pretext for an abrupt termination of all discussion, and perhaps for a categorical rejection of the claims. The interest of the claimants appeared to recommend the former course, and I accordingly adopted it. And this I did the more willingly as the stimulus already given had produced all the excitement of a favorable tendency that could be expected from it, and it seemed prudent to administer a palliative, in order to prevent consequences more violent than had originally been contemplated.

Agreeably to the invitation above mentioned, I dined yesterday with the King at his country palace of Rosendala. Immediately after dinner, he desired me and Count d'Engestrom to accompany him into his private apartments. He there at once introduced the subject of the claims, and expressed a regret that all the circumstances connected with that transaction had not hitherto been communicated to the American Government. He observed that these circumstances, he believed, would palliate, if not justify, the conduct of Sweden in that transaction, and that they should be immediately addressed to me. He then gave directions to Count d'Engestrom, in conformity with this declaration, and, in doing so, he alluded to an order of the French Government, designating the objects to which the proceeds of the American property were to be applied. He added that he was still disposed to do all he could for the relief of the American sufferers; but that, as he had nothing excepting military stores at his disposal for that object, he could furnish this relief in articles of that description only. I simply replied that we could not have expected that new facts would have been brought forward at this late day, after the earnest manner in which we had so long urged these claims; and that I could hardly believe—I might say hope—that these facts were of a nature to justify the Swedish Government, and exempt it from all responsibility. I was, however, entirely disposed to give to these facts, whatever they might be, a candid consideration.

I am now waiting, with much solicitude, for the communication which has been promised, and, until it be received, I must refrain from giving an opinion in relation to the final issue of this business.

After what I have written above, I ought to add, that the manner of the King, always gracious, was peculiarly so on this occasion; and, so far from his betraying any signs of displeasure at any thing I had done, he was unusually prodigal of his professions of friendship for the American Government and people, and of his attentions to their Minister. There were several other topics introduced into this conversation, which, as they have no relation to the subject of this letter, I shall reserve for another communication.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

A.

Mr. Russell to Count d'Engestrom.

STOCKHOLM, Oct. 5, 1818.

The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acquaint his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, that it is not without surprise and pain that the American Government has learned that all the representations which have hitherto been made to the Government of Sweden concerning its voluntary seizure and sale of the bona fide property of citizens of the United States, at Stralsund, in 1811, have not only remained without effect in obtaining a just indemnity, but have not even been noticed with the common courtesy of an answer.

Reluctantly, indeed, would the Government of the United States be persuaded that this ungracious silence was intended to add indignity to injustice. The character of both Governments forbids such a construction; for it is believed that they are both equally incapable of offering or suffering an injury of this description.

It is now more than two years since the undersigned had the honor to present to his excellency, on the 3d of September, 1816, the facts on which the American claims are founded. If the interference of a private agent of the American claimants furnished good cause for suspending all communication between the two Governments on the subject, yet, when that interference had terminated without effect, (and it did so terminate more than a year since, as appears by a letter of that agent to the Baron de Wetterstedt, of the 3d of October, 1817,) the fitness of such communication between the two Governments was necessarily restored. It was in this conviction that the undersigned addressed a note to his excellency on the 16th of February last, referring to that above mentioned, of the 3d of September, 1816, and again urging an early attention to the American claims. It was not until the 27th of April that the undersigned was favored with even an acknowledgment of the bare receipt of this note of the preceding February, and since that time he has not heard further from his excellency in respect to these claims. The only inference consistent with the friendly and honorable feelings of both Governments, which it is now permitted to draw from this persevering though tacit refusal on the part of the Swedish Government to enter into all discussion of the merits of the question, is, that the evident and frequently acknowledged justice of the claims has not only left little room for such a discussion, but has, added to the repeated declarations and overtures of the Swedish Government, prevented, with that Government, to recognise the obligation of more than an implied promise to accord satisfactory indemnity. It is, therefore, from a confidence in the good faith as well as in the justice of His Swedish Majesty's Government that such an inference is drawn, and that the undersigned feels not only authorized, but rejoiced to be able, under the instructions which he has just received, to abstain from entering further at this time into a disagreeable discussion of right, and to confine himself to desiring his excellency to state, with precision, the utmost amount which His Majesty may, in his generosity and commiseration of the individuals immediately concerned, as well as in his regard for equity, and his consideration and friendship for the Government of the United States, be willing to accord for the relief and indemnity of the sufferers, and the mode in which it may be proposed to furnish that amount.

The undersigned takes leave to remind his excellency that to the value of the merchandise should be added the amount of the duties which were paid by the proprietors, and the accumulated interest of more than seven years, in order to constitute an adequate indemnity.

The pure and lofty principles which the American Government never ceases to cherish and to practise in its intercourse with all nations, and the confident expectation which it entertains that the monarch who has been elevated to the throne by his virtues will be distinguished for the moral dignity of his reign, forbid all distrust or apprehension that the request which the undersigned has now stated to his excellency will not be answered by a prompt and satisfactory compliance.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to his excellency the assurance of his highest consideration.

STOCKHOLM, October 14, 1818.

The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acquaint his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, that the instructions which he has received make it his duty to call the attention of the Swedish Government once more to the claims of American citizens for indemnity for their property sequestered at Stralsund, in the year 1810, and there sold the year following, by the order and for the sole account of His Swedish Majesty's Government.

From a confidence in the justice and liberality of his Majesty, the undersigned forbears at this time from acting on his instructions in their full spirit and extent, and confines himself to requesting His Excellency to cause this matter to be taken into immediate consideration, and to obtain thereon an early and equitable decision.

The undersigned trusts that the representations which he has already made on this subject, particularly in his note of the 3d of September, 1816, hitherto unanswered, render it now unnecessary for him to enter into a further discussion.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to his excellency the assurance of his highest consideration.

JONA. RUSSELL.

FLORENCE, February 22, 1819.

SIR: I have the the honor to transmit to you, enclosed, a note received at Berlin, from the Count d'Engestrom, in reply to that which I had addressed to him, on the 14th of October last, in relation to the Stralsund claims. This reply was not only unsatisfactory, but it was entirely at variance with the spirit of the verbal assurances which had been made to me. To have left it without a comment would, I believe, have given it a weight to which it was not entitled, and might have been construed into an admission, on my part, that the facts and arguments which it contained were incontrovertible and unanswerable. To prevent such a construction, and to fulfil your last instructions, which I had hitherto deferred communicating, in hopes that an equitable decision of the Swedish Government might have rendered my so doing unnecessary, I addressed to Count d'Engestrom, from Vienna, a note, of which you will also find a copy enclosed. I hope that the reasons here stated, and the peculiarity of my situation, may rescue the course which I have pursued from censure.

To avoid repetition, I referred the Swedish Minister generally to my note of the 6th of September, 1816. In that note he will find that he himself informed Mr. Speyer that the American merchandise was, on the 12th of August, 1811, at the sole disposition of the Swedish Government.

This is the first opportunity that I have had of communicating with the United States since I left Vienna, which, I trust, will satisfactorily account for my not having sooner transmitted to you the enclosed papers. I have the honor to be, &c.

JONA. RUSSELL.

Count d'Engestrom to Mr. Russell.

STOCKHOLM, October 27, 1818.

The undersigned, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, has laid before the King his august sovereign, the note which Mr. Russell, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, did him the honor to address to him, for the purpose of renewing his claim in behalf of certain citizens of the United States, of indemnity for losses sustained by them in Swedish Pomerania, by the confiscation of certain vessels and cargoes, their property.

The undersigned thinks it unnecessary to recapitulate the details of an affair, all the material circumstances of which are already known to Mr. Russell. It occurred at an unfortunate period, when a despotic sway, embracing all parts of the globe, exercised its disastrous influence alike on friends and foes; and when France, the ally of America, was equally regardless of her interest as those of other Powers.

It is an undisputed fact that the American vessels in question entered the ports of Pomerania whilst that province was still under the dominion of Sweden; but scarcely was the French Government informed of it, when it gave orders to its agent in Pomerania to demand the seizure and confiscation of these vessels to the benefit of France; alleging, in justification of this violent pretension, the system called continental, under which France then cloaked her projects of progressive encroachment, menacing all Europe, but which had, notwithstanding, been admitted by it, and was acceded to by all the European Powers at peace with the French Empire. The imposing force at that time kept up by France in those countries left no alternative to the Swedish Government, which was reluctantly compelled to acquiesce in her demands. The steps then taken by Sweden with the French Government, to obtain a transfer to her of the property thus confiscated, were prompted by a desire to restore it to the lawful owners; but they proved ineffectual, France having agreed to the transfer on certain conditions only, expressly stipulating that the proceeds of these cargoes should be immediately employed in placing Pomerania in a state of defence against the English naval force, which then threatened all the shores of the Baltic.

To this object, wholly foreign to the particular interests of Sweden, they were applied; and the Swedish Government was thereby disappointed in its hopes of procuring the restitution to the American citizens, the original owners of the ships and cargoes now under consideration. But, as an incontestable proof of its sincere desire to alleviate their losses as far as depended on it, an inquiry was instituted in concert with Mr. Eckie, agent for the claimants; and the proposals then made to him for the attainment of the object just alluded to, with his rejection of them, are well known to Mr. Russell.

Relations with Sweden—Indemnity.

It was cause of regret to the Swedish Government that the course suggested by it was not adopted, as it seemed to be the only one adapted to meet the views of Mr. Eckie. His Majesty feels assured, however, of the disposition of the United States to do justice to the desire manifested by His Majesty on this, as on every other occasion, of doing every thing possible to evince his high esteem for a Power with which it is his constant wish to maintain the most amicable relations.

In pursuance of these sentiments, the undersigned has received the King's commands to renew to Mr. Russell the assurance, which His Majesty has already given to him in person, of the satisfaction with which he would discover any practicable mode of alleviating the losses sustained by the American citizens alluded to, through the confiscation of their property in Pomerania in 1811. His Majesty has a particular satisfaction in recollecting that, about the same period, the Swedish Government restored to the citizens of the United States thirty-three vessels, with valuable cargoes, then under detention in Sweden, in consequence of a formal requisition of the mission of France at Stockholm. His Majesty availed himself, on that occasion, of the force under the control of his Government in Sweden; but he saw, with deep concern, the impossibility of taking corresponding measures in his Pomeranian territories, they being, besides, as well in virtue of their particular compacts with France, as by the presence of the French armies, completely under the influence of the continental system, to which Prussia, Denmark, and the other Governments on the shores of the Baltic, had declared their adherence.

The undersigned, in conformity to these orders of the King, his august sovereign, avails himself, with pleasure, of this occasion to renew to Mr. Russell the assurance of his high consideration.

COUNT D'ENGESTROM.

Mr. Russell to the Count d'Engestrom.

VIENNA, December 12, 1818.

The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note which his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, addressed to him at Berlin, under date of the 27th October last. His excellency will not be surprised to learn that the undersigned has been able to discover nothing in that note calculated to discharge the Swedish Government from its obligation of providing an adequate indemnity to the citizens of the United States for the confiscation of their merchandise, in 1811, at Stralsund, then under the dominion of Sweden.

The undersigned had confidently expected, from the conversations with which he had so recently been honored by His Majesty the King, and by his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, that, whatever objections might have been entertained to the justice of the American claims, they would, in this tardy communication, have been distinctly and definitely stated, and supported by documents of an authentic and unimpeachable character. His Majesty, at the very last interview which he accorded to the undersigned, and at which his excellency was present, expressly called the attention of his excellency to a particular note of the French Minister, which he intimated to be in point, and which he offered to furnish to his excellency, if not already in his department, for the avowed purpose of being communicated to the undersigned. But even that note has not been so communicated, nor does the despatch of his excellency contain the most remote allusion to it. From a silence so extraordinary, the undersigned is compelled to infer that the note of the French Minister was found, on examination, not to be of a nature to justify or to palliate the proceedings of the Swedish Government. It was not without extreme disappointment and regret, after having thus been encouraged to expect an explanation, at least precise, if not satisfactory, that he finds himself referred by his excellency, in a most vague and general manner, for a vindication of the conduct of that Government, exclusively to the coercive measures of France under the system commonly denominated continental, without the faintest intimation of any specific provision of that system which could apply to this case, or the slightest proof of its actual application. The undersigned feels not the smallest hesitation in declaring his entire conviction that there was no such provision and no such application. It is in vain that he has sought in the imperial decree promulgated at Berlin, Milan, Rambouillet, or elsewhere, on which that system was founded, for the discovery of such a provision; and it is not permitted him to presume that any Government, however subservient at the time to the views of the French monarch, could have gratuitously consented to extend the evils of those arbitrary mandates by a constructive application; and still less is it to be presumed that a pretext, from interested motives, could have been sought in that unrighteous system to mask the violence, or to sanction the injustice, which it did not most explicitly and imperiously impose. The demand which his excellency states to have been made by the agent of the French Government in Pomerania for the seizure and confiscation, under the continental system, of the American merchandise for the account of France, must have been too degrading and unjust to have obtained an unqualified compliance on the part of Sweden; and that it did not obtain such a compliance is incontrovertible, from the notorious fact that this merchandise, although seized by the Swedish authorities on the 10th of June, 1810, was not confiscated, but held in a state of sequestration only, until the French Minister at Stockholm, by his note of the 12th of July, 1811, announced the consent of his sovereign to the termination of that sequestration, on the sole condition that the colonial produce which it affected should not be introduced into France, or into the States of the Confederation of the Rhine. The extraordinary demand of the French agent in Pomerania, founded, as his excellency states, on the continental system, produced, therefore, a temporary sequester only, and furnished no pretext for the subsequent and final confiscation of the merchandise to which it applied, and no extenuation of its injustice. The undersigned is not disposed now to deny that a demand of this kind was made, as the note of the French Minister just mentioned implies the previous participation of France in the act of sequestration; yet, that demand having never been communicated to the American Government in the shape in which it was preferred, as courtesy, if not right, appeared to require, it may be permitted to entertain some doubt in respect to its precise import and extent, particularly as it was allowed to have but a partial and transitory effect. It necessarily follows, from the facts which the undersigned has now had the honor to present, that the continental system, or any demand of the French agent in Pomerania, whatever influence they might unduly have had in causing the original seizure, could have had none in producing the final sale of the merchandise, and the appropriation of its proceeds by the Government of Sweden.

The undersigned is far from being disposed to vindicate the continental system, or the acquiescence of any nation in its iniquitous requisitions; but his excellency appears to have formed an erroneous estimate of the extent of both. None of the nations whose dominions border on the Baltic ever committed, in relation to the United States, nor, it is believed, in relation to other friendly nations, any act similar to that for which the undersigned has been instructed to ask indemnity from Sweden. Of the conduct of Russia and Prussia during the continental system, the United States have no cause to complain; and if Denmark imposed a sequestration, towards the close of the year 1809, on American vessels and their cargoes in her ports, that sequestration continued for a few months only, and the American property subjected to it was restored, without exception, to the lawful owners. If the United States have now claims on Denmark, it is for the lawless depredations of her privateers, and the unjust decision of her tribunals, and not for the confiscation, without the form of a trial, of property acknowledged to be American, and fairly and regularly entered at her custom-houses. Of all the nations bordering on the Baltic, it was left for Sweden alone to receive duties, and summarily and peremptorily to confiscate the merchandise, without suggesting a doubt of its origin or ownership. Such are the facts; and they save the undersigned from the necessity of protesting against the doctrine that the violence or injustice of one Government can be drawn into precedent, and cited as authority to sanction the wrongs of another.

Waiving at this time all further consideration of the original act of sequestration at Stralsund in 1810, whatever might have been its source, or the injuries which it inflicted on the unoffending and confiding citizens of the United States, the undersigned cannot refrain from repeating distinctly to his excellency the facts on which the American Government founds its claims for indemnity for the ultimate sale and appropriation of the sequestered property by the Government of Sweden.

The note above mentioned of the Baron Alquier, the French Minister at Stockholm, of the 12th of July, 1811, left that property at the free disposal of the Swedish Government, on the sole condition already stated; and that Government, instead of availing itself of the liberty thus accorded to terminate the sequester, and to restore the property to the American owners, profited by the accidental possession acquired by the sequester to sell that property on its own account.

The Swedish Government, forgetting its previous assurances, and disregarding the incontrovertible rights of the citizens of the United States, and the friendly relations which had not ceased to subsist between the two countries, advertised that property for sale at Stralsund on the 2d day of August, 1811, actually sold it on the 14th day of the same month, and caused the proceeds thereof to be paid into the Swedish royal treasury in Pomerania. These facts, it is believed, will not be contested, for they are supported by documents of acknowledged authenticity. Between the 12th of July, 1811, the day on which this property was placed at the disposal of the Swedish Government, and the 2d day of the following month, on which it was advertised for sale, there elapsed twenty-one days only—a period barely sufficient for deciding on the royal order at Stockholm, and for its transmission to Stralsund, and for the preparation and publication of the advertisement. The undersigned is ignorant of the date of that order; but, from the consideration just suggested, it could not well have been issued at a later day than the 20th of the same month of July, and consequently not more than eight days after the note of the Baron Alquier had announced the complete liberation, on the part of France, of the sequestered property. Whatever might have been the extravagance and versatility of the predominant despotism of the time, it will not be presumed that the Government of the United States will volunteer a belief of a total change of policy in so brief a period; and that, instead of consenting to raise the sequester, as so formally and recently announced, it had been capriciously resolved to proceed to immediate confiscation. His excellency must be aware that the precise orders received from the French Government during that period should be produced, and communicated to the American Government, to obtain its faith in the existence of an inconsistency in its nature so incredible. But neither his excellency nor any other Swedish functionary, has attempted to show that any such orders were so received; and the undersigned will now dare to trouble his excellency with proof, not merely presumptive, that they were not. A declaration of the Swedish authorities in Pomerania renders it certain that they at least acted in complete ignorance of such orders, as well as of all French interference on the occasion, and in the full conviction that the Swedish Government at Stockholm had the exclusive control of the transaction. This declaration is contained in the reply of those authorities, on the 9th of August, 1811, to a memorial presented to them on the 6th of that month, by certain merchants of Stralsund, on behalf of themselves and of their

Relations with Sweden—Indemnity.

American constituents. This reply clearly manifests the opinion which the Swedish regency in Pomerania entertained of the justice of the object of the memorial, and of the competency of their sovereign to decide definitively in relation to it. It is likewise evident, from their engagement to place provisionally the proceeds of the merchandise claimed in the royal chamber, that they acted independently of all French interference, and that there was no agent of France in their vicinity whom they felt themselves obliged to consult or to obey in this proceeding.

The undersigned presents herewith to his excellency a copy of the translation, by a sworn interpreter, of this reply, as well as of the memorial itself, as they are both in perfect accordance with the statement of facts now submitted.

But the evidence which irresistibly carries with it conviction that the royal orders issued at Stockholm for the sale of the sequestered merchandise at Stralsund could not have been in consequence of any requisition of the French Government received subsequently to the note above mentioned of the Baron Alquier, of the 12th of July, 1811, is collected from another note from that Minister, addressed to His Royal Highness the Prince Royal, on the 13th of August of the same year. In this note, the Baron refers, with sufficient precision, to that which he had addressed to the Swedish Minister on the 12th of the preceding month, and clearly admits, by the manner in which he refers to it, that, since that time, he had neither received from his Government, nor communicated to that of Sweden, any instructions whatever on the subject of the merchandise which had been sequestered in Swedish Pomerania. The Royal order, therefore, which was despatched from Stockholm in sufficient season to cause the advertisement of that merchandise at Stralsund on the 2d day of August, must have been the free and spontaneous act of the Swedish Government, uninfluenced by any requisition of France.

The undersigned dares to present herein to his excellency copies of the two notes of the French Minister already mentioned, as it is possible, from the apparent unacquaintance of his excellency with their contents, that they may not readily be found in the archives of his Department.

There is one part of the note of the 12th of July on which it may still be proper to make a few observations. The duties which appeared to have been sequestered and claimed by France, as well as the merchandise, were here expressly allowed to be received for the account of the Swedish Government, while, in consenting to free the merchandise, there is no intimation of its ulterior appropriation. The duties undoubtedly belonged to Sweden, and merchandise, at least that part of it of which there is here a question, to citizens of the United States; and if the French Government had for a time claimed both, it was now obviously its intention to abandon both to their lawful owners respectively. Common sense and common usage can sanction no other construction; for the right of Sweden being expressly recognised to the duties only, necessarily implied a denial of her right to the merchandise, which was not so recognised. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. On raising the sequester, the parties concerned were to be reinstated in their respective rights; the Swedish Government, therefore, in its subsequent conduct relative to merchandise, appears to have acted not only without the coercion of the French Emperor, but in opposition to his intentions.

The note of the 12th of July is certainly at variance, both in its tone and object, with that of the 13th of August; but whether this variance is to be ascribed to the temper and error of the French Minister, or to a change in the sentiments and policy of his Government, it is not necessary for the undersigned to inquire; it is sufficient, for the justification of the views which he has now presented, that my note of the 12th of July was clear and explicit in its terms, and that it unequivocally placed the American merchandise at the sole and unrestricted disposal of Sweden. Nor does it belong to him to reconcile the new proofs of the constant friendship given by the French Monarch to that of Sweden in consenting, on the 12th of July, to raise the sequester on the colonial produce at Stralsund with the ungracious demand, made on the 13th of the following month, to cause that produce to be sold under the inspection of the French vice-consul, and the proceeds thereof to be deposited in the French vice-consular chest. The demand, made at Stockholm on the 13th of August, could not have had any influence on the sale of the merchandise which took place at Stralsund on the very next day; and it is certainly unnecessary to intimate the impossibility of imputing to that demand the previous order issued at Stockholm, or the advertisement published at Stralsund, in conformity to which that sale was effected; besides, the fact is notorious as already stated, that the French vice-consul was not allowed to interfere, and that the proceeds of the merchandise were paid, not into the French vice-consular chest, but into the Swedish royal chamber in Pomerania.

Were any proofs, in addition to that contained in the reply to the memorial above mentioned, necessary to establish the entire independence of the Swedish regency at Stralsund of all French authority, and that they acted solely on the orders of their own sovereign, this proof would be conclusively furnished by the note of the French Minister of the 13th of August, which expressly states that they refused to act in conjunction with the French vice-consul without first consulting their Government and asking its instructions. It is, therefore, evident that neither the presence of the French troops in Pomerania, nor the treaties of Sweden with France, had induced even the Swedish local authorities to the necessity of submitting to the undefined exactions of the continental system, or of obeying the commands of a French vice-consul. These authorities still had the spirit, surrounded as they might have been by troops and by treaties, to act in conformity to the orders of their own sovereign only; and it is inconceivable that His Majesty, aloof from all the danger, at Stockholm, could have been advised to pursue a less dignified and independent course. That he did not, indeed, pursue such a course, is apparent, not only from the facts already stated, but from the circumstance which his excellency has been pleased to communicate, that His Majesty, at that time, caused thirty-three American vessels, richly laden, to be delivered to their lawful owners in the ports of Sweden, in defiance of the formal requisition of the mission of France. This circumstance, instead of justifying or extenuating the sale of the American merchandise at Stralsund, as his excellency appears to believe, demonstrates that sale to have been unnecessary, either from a respect to existing treaties, or from a fear of offending the Government of France. It is difficult to perceive how his excellency could attempt to sanction an act of injustice and violence, which he affects to excuse from a deference existing, and from the necessity of yielding to foreign force, by a simultaneous act of justice, which he considers to be the more meritorious because it was performed in defiance of both.

As to the presence of French troops in Pomerania, it does not appear to have had any influence on the transaction. There was no military requisition made with respect to the American property at Stralsund; but all the demands of France, in relation to that property, as far as they are known to the undersigned, emanated from the civil department at Paris, and were communicated to the Swedish Government through diplomatic or consular functionaries only, unawed by any allusion to the possible intervention of an armed force.

With the actual employment of the proceeds of the confiscated American property, the Government of the United States considers itself as having no concern. It is the loss of that property by citizens of the United States, through an arbitrary act of Sweden, and not any advantage which Sweden did or did not derive from that act, which constitutes the ground of the present claim for compensation. To whatever object those proceeds were applied, the injury sustained by the American citizens remains the same. Still however, the American Government might be inclined to regard the violence with less painful feelings, had it been required for the promotion of some object essential to Sweden, and not gratuitously committed for an object, as his excellency asserts, entirely foreign to her particular interests.

If, contrary to all the evidence and argument which the undersigned has now presented, there should, as his excellency states, have been certain express conditions imposed by France, in raising the sequester, (or in making the transfer, as his excellency is pleased to call it,) requiring that the sums produced by the sale of the merchandise should be applied in placing Pomerania in a state of defence, his excellency will, it is presumed, feel the propriety of communicating these conditions to the American Government, in the terms in which they were originally expressed. Such a communication might, at least, have an effect in diminishing the impression which now exists, that the sale of merchandise was the spontaneous act of Sweden. But even these conditions, however formal and categorical they might have been, which are relied on as an apology for the proceedings of the Swedish Government, could not be allowed to discharge that Government from its obligations to provide an indemnity to the American citizens whom these proceedings injured. If Sweden had, in fact, only a choice of evils, and elected the less in order to avoid the greater, she was certainly bound, in consequence of this election, to repair the wrong she inflicted on others for her own safety or accommodation. No necessity can be admitted of a nature sufficiently imperious to exonerate her from this responsibility, excepting that which resulted from the actual exercise of a foreign force, which she could not resist, and which, in fact, wrested from her the possession and control of the property which had been placed under the safeguard of her power and good faith. The incontrovertible facts that the orders for the sale were issued at Stockholm, and that the Government of Sweden was at least the unresisting agent, if not the principal, in this transaction, forbid a belief in even the possibility of such a necessity. If, indeed, those orders were not entirely voluntary on the part of Sweden, they could only have been constrained by an attention to her own interests, and by the conviction of the expediency of making a partial and minor sacrifice for the preservation of an object of more general and vital importance; and her honor could never have permitted her to suppose that such a sacrifice for such an object could be made at the expense of others, and not at her own. It was her obvious duty to make an adequate compensation to those who had suffered by the sacrifice as soon as she possessed the means—and she has long possessed them.

Where his excellency obtained his information that France was the ally of America in 1810 and 1811, the unhappy epoch of the seizure and sale of the American merchandise at Stralsund, the undersigned is at a loss to conjecture. The United States never disguise or conceal their relations with foreign Powers; they have no secret treaties for the purpose of eluding a distrustful enemy, or of surprising a confiding friend. Their whole history is open to the world, and, had his excellency consulted it, he would have known that America never was the ally of imperial France. If the United States were, unfortunately, as his excellency intimates, either directly or indirectly, sometimes the victim of the disastrous influence of France, they never were, for a moment, the agents of her vexatious domination.

The undersigned has now had the honor to present to his excellency, concisely, a transaction, with the essential circumstances of which his excellency acknowledges him to be acquainted. It belongs to his excellency, should the statement of these circumstances be erroneous, to furnish the facts necessary for its correction. It is impossible for the Government of the United States, with all the information which it now possesses, to believe that such facts can be furnished; and, if they cannot, his excellency himself must admit that the plea of necessity, founded on French compulsion, for the sale of the American merchandise at Stralsund, is without even a plausible pretext to support it.

On the 12th of July, 1811, that merchandise was, by the consent of France, to terminate the sequester, placed at the exclusive disposition of Sweden, and an unqualified power thus given of restoring it to the rightful owners. This power remained unimpaired by any new demand of the French Government for more than a month—a period amply sufficient to have reinstated the citizens of the United States in the full possession of their property, and to have enabled them to rescue it from any future danger with which it might have been menaced by the arbitrary and capricious policy of France. To have merely neglected, for a single day, thus to have exercised that power, would, it is believed, have justly made the Government of Sweden responsible for all the consequences; but not merely to have neglected, during more than an entire month, to restore the property, but to have employed that period and abused that power exclusively for the conversion of that property to its own use, exhibits a course of conduct on the part of that Government for which the mere pecuniary indemnity now demanded would appear to afford but an inadequate satisfaction.

The undersigned has confined himself in this note principally to those topics which it appeared to him proper to discuss, in reply to the communication of his excellency of the 27th of October. He takes the liberty, however, in order to avoid repetition, to refer his excellency to the note of the undersigned, of the 6th of September, 1816, which has hitherto remained without an answer, and of which his excellency, in his communication just mentioned, has not taken the slightest notice.

The undersigned has felt it to be his duty to state to his excellency the views of the Government of the United States on this subject, with perspicuity and frankness, and unrestrained by any repugnance to differ, in fact or inference, from his excellency; and this course he has pursued with less hesitation, as he confidently believed that it would not be ascribed to a want of becoming decorum, but to a regard to truth, and especially to the frequent declarations of his excellency that this transaction was not originally of his cognizance, and that he was therefore unacquainted with its details.

It is indeed to be regretted that the propositions made by the Swedish Government to the special agent of the claimants had not been of so satisfactory a nature as to have rendered this correspondence unnecessary. The undersigned has been encouraged to hope, from the conversations which he had lately had the honor to hold with His Majesty, that the note of his excellency would have contained some specific offer, dictated either by a regard to justice, or by some other honorable and friendly feeling, which should have put this subject of altercation at rest. The Government of the United States would still regard with complacency any arrangement with the claimants which should prevent the necessity of all further official discussion, and leave the harmony between the two nations without the smallest circumstance to disturb it. But his excellency must be aware that, should the Government of the United States, in the absence of such an arrangement, and in the full contemplation of the real state of the question, as here presented, desist from its demand for indemnity, it would fail in its duty to those who have a right to its protection. The undersigned has been, therefore, specially instructed to urge this demand, and, "while reminding the Swedish Government of its unquestioned justice, and of its amount, so insignificant to the interest of Sweden, yet so distressing to the sufferers, to give notice that, in forbearing to press it in a more peremptory manner, it is by no means the intention of the Government of the United States to abandon it."

The undersigned has prevailed on himself to reply from Vienna to a note which his excellency addressed to him at Berlin; but, as this course is justified on the present occasion by peculiar considerations only, it will not be hereafter pursued. His excellency is therefore requested to address his future communications for the Government of the United States to Christopher Hughes, Esquire, who is charged with the affairs of its legation at Stockholm, during the absence of the Minister.

The undersigned has the honor to repeat to his excellency the assurance of his highest consideration.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Copy of a memorial of the merchants of Stralsund to the Swedish Royal Regency.

The humble memorial of sundry within-named merchants of Stralsund, for themselves and their constituents, concerning the restoration of the colonial merchandises which were under sequestration, and the stopping the public sale thereof.

Informed, partly by public report, but especially by the publication of your excellency and the honorable Royal Regency, of the 2d of August, current year, that the colonial merchandises which are lying in the royal warehouses under sequestration are to be publicly sold, we find ourselves obliged most humbly to lay before your excellency and the honorable Royal Regency our reasons why we hope that you will be pleased, with respect to the colonial merchandises belonging to us and our constituents, which have been hitherto under sequestration, to let an exception take place from your measure announced in the newspapers.

Nothing agrees better with the principles of a sound political economy than liberty and security of commerce. Justice requires, unconditionally, that nobody shall be punished for an action which was hitherto permitted, and the prohibition thereof has never been published. Confiding in these principles, we and our commercial friends have ordered hither a quantity of colonial merchandises, which, after their arrival, were put under sequestration. Hard as this measure in itself already is, we could quietly look at it, as the same was only provisional, and we fully confided in the justice of our cause; but, as it now seems the actual confiscation of the merchandises and the sale thereof are intended, then our and our constituents' interests will be too much injured that we should be able to remain quiet at that too.

All these merchandises have arrived here either from Sweden, under the authorization of the Swedish public authorities, or direct from North America, a State friendly connected with Sweden.

All the papers which concern them, as well as the ships which brought them hither, have been examined by the royal licent here, and have been found blameless; and your excellency, and the honorable Royal Regency yourselves, have granted the permission to enter and unload. Every thing herein has been done on our part publicly and legally. No prohibition opposed us herein; for the better security, we procured yet the special permission of the highest authority of the country, and we have paid, even already, part of the duties on these merchandises; and should now these merchandises nevertheless be confiscated and publicly sold for the benefit of the fiscus?

If we were yet in the hands of an enemy, such a measure would certainly not appear so very extraordinary to us, for an enemy only observes his own interest, and not that of the conquered country; but, in a state of peace, when the force of armies gives place to the power of the laws again, we cannot make ourselves familiar with the idea that the State itself should proceed in this manner against its own subjects, and against friends, who, under the protection of the laws, and in confidence upon the legality and publicity of their actions, thought themselves secure.

The Swedish Government, whose steps are always guided by mildness and justice, will certainly, when the matter is once put in a proper light, remain faithful to their mode of proceeding hitherto observed; and the just sentiments of your excellency and of the honorable Royal Regency are known to us by too many instances that we should not hope, with full confidence, that you will make use of all means to avert a measure so detrimental to us and our constituents; and we therefore venture, with the fullest confidence of a happy result, to pray your excellency and the honorable Royal Regency must humbly and most earnestly not to suffer the sale of the colonial merchandises belonging to us and our constituents, which have been hitherto under sequestration, to take place, but put the same to our own free disposition; or, at least, by your gracious interposition with the higher instance, to procure the same.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURES.

[Communicated to the House, December 20, 1819.]
To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of a convention of the friends of national industry, assembled in the city of New York, to take into consideration the prostrate situation of our manufactures, and to petition Congress for their relief and protection, composed of delegates from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Ohio, respectfully sheweth:

That your memorialists appeal to your honorable body, under a firm and a solemn conviction that a crisis has arrived, in the progress of our nation, which imperiously demands the serious attention and prompt exertion of the collected wisdom of its councils, and on which its future destinies must essentially depend.

That the United States, possessing every advantage of soil, climate, and native productions, and with a population industrious, intelligent, and enterprising, to a degree never probably exceeded by any nation; and after enjoying for twenty years the benefit of an over-proportion of the trade of the world,—find themselves in a state of great embarrassment and difficulty, involving almost every description of our citizens. Our commerce is greatly prostrated; our shipping has sunk in value to one-half of its original cost; real estate is depreciated, in most parts of the country, in an equal degree; numbers of our merchants, manufacturers, and farmers, are reduced to bankruptcy, and the circumstances of many of those who have escaped this calamitous situation are daily impairing; a great portion of our mechanics and artists are unemployed; and all the fruits of their labors, which might have been daily adding to the prosperity of the nation, are wholly lost. In fine, our great staples are so far reduced in price as most seriously to affect the interests of the agriculturists, and to diminish the means of paying for our importations.

That we are deeply indebted to foreign nations, notwithstanding we have transmitted to them as much of our surplus productions as they furnished a market for, and likewise a large amount of our Government and bank stock, which subjects us to an oppressive annual tax for interest, probably equal to the amount of the civil expenses of our Government, which adds to the impoverishing drain of our specie.

That, while so many of our manufacturers are thus ruined; our working people destitute of employment, and of the means to support their families; our manufacturing establishments falling to ruins; and our water powers, with which we are pre-eminently blessed, unemployed,—our cities and towns are filled with the manufactured productions of other nations, by which we have been and are ruinously drained of our wealth.

That those complicated evils which oppress us, and which have taken place during a season of profound peace of nearly five years' duration, after a war closed with honor, and which left us in a state of high prosperity, evince that there is something unsound in our policy, which requires a radical remedy, in the power of the National Legislature alone to apply.

That wisdom dictates to the United States to profit by the experience of other nations; to shun those systems which have operated on them perniciously; and scrupulously to adopt those that have advanced their wealth, power, and resources. Being the youngest nation in the world, they cannot, without a sacrifice of their happiness, pursue the paths that have led some to decay and ruin; nor deviate from those that have exalted others to a high degree of prosperity. We therefore respectfully submit to your serious consideration a slight sketch of the policy of some of the nations of Europe, with its consequences.

At the close of the seventeenth century, Portugal possessed a most flourishing and extensive woollen manufactory, raised to maturity by prohibitions of all rival articles from other nations. The basis of this manufactory was her own raw material, and that of Spain. It employed a large proportion of her population advantageously, and greatly enriched the nation. She was induced to remove the prohibition, and trusted to a protecting duty of 23 per cent. In three or four years the manufactory was destroyed; the manufacturers ruined; the workmen devoted to idleness and beggary; the raw material sold at low rates to foreigners, who employed their workmen on it, and returned it at an advance of 300 to 400 per cent; whereby she was drained of her wealth, as we have been by similar means. In a word, gradually impoverished and ruined, she holds out a most impressive lesson to the statesmen of all other nations.

The example of Spain is equally striking. She has, for centuries, with those boundless treasures which are lavished on her in vain, nourished the industry of other nations, and often, with those treasures, squandered for their manufactures, fed the armies that have covered her fields with desolation, and shed disgrace on her arms.

The mass of her subjects, unprotected in their industry, are in a state of abject distress and misery; although, under a wise Government, some centuries since, Spain was the most manufacturing and prosperous nation in the world. And even at the present time, two or three of her provinces, under a different régime from the rest of the nation, where industry is protected, are as prosperous and industrious as any part of Europe.

Russia and Austria protect the industry of their subjects, and, in consequence, enjoy a high degree of prosperity and happiness. The former nation prohibits about two hundred articles specifically, among which are all the important manufactures of her allies, France and England. Austria, throughout the wide extent of her dominions, prohibits all cotton, woollen, silk, and other manufactures.

England has protected the industry of her subjects with more care, and has accordingly amassed more wealth, and attained a higher degree of power and influence than any other nation of ancient or modern times, in proportion to her population. The use she has made of her wealth, whatever it may have been, is no impeachment of the merit of the system by which it has been acquired. The case of France, however, is more striking and impressive than that of any other nation. For twenty years she waged wars, bloody and destructive almost beyond example, with two-thirds of Europe, and had in pay, during a large part of that time, armies of nearly a million of men. After those wars were concluded, she was crushed by foreign armies of two or three hundred thousand men, and had enormous contributions and exactions levied on her, to the amount of probably one hundred millions of dollars. Yet she has, in a few years, recovered from all these calamities, by protecting the industry of her subjects, and enjoys at present a greater degree of prosperity, it is stated, on the highest authority, than she has done at any former period.

The late war with Great Britain, and the events which immediately preceded it, produced in many of our reflecting fellow-citizens a due sense of their best and most lasting interests.

With a rapidly unexampled in the history of any other people, a large portion of their capital was transferred from commercial to manufacturing pursuits. The value of goods manufactured in the United States, as taken from the marshals' returns, amounted, as early as 1810, to upwards of one hundred and seventy-two millions of dollars, which value was very greatly increased during the late war.

Protection to American Manufactures.

The peace of Europe was attended with ruinous consequences to us: our infant manufactures were blighted in the bud; the spirit of speculation spread through our country, seducing her votaries from the paths of quiet and laborious industry, by promises of sudden wealth. But it was soon found that the commerce of 1815 and 1816 was not the commerce of 1806 and 1807: the nations by whose calamities we had flourished, whose impoverishment had been our gain, were now at peace with each other, and returning with eager activity to the employments of social life; our vessels were no longer wanted to convey their products, nor to supply them with ours. Cherishing and depending on their own resources, they have furnished us a useful and honorable lesson in the encouragement, support, and extension of domestic, and salutary restrictions on the importation of foreign, manufactures. An imitation of their policy, in this respect, your memorialists believe to be indispensable to the prosperity and independence of our country.

With this belief, and a confident reliance in the disposition of Congress to promote these primary objects by every necessary means, your memorialists would respectfully recommend to your consideration three measures, the adoption of which, we feel persuaded, would remove the embarrassments of our country, and restore life and vigor to our almost expiring manufactures.

These measures are—

First. To abolish credits on import duties.

Secondly. To impose a restrictive duty on sales at auction.

Thirdly. To alter and increase the amount of duties on imported goods.

At the time when credits on duties were first established, the state of our country was very different from what it has since become. Slowly recovering from a long and desolating war, almost destitute of money and commercial connexions, our situation required that every aid and encouragement should be afforded to the first efforts of enterprise. This measure was, therefore, wise and salutary, and dictated by the necessities of the times. The weakness of our internal resources produced a dependence on imposts for the support of Government.

But how striking a contrast have we since presented! How great the change! From a population of three, to ten millions; from an annihilated commerce, to one that spreads its canvass on every sea; from a state of agriculture very little exceeding our own daily wants, to a surplus production exceeding eighty millions per annum; from an almost total want of manufactures, to an actual invested manufacturing capital of cotton and woolen goods alone exceeding fifty millions of dollars! Our commerce was at first carried on by resident merchants, whose prudence and experience restrained importations within due bounds; credits on the duties afforded them, according to the intention of Congress, facilities which their situation required. But, for some years past, and especially since the universal peace in Europe and the conclusion of the late war, those regular traders have found themselves supplanted by foreign merchants and manufacturers, or desperate speculators, whom the credit on duties has enabled and induced to inundate our markets with foreign goods, producing the most pernicious effects on our mercantile stability and the prosperity of our manufactories.

It may also be here remarked that the operation of this credit on imposts is to create a capital for new importations; for, let us suppose that four importations, to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars each, be made in one year, at the average of twenty-five per cent. duty, the sum of about one hundred thousand dollars is left to trade with in the hands of the importer, with the ultimate risk to Government of the loss of the whole.

The American merchant is regulated and directed in his importations by his experience of the want and consumption of the country, and the prospect of fair and reasonable profits. The foreign merchant or manufacturer, on the other hand, is often impelled by his necessities to seek a market for his goods without regard to these considerations. It is well known, and we presume cannot have escaped the knowledge of Congress, that, at all times, under all circumstances, and at every hazard of expense, the Government, merchants, and manufacturers of Great Britain have their views steadily directed to the extirpation of every germ of manufactures among us. A credit of eight, ten, and twelve months increases their facilities for carrying into execution their hostile purposes.

These consequences, injurious as they are, are exceeded in extent by those which arise from the trade to China and the East Indies; a trade, in the opinion of your memorialists, (encouraged and unrestricted as it is at present,) of the most exhausting and pernicious effects to the country. The long credit of from one to two years allowed by law on duties in this trade, we are sincerely persuaded produces the ruinous effect of draining us of our specie; and, in the case of the greater part of East India goods, overwhelming our markets with inferior and worthless fabrics, which, from their apparent cheapness, meet a ready sale, while the much superior products of our own industry and skill must be sacrificed at a ruinous loss, or remain unsold in the hands of the manufacturer.

When to the foregoing considerations, important as they are to the regular merchant and to the infant manufactures of our country, is added that of the losses to which Government is necessarily subjected by failure in the payment of the duties, your memorialists humbly apprehend that the abolition of all credits for duties on imported goods will, at the same time, protect the manufactures, commerce, and the revenue of the United States.

Your memorialists would next call the attention of Congress to the second evil complained of—unrestrained sales at auction.

Sales at auction, we believe, were originally authorized by law for special purposes, such as the disposal of damaged goods, the effects of bankrupts, or property under execution, or sold by the direction of courts of law and equity. We believe it will be found, on examination, that such sales were not, until within a few years past, considered by any commercial country in Europe as forming a part of the regular course of trade, but rather as authorized for purposes necessary, indeed, but not at all commercial.

In the greatest commercial and manufacturing nation (Great Britain) they are, even at this day, extremely limited; sometimes used to feel the pulse of the market on the raw materials imported for their manufactures, and occasionally used for the sale of colonial produce and the effects of the East India Company. In no other country have they assumed the same importance as among us. In the extent to which they have now arrived here, they are greatly injurious, not only to the fair and regular trader, but to the community at large.

Large quantities of silk, woollen, cotton, and other goods, are manufactured in Europe and the East Indies expressly for sale at auction in the United States. These goods are of less than the usual length, deficient in breadth, or of flimsy texture—in short, in every respect inferior to the goods they are intended to represent; yet so well dressed, and in other respects so highly finished to the eye, that they generally escape detection until they reach the consumer, who too late discovers their inferiority. For such base fabrics have the people of these States, for years past, been exorbitantly taxed, to the great injury of our own hard-struggling manufacturers.

To give an example of the enormous extent of this business, which affords such facilities to the foreign manufacturer for practising imposition on our citizens, we will instance the amount of sales of foreign goods at auction, in the single city of New York, in one year.

From the best evidence the case affords, (that is, the returns of the auctioneers themselves,) they amounted, in the year 1818, to the prodigious sum of fourteen millions of dollars. Judging from this specimen, it will not be unreasonable to conclude that, in the United States collectively, foreign merchandise to the amount of at least thirty millions of dollars is annually sold in this pernicious mode; a most alarming proof that a very serious portion of the trade of the nation flows in this channel. And your memorialists are satisfied, from past experience, that the sales at auction of domestic goods are as deleterious in their consequences as those of foreign merchandise; inasmuch as they tend to encourage the manufacture of inferior fabrics, and thereby injure the reputation of American fabrics generally; and, also, that the sales of imitations, made in foreign countries with an intent to dispose of them at auction, produce the same injurious effects. Your memorialists are fully convinced of the necessity of imposing some restraint on this tremendous engine of commercial monopoly. For this purpose, they respectfully propose that a duty of ten per cent. be imposed on all foreign and domestic goods sold at auction, except household furniture, farming stock, and utensils, the effects of bankrupts, or goods sold under execution, or otherwise, by direction of courts of law or equity. This, they hope, will in a great degree diminish, if not altogether cure, this great and growing evil, by destroying, or at least greatly lessening the temptation of profit.

Your memorialists, lastly, submit to the consideration of Congress the necessity of a further modification and increase of the present duties, and respectfully suggest the following alterations in the existing tariff:

That, in lieu of the present duties, a duty of ten cents per square yard be laid on all cotton and linen goods, plain or unstained, having less than seventy threads to the square inch, including warp and filling; fourteen cents per square yard on all having above seventy and under one hundred threads to the square inch, including warp and filling; of eighteen cents per square yard on all having above one hundred and less than one hundred and thirty threads to the square inch, including warp and filling; and so on in the same ratio upwards; and that twenty per cent. be allowed to the above duties on all printed, stained, dyed, colored, or worked cotton and linen goods.

That a duty of thirty-five per cent. ad valorem, be laid on all goods made wholly or in part of wool.

That the duty on every kind of silk goods, or of goods made wholly or in part of silk, (sewing silk excepted,) be raised to fifty per cent.

That all kinds of fabrics, not otherwise enumerated, and of less value than fifty cents per square yard, made wholly or in part of silk, cotton, wool, hemp, flax, or any other material, be estimated, and pay the same duty as if of the value of fifty cents.

That an extra duty be collected on all wares and merchandises, on which a bounty has been allowed by any foreign nation, equal in amount to the value of said bounty.

That foreign cotton, and every description of goods made wholly or in part of foreign cotton, be prohibited.

That a duty be laid on iron, in bars or bolts, manufactured without rolling, of one dollar and twenty-five cents per cwt.; on iron, in bars and bolts, when manufactured by rolling, two dollars per cwt.; on iron, in sheets, rods, or hoops, four dollars per cwt.; on iron, in pigs, seventy-five cents per cwt.; and on iron castings, two dollars per cwt.

Declining to enter into a detail of the alterations in the tariff, requisite for the protection of other branches now languishing, we beg leave to recommend to your particular attention, among others, the following:

Glass, copperas, corks, soap, paints, and colors, paper, gunpowder, jewelry, cutlery, plated ware of all kinds, coach and harness furniture, prunella shoes, hats, caps, bonnets, buttons, fire and side arms, china and earthenware, printed books, oil of vitriol, blue vitriol, and chemical preparations generally, gilt and japanned wares, paper hangings of every description, painted or oil cloths, umbrellas, manufactures of copper and brass, springs, screws, cotton stockings, and steel.

Independent of every consideration in favor of the policy of affording adequate protection to domestic industry, as herein recommended, deducible from its promotion of the general welfare of the country, and the protection due to the manufacturers, in common with all other classes of society, as a return for their allegiance to the Government, we are convinced that the farmers and planters would largely participate in the benefits of the system we advocate. The planter would have a steady market for his raw material, not subject to those destructive fluctuations which have produced such extensive ruin within the present year; and the farmer would have an equally steady and increasing demand for the productions of his farm, many of which, particularly in the interior of the country, and in the Western States, will not bear the expense of transportation to market. This advantage is so palpable, that we shall only refer, in illustration of it, to various towns and villages throughout the United States, in the neighborhood of which lands and their productions rose one or two hundred per cent. in value, in consequence of the extensive establishment of manufactures, and, by their decay, have fallen below their original value.

In support of our recommendations, we submit to your consideration a comparative view of the American and British tariff in a few articles:

	Am. tariff.	Br. tariff.
	Per cent.	Ad valorem.
Manufactures of brass -	20	59½
“ cotton -	25	85½
“ copper -	25	59½
“ glass - 20 and 30		114
“ linen -	15	142½
“ silk -	15	prohibited.

Hats, caps, and bonnets -	30	85½
Woollen hats -	30	150
Stockings, cotton, and woollen	20	85½
Watches, &c. -	7½	59½
Goods, wares, and merchandise, not enumerated -	15	59½
Oil of vitriol -	7½	100
Ale, beer, and porter, per gallon, cents -	10	41½

Your memorialists will only add, that they rely with full confidence on your patriotism and wisdom for the adoption of such measures as will promote the best interests of our common country.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURES.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 27, 1819.]
To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the American Society of the city of New York for the encouragement of domestic manufactures, respectfully represents: That your memorialists conceive it to be a prevalent opinion among all those who are concerned for the present and future welfare of the nation, that some legislative measures are imperiously necessary to check the evils which have so deeply afflicted every part of the country, devastated its commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests, and laid waste the pecuniary affairs of the people.

That, notwithstanding the degree of embarrassment, depression, and distress, which is so universally felt, and the gloominess of the present prospects of every form of honest industry and enterprise, your memorialists are persuaded that such measures may be adopted by your honorable body as will afford a material and permanent relief.

Your memorialists apprehend that there is as little difference of opinion in respect to the causes which have, for many years, been operating to produce the present crisis, as in respect to the nature of the evils, the existence of which they deplore; and that the time has come when those differences of sentiment which once prevailed between those concerned respectively in the affairs of commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, are lost in the apprehension of ruin to them all.

It is felt by every one to be beyond the power of legislation, to restore that part of our commerce which was destroyed by the pacification of Europe, or to create foreign markets for that surplus produce of our soil, of which a superabundance is furnished by every other country. But every eye is turned to the supreme council of the nation as competent to restrain the excessive influx of foreign products, by which we have been made so dependent upon transatlantic markets; have incurred an enormous balance of trade against us; have been drained of our specie, deranged in our finances, exhausted, and brought to the near prospect of general impoverishment.

The deplorable effects of this excessive importation of foreign merchandise are so palpable and so deeply felt, that your memorialists forbear to dwell upon them, and proceed to ask the attention of your honorable body to those methods of restraint which they deem most eligible, and which they believe will countervail the principal incentives and temptations to the evil so much complained of. And they are persuaded that the credit allowed upon bonds at the custom-house, by facilitating the operations, and affording capital to speculators and alien traders and manufacturers, to the injury and ruin of the regular American merchant; and the practice of sales at auction, by enabling such speculators, traders, and manufacturers, not only to force their goods upon the market immediately after their arrival in the country, but to vend goods manufactured for that purpose, and of such inferior quality that no regular private sale of them could be effected, are two of the principal causes of the excessive influx of foreign manufactures. Nor is there reason to hope that the evils, of which these causes are so prolific, will cure themselves. The state of Europe being such as to occasion a vast surplus of manufactures, it is inevitable that greater loss must accrue upon that surplus if detained at home, than is hazarded by the exportation of it to our markets. It can be sent hither upon foreign account, with the following advantages :

1st. With the certainty of an immediate sale by auction, upon condition of immediate remittances; whereas sale at home would have been impracticable, and the want of the proceeds would probably have been ruinous.

2d. The benefit of the credit upon the duties, realized in the form of interest, or of active capital.

3d. The very trifling expenses incurred by the transaction of business in this manner, compared with those which are unavoidable to a regular mercantile establishment.

4th. The animating prospect of utterly annihilating all attempts at manufacturing in this country.

These circumstances, even should every regular American importer abandon his business, are sufficient to cause the country, for years to come, to be inundated and overwhelmed with the products of foreign industry.

In confirmation of this statement, your memorialists beg leave to add, that, in the year 1818, goods to the amount of fourteen millions of dollars were sold by public auction in this city; and they believe that the whole amount of such sales in the United States was not less than thirty millions of dollars; and that the amount due to the Government upon bonds, which was held by importers as capital for their ruinous operations, was not, and is not at this moment, less than twenty millions of dollars. But for this credit upon duties, and the facility of these sales by auction, it can scarcely be doubted but that importations would be restricted within reasonable bounds, and would be governed by the fair demands of regular business. The evils flowing from these two causes are common to the trade with Europe, and that with India and China. A vast amount of the surplus products of the two latter countries is annually shipped by natives and others, and sold by public auction in our markets, and the proceeds returned in our precious metals. The incitements to this trade, so confessedly ruinous to this country, are precisely the same as those which operate upon the trade with Europe. The existence of a vast surplus of manufactures, the bounty given on importations by the credit upon imports here, the certainty of immediate sales and returns, are temptations which it is vain to hope will be resisted or diminished, until the Legislature shall interpose its authority.

And your memorialists are convinced that any measures which should go to remove these causes of evil would not only preserve the nation from further and more hopeless embarrassment, but would afford material relief to the commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests of the country; nor can they imagine any alleviation of the present distress, which shall not extend to these several branches of industry and enterprise. They therefore respectfully pray your honorable body—

1st. To abolish credits on the duties accruing on imports.

2d. To impose a duty of ten per cent. upon all foreign and domestic goods sold by auction, with the exception of farming stock and utensils, goods sold under execution or otherwise, by direction of courts of law or equity.

And in consideration of the great importance of protecting the cultivation of cotton, the principal staple of the country, by securing to it a preference in foreign markets, and shielding it from the ruinous fluctuations incident to a competition with the overwhelming quantities and inferior qualities of India and other parts of the world; as also in consideration of the great importance of affording security and permanency to the interests of the manufactories of cotton, and especially of the coarser fabrics, already established in this country, your memorialists further pray that Congress would restrict the importation of cotton goods to such, and such only, as have been manufactured wholly from the raw material grown in the United States, and to increase the duties on all cottons of foreign growth.

Your memorialists forbear to enter into any detail, or to advance any further arguments in support of what they deem to be the only sound policy of the Government of the United States; but they respectfully beg reference to two important documents emanating from the Government on this subject, viz :

1st. The report of Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, of January, 1790.

2d. The report of the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, of the 13th of January and the 6th of March, 1816; which they trust will place this subject in its proper point of view.

And your memorialists further respectfully pray that such alterations, amendments, and increase of the tariff, may be made, as Congress in their wisdom may judge best calculated to encourage the industry of the people, and secure to the nation the advantages of their enterprise and labor.

REMONSTRANCE AGAINST AN INCREASE OF DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

[Communicated to the House, January 3, 1820.]
To the Congress of the United States :

The remonstrance of the Virginia Agricultural Society of Fredericksburg against the attempts now making, by our domestic manufacturers and their friends, to increase the duties upon foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, respectfully represents :

That it is the indisputable right of every free people to petition and remonstrate, either individually or collectively, not only against grievances actually inflicted, but against such also as are either seriously threatened or meditated.

That hostility, resulting from true republican principles, to partial taxation, exclusive privileges, and monopolies created by law, was the primary cause of our glorious and ever memorable Revolution.

That, although most of us are only the descendants of those patriots who achieved that Revolution, by the lavish expenditure of their treasure and their blood, yet that we inherit enough of their spirit to feel equal aversion to similar oppressions; at the same time, we confidently trust that neither we, nor our sons after us, will ever be found backward or reluctant in offering up at the shrine of national good and national happiness any sacrifices, however great, which their promotion and preservation may obviously and necessarily require. But we have been taught to believe that a parental Government—a Government founded upon the immutable and sacred principles of truth, justice, and liberty—if she required sacrifices at all from those whom she is so solemnly bound to protect, would make them such as should operate equally upon every member of the community.

That we view with great concern, both nationally and individually, certain late attempts, on the part of various descriptions of domestic manufacturers, to induce your honorable body to increase the duties upon imports, already so high as to amount, upon many articles, nearly to a prohibition. The increased cost upon some of these may truly be designated a tax upon knowledge, if not a bounty to ignorance; such, for example, as the duty upon books in foreign languages, and upon philosophical, mathematical, surgical, and chemical instruments.

That, although, these attempts are sustained under the plausible pretext of “promoting national industry,” they are calculated (we will not say in design, but certainly in effect) to produce a tax highly impolitic in its nature, partial in its operation, and oppressive in its effect; a tax, in fact, to be levied principally on the great body of agriculturists, who constitute a large majority of the whole American people, and who are the chief consumers of all foreign imports.

That such a tax would be a flagrant violation of the soundest and most important principles of political economy, amongst which we deem the following to be incontrovertibly true; that, as the interests of dealers and consumers necessarily conflict with each other, the first always aiming to narrow, whilst the latter, who form the majority of every nation, as constantly endeavor to enlarge competition; by which enlargement alone extravagant prices and exorbitant profits are prevented, it is the duty of every wise and just Government to secure the consumers against both exorbitant profits and extravagant prices, by leaving competition as free and open as possible.

That in this way alone can the benefits of good government be equalized among the various orders and classes of society, the prosperity and happiness of which depend not upon immunities, privileges, and monopolies granted to one class or order at the expense of another, but upon the unfettered exercise of talent, skill, and industry, directed and employed in whatever manner, and upon whatsoever objects of pursuit, each individual may select for himself; provided, always, that such objects be not incompatible with the public good; for so to use your own rights as not to injure the rights of others, is not less the dictate of common sense and common honesty than it is a cardinal maxim of all legitimate government.

That national industry is best promoted by leaving every member of society free to apply his labor and his knowledge according to his own choice, exempt from all restraints but such as the public good requires, and burdened with no tax but such as shall be both impartial, and as moderate as the exigencies of the State will permit.

That, according to the natural progress of society in every country favorably situated for agriculture, the class of manufacturers is the last to spring up; but that it will necessarily do so, as soon as either the natural or artificial wants of the people create a demand for their labors.

That any legislative interference to force either this or any other class into existence by the strong arm of power, exercised in levying taxes to support the forced class, contrary to the wishes and interests of the other members of the community, is not only bad policy, but oppression; because taxes of any kind, to be rightfully levied, should be equal, and should be imposed, not for the emolument of any one portion of society at the expense of the rest, but for the support of Government alone.

That either to exclude foreign manufactures, or to tax them very heavily, under a notion of improving those of domestic fabric, lessens the profits of agriculture; diminishes the public revenue, either by augmenting the number of smugglers, or by enabling the domestic manufacturer to pocket that sum which otherwise would go into the public treasury, under the form of an import duty; and at the same time secures to him the power of practising upon the community the double imposition of deteriorating his goods, and selling them at a higher price; because that competition which constitutes the only security for skill, industry, and moderate prices, is either entirely removed, or so limited as not to be felt.

“That all free trade, of whatever description, must be a mutual benefit to the parties engaged in it,” notwithstanding the profits arising therefrom may be somewhat unequally divided; because by free trade alone can supply and demand (the two circumstances upon which trade of every kind depends,) be kept nearly equal to each other.

“That, instead of struggling against the dictates of reason and nature, and madly attempting to produce every thing at home, countries should study to direct their labors to those departments of industry for which their situation and circumstances are best adapted.”

“That the use of capital should be left, as much as possible, to the care of those to whom it belongs; because they will be most likely to discover in what line it can be employed to the greatest advantage.”

And that the best regulated and happiest communities are those wherein all the various trades, professions, and callings, enjoy equal rights, and contribute equally to the necessary support of their common Government; but that if any one should be thought to have superior claims to the fostering care of the National Legislature, it should be "the tillers of the earth—the fountain-head of all wealth, of all power, and of all prosperity."

The sagacious and patriotic Franklin has said (and we believe he never uttered a better or wiser remark) "that most of the statutes or acts, edicts, arrets, and placards, of parliaments, princes, and States, for regulating, directing, or restraining trade, have, we think, been either political blunders, or jobs obtained by artful men for private advantage, under pretence of public good."

Your petitioners have thus freely, but respectfully, endeavored to represent to your honorable body their views of a policy which you are so importunately urged to adopt, but upon which we should have said nothing, having due confidence both in your willingness and ability to protect the great landed interests of our country, had we not been apprehensive that silence might possibly be construed into consent, if all who are attached to those interests had forbore to speak, when so clamorously and powerfully assailed. To guard against the possibility of misapprehension, we take this occasion to say, that we are incapable of feeling any thing like enmity towards either manufacturers or any other useful description of our fellow-citizens, but heartily wish them all the success to which their skill and industry may entitle them, in whatsoever way applied; provided, always, that such application be not made at our risk, and continued at our cost. We will go further, and pledge ourselves to prefer whatever they may manufacture, at any time that they will make the price and the quality the same with the quality and price of similar articles of foreign fabric. To give more for any article simply because it is made at home may suit the feelings of political enthusiasm, but it can never promote the interests either of individuals or of nations. To buy as cheap as you can, no matter where, and to sell as dear, is the maxim which should regulate the commerce of both; for if competition be left free, neither can be exorbitant in their demands. We ask no tax upon manufacturers for our benefit; neither do we desire any thing of Government to enable us to cultivate the soil as profitably as we could wish, but to leave us free, so far as it depends on them, to carry our products to the best market we can find, and to purchase what we want in return, on the best terms we can, either at home or abroad. We will ever support the Government of our choice in all just and rightful undertakings, both with our fortunes and our lives; but we will never voluntarily contribute to maintain either manufacturers, or any other class of citizens, by the payment of unequal and partial taxes, by awarding to them exclusive privileges, or by sustaining them in the enjoyment of oppressive monopolies, which are ultimately to grind both us and our children after us "into dust and ashes."

All which is respectfully submitted.

PAYMENT OF DUTIES IN CASH.

[Communicated to the House, January 5, 1820.]
To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled :

The memorial and petition of the undersigned, merchants and citizens of Baltimore, respectfully sheweth, that they, with their fellow-citizens generally, being seriously affected by, and deeply impressed with a sense of, the pecuniary embarrassment which prevails in every section of the country, beg leave to submit to the superior wisdom of Congress what appears to them as being among the prominent exciting and sustaining causes of the present distress, and respectfully to petition for a modification, which they are fully persuaded would afford very considerable, if not entire relief.

The very liberal policy which has been pursued by the American Government in relation to commerce, and particularly in regard to the collection of the duties on imported merchandise, appears to your memorialists to have caused the accumulation of a stock of foreign goods, not only in the seaport towns, but also throughout every part of the interior of our country, considerably above its necessary consumption, or the means of immediate payment.

The heavy stocks thus accumulated, appear, in some measure, and in several descriptions of merchandise, to be kept up by the extended credits on which these articles may be obtained in Europe, but more particularly by the inviting convenience of the liberal credits given by the Government here for the payment of the duties on importation, which not only encourages the American merchants to project a scale of trade fully equal to our means of remittance, in the produce of our land and labor, taken from us by foreign countries, but also holds out the stronger inducement for foreign houses to press into the country large additional supplies on their own account, which, if it ever were desirable, in the more infant state of the commerce of this country, to encourage the use of foreign capital to aid the import trade, your memorialists apprehend that the period has now arrived which renders such a policy rather an evil than a benefit. The wealth thus acquired out of American industry by transient merchants, or for foreign account, generally, in the end, leaves the country; while, in the progress of this trade, their operations oppress it with debt, and create a constant demand upon it for specie. In the mean time a considerable amount of American capital, for want of employment, has been drawn into various unnatural channels; among others, your memorialists beg leave to notice the fitting out of vessels for the purpose of prosecuting, under foreign colors, illicit privateering and piracy, and for engaging in the cruel and unnatural traffic to Africa for slaves; to the great demoralizing tendency upon the mariners of our country, who are thus employed to execute crimes which originate in the secret forebodings and projects of others residing among us.

Payment of Duties in Cash.

A large amount of American capital, employed by some of the most respectable houses hitherto engaged in the import trade, has also been forced out of it, by the superior advantages and obvious rivalry of those who work on foreign account, in the various refinements which take place between owner and agent, in regard to the original cost on which duties are paid.

In addition to what would be the demand for foreign merchandise, under a wholesome operation of trade, your memorialists beg leave to suggest that importations of goods, obtained on credit in a foreign market, thus paying a duty, on an extended credit here, have been effected to a very considerable extent, with the exclusive design of raising funds for other objects. Large consignments of merchandise are also made by foreign houses to their agents and others residing in this country, upon the information taken from American orders and commissions, after the American merchants had given these orders, to the full extent that it was safe and proper to be done; and many of the goods, thus imported, being sold at public auction for cash, afford to the foreign owner the use of capital equal to the amount and credit on the duties.

Voyages have likewise been executed to and from the West Indies, first by purchasing a cargo in this country on extended credit, with a view of realizing the return cargo, in cash, before the credit on the first or the credit on the duties would expire.

A cargo of teas, arriving in this country, to a favorable market, and immediately sold, will furnish the means, both as to time and amount, for a new voyage, of equal value, by the credit alone which is allowed for the payment of the duties, without the aid of any other capital. A cargo of West India spirits, arriving, and being sold, under the same circumstances, will furnish, in like manner, the means of two subsequent voyages, the second double the amount of the first, before the expiration of the credit on the duties.

The accommodation of a long credit, on the very heavy duties now payable on nearly all imported merchandise, but more especially on teas, foreign spirits, wines, sugars, coffee, and foreign manufactured goods, by constituting a considerable part of the price for which they are sold in this market, thus forms a prominent consideration in the commercial object of some merchants, under particular circumstances, without any regard to the evil consequences, both public and private, which attend their operations. If the rate of duties were increased to double their present amount, payable on the same term of credit, the defect in the policy of giving a long credit on heavy duties would be rendered still more obvious, by a great enlargement of unsound commercial operations, with an equal increase of all the other evils which attend the present system.

In this state of commercial existence, your memorialists beg leave further to suggest that the immense overstock of foreign merchandise, thus, in some measure, forced into the country, soon becomes pressed, from the superabundance, into the interior—generally on extended credits.

The merchants of the interior are thereby enabled to offer their merchandise on the same or more alluring credits, almost at the door of every consumer; while the consumers too often, in return, relaxing in their industry, and neglecting to improve the advantages which nature has placed around them, continue to supply themselves out of the foreign stock, until debt and embarrassment have arrested the procedure. Your memorialists are aware that the late excessive and fictitious banking operations contributed greatly to delude the American community; and that goods of domestic fabric, when offered in excessive quantities, and on immoderate credits, would also have a tendency to impair industry amongst the consumers. But it must appear equally obvious that a fair demand would exhilarate manufacturing industry, and that, in the same commonwealth, an equilibrium must soon take place. But the wide difference between the policy which invites the expenditure of wealth, even upon luxuries, produced from the industrious labor of our own country, and the policy which invites to the expenditure of the same wealth upon luxuries of foreign origin, thus supporting foreign industry and neglecting domestic, your memorialists apprehend to be worthy of a peculiar consideration.

From the practice and habit of using foreign goods in such abundance, your memorialists further apprehend that an unwarrantable prejudice has been created in favor of them, to the great moral injury of the American community, who are now disposed to consider many of those articles not only as matters of convenience and comfort, but also as the test of importance among their fellow-citizens. The expensive woollen, cotton, and linen fabrics of Great Britain and Ireland; the costly silks of China, France, and Italy; the coffee, sugar, and teas of the Indies; the extravagant wines of Madeira, &c. are, from an acquired taste, producing a vitiated standard of public opinion, considered essential for the table, and for the apparel of a respectable family in the American community, and constitute a very considerable part of their consumption and expenditure. If the amount annually paid for the excessive proportions of these luxuries was, only for a few years, saved to the country, your memorialists feel confident that the United States would be placed, on the scale of independent prosperity, above the rivalry of any other people; but as the natural consequence of an import trade greatly overdone, from the causes which your memorialists have had the honor to suggest, the interior of the country now stands largely indebted to the merchants of the seaport towns, while the latter are scarcely less in debt to foreign countries; and to meet the balance of trade thus created against us, or, with a view to new importations, after the produce of the country is taken abroad to the extent of the present demand for it, they are engaged in collecting and exporting a part of the small quantity of specie remaining in the country, which it is now manifest would have been carried out to a greater extent but for the extensive sales and hypothecation of American stocks in England since the late war, contributing hitherto to keep down the premium on exchange, and retaining, for the time being, the specie in the country, but still leaving the nation, to an equal amount, in debt for future settlement.

Your memorialists, therefore, with a view to sound national policy, by raising an additional barrier to the excessive importation of foreign goods above our means of payment; with a view to a more equal and correct payment of the duties; with a view to check the inordinate preference given to foreign productions, by bringing those of our own country more into use; with a view to improve the condition of commerce, by coercing trade more into operations for cash, or on shorter credits; with a view to secure to the resident American merchant, and thus to the country, the profits growing out of American trade; with a view to turn the balance of trade as much as possible in our favor, and thereby to bring back a portion of the precious metals; and, finally, but still with a view of leaving commerce free, for the employment of American capital, in all articles which the country may require, and can afford to consume, whether as matters of necessity, convenience, or objects of taste and fancy—with these views and designs, your memorialists respectfully pray that the duties on all foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, may be made payable in cash; or, if the goods are put into the public stores, that the duties may be made to bear an interest from the date of one month after the entry of the vessel in which they may be imported.

And, under the influence of a sense of justice, actuated by feelings of humanity, and with a high regard for the reputation of their country, and particularly for the city in which they reside, your memorialists further pray that effectual measures may be taken to arrest the practice, which, it is apprehended, still prevails to a considerable extent) of employing American vessels and American mariners, under foreign colors, in unlawful privateering and piracy, as well as in the African slave trade.

OBJECTIONS TO THE CASH PAYMENT OF DUTIES, &c.

[Communicated to the House, January 6, 1820.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York respectfully sheweth, that your memorialists have been informed that petitions are about to be laid before your honorable body, from this city and elsewhere, praying that a law be passed altering the system of collecting the revenue in such manner as to make the duties payable in cash, in place of allowing, according to the established practice, a credit on bonds; the nature and consequences of the proposed change, so interesting to all those concerned in the foreign commerce of the United States, your memorialists will respectfully attempt to point out to the Legislature of their country.

The present system of collecting duties formed a part of the first revenue laws of the United States: it was proposed thirty years ago by one of the ablest financiers of which this country can boast, was adopted after the maturest consideration, and has since been many times attentively re-examined; laws and regulations to enforce it, and to preserve the rights of the Government, have been carefully devised; and it may with safety be said, that in no country whatever have the imposts been collected with smaller losses or at a less expense; and, even of the small losses which have accrued, it is well known that a part has been owing to the want of vigilance and attention of the officers intrusted with the collection of the duties.

From the commencement of the present Government, the existing system of collecting the duties has confessedly been in successful operation; the commerce and agriculture of the country have been fostered by it, and under its influence the United States have advanced to wealth with a celerity beyond example, and have, in a great degree, by the activity of commercial and other national interests, stimulated and supported by this judicious system, risen from a state of infant feebleness to a maturity of strength and power. During this long period, this system has become interwoven and intimately connected with every interest of the community; it has been universally acquiesced in, and has scarcely had to encounter even a censure; but now the National Legislature are called upon to change laws of acknowledged excellence, whose utility has been sanctioned by the experience of thirty years, and to substitute others altogether new, and of uncertain operation and effect.

Great and sudden alterations of the commercial laws of a country ought not to be made, unless evils of magnitude can clearly be pointed out in the existing laws, or great benefits can be proved to accrue from the proposed changes. The reasons urged against the present system of collecting duties are, that it tends to encourage overtrading, and to inundate the country with foreign goods. These are, in part, true; for a credit on the first cost, or on the expenses of importing goods, will increase the quantity imported, and of course lessen the profits; the importer will sell lower, and the consumer buy cheaper; and as it operates by increasing a competition, the smallest possible profit on the trade will be charged, and in many instances it will even be carried on at a positive loss. But this cannot long endure; commerce will in this branch, as in every other, regulate itself, and will not continue to be carried on without producing some profit on the capital employed. The influx of goods into the United States is, however, attributable to other causes; the great increase of British manufactures and the decrease of their markets (other nations in time of peace manufacturing for themselves,) will much more satisfactorily account for the surplus of foreign manufactured goods in this country. But there is another cause for the accumulation of foreign manufactures here, and one which may fairly be hailed as an evidence of returning health in the body politic, because it proves that we are recommencing habits of economy and industry. By the late Treasury report, it appears that the amount of goods imported is much reduced; taking this fact in connexion with the assertions made to your honorable body from various sources, that we are deluged with foreign fabrics, and the inference, not that we have imported more, but that we have consumed less, is irresistible.

Another reason urged against credits on duties is, that it furnishes a capital for the merchant equal to the whole amount of duties bonded. This is also true, but to a certain degree only: so far as the importer of goods receives back from the buyer or consumer the duties for which he has bonded before the bonds have been paid, it becomes to him an additional capital. In the China and India trade, the capital thus raised out of duties is sometimes very large, but in all the other branches of the foreign commerce of the United States the reverse is true; and it is asserted, without fear of contradiction, that the duties are paid to the Government, on an average, before they are received from the consumer. But in those cases where the duties operate to increase the capital of the importer, what is the consequence? It may benefit him; it certainly does promote the interest of the community; as the amount of capital is increased, the profit on capital is diminished; the merchant gives more to the agriculturist for his productions, and sells him his supplies at a lower price.

Your memorialists respectfully solicit the attention of Congress to some of the consequences of the proposed recommendation, that the payment of the duties on goods should be in cash, at the time of their arrival.

Suppose such a law passed and rigidly carried into effect: at any time when it commences, the prospective payments into the Treasury from bonds for twelve months would amount to about twenty millions of dollars; the amount of duties accruing during the same period, and payable in cash, may be stated at about eighteen millions; the contributions of the community would thus be nearly doubled, and the payments of two years brought into one. Is any community, it may fairly be asked, able to bear an addition to heavy duties of ninety per cent. in one year? and if such an addition could be collected, the inquiry is of immense importance, what would be the consequence to the commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests of the country, of withdrawing so great a proportion of actual capital from those pursuits, and placing it in the hands of the Treasurer? It is no less important to inquire what would be the consequence to our numerous and respectable State banks, of disturbing, and perhaps withdrawing from them so great a proportion of their deposits, and placing them in the vaults of another moneyed institution?

But the Chamber of Commerce cannot suppose, for a moment, that a law will be enacted rigidly enforcing the payment of duties in cash on the arrival of the goods, or that, if enacted, it could possibly be carried into effect. A new law must provide for a great number of contingent cases: when goods arrive, some consignees may be absent, some may be dead, some have become bankrupt, some refuse to receive the consignment; some parcels of goods may be without invoices, others damaged; a malignant sickness prevailing in a port may prevent any consignee from entering his goods. These cases will show the absolute necessity of warehouses being provided by the collectors, to receive such goods as are not entered, and of appointing a time by law when, if not entered and the duties paid, they shall be sold. So many exceptions will become necessary in the operations of the law, that the new system, instead of being for the collection of duties in cash on the arrival of the goods, will really be for the collection of duties on goods after they have been stored; thus, as to a credit on the duties, the old and new systems will approximate—the security for duties on the former, bonds with surety, and, on the latter, the goods themselves. If there is any advantage to the Government in this change, it will be gained by the introduction of serious evils and disadvantages; the charges of collection will be enormously enhanced, and the number of officers greatly increased. Individuals will be subjected to additional expenses, to new and vexatious regulations at the custom-houses, together with delays in business, and injury to the goods stored. Although the expense and inconvenience of storing goods be very great, still the circumstances of many merchants would make it necessary to submit to them; others, more wealthy, would be able to pay the duties on arrival, and thereby avoid those inconveniences; in this class will be found the foreign agent, who will be furnished with funds by drawing on his principal at home, or his factor here; thus the tendency of the system will be to create and sustain a monopoly in the hands of foreign and other capitalists, and to oppress and bear down that class whose moderate means and great industry strengthen and invigorate the best interests of the community.

The effect of the proposed measure on the revenue of the country cannot fail, in the opinion of your memorialists, to be seriously embarrassing to the Government. The payment of duties in cash, or a charge of interest from the arrival of the goods until the duties are paid, will, it is true, be equal to an additional duty of about five per cent.; but still, a change from a system well understood, to one whose operations are unknown and uncertain, will alarm the timid, and increase the caution of the prudent merchant, and, until all its consequences are developed, will have a tendency greatly to restrain and limit the commercial operations of the country, and proportionably lessen the duties on importations; and the Treasury, after the first year, will have parted with a fund in bonds equal at all times to about twenty millions of dollars, payable within twelve months, and which would always prove a solid resource in case of a war with a maritime nation.

Your memorialists feel a deep solicitude on this subject, and are earnestly desirous that the National Legislature may see that the difficulties to which the commerce of this country has been exposed have arisen out of the great changes which have taken place in the state of the world some years past, and that our sufferings have been in common with other nations; that the evils complained of will naturally regulate themselves; and that to attempt to remove them by changing the established system of the country, and introducing new laws making duties payable in cash, will be equally unavailing and injurious.

The Chamber of Commerce, having thus taken the liberty respectfully to express their sentiments on one great national question, hope it will not be considered presumptuous if they introduce another important subject to the attention of your honorable body. Memorials from this city and elsewhere will, it is understood, be laid before Congress, recommending that a duty of ten per cent. be laid on all sales at auction. This, in the opinion of your memorialists, is equivalent to recommending a law prohibiting all sales at auction. The policy of regulating, and the impolicy of prohibiting sales at auction, seem to be equally clear and certain.

A considerable portion of the goods sold at auction in the United States are on account of foreigners, who ship them direct to the auctioneer, or to agents who place them in his hands; thus avoiding the expense of warehouses, stores and other parts of a mercantile establishment, to which merchants in a regular line of business are subjected. So many goods are sold at auction as to regulate the prices of those sold at private sale, the importer, therefore, who intends to sell at private sale, must sell about as low as the auction prices, and be subjected to the usual expenses of a mercantile establishment. To place these classes of merchants on an equality, a moderate duty on sales at auction would seem to be necessary.

Your memorialists, therefore, respectfully recommend to your honorable body to pass a law laying a duty of two and a half per cent. on all goods sold at auction in original packages, and of five per cent. on all other goods sold at auction, with the exception of the property of bankrupts or insolvents assigned for the benefit of their creditors, the property of deceased persons, goods sold by process of law, and goods damaged at sea and sold for the benefit of the owners or insurers. And your, &c.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURES.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 10, 1820.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled :

The memorial of citizens of Middletown and its vicinity, in the State of Connecticut, respectfully represents : That your memorialists, viewing the success of American manufactures as an object of great national importance, earnestly hope that such duty may be imposed upon imported fabrics (more especially those of wool and cotton) as shall be adequate to protect our own from a ruinous competition. All wise nations, even those who from selfish motives would dissuade us from following their example, have strenuously extended this species of protection to their manufactures.

Most of your memorialists have no personal interest in manufacturing establishments. They are influenced solely by a wish to promote the cause of their country against foreign nations—a cause in which are involved the prosperity and happiness of all the different sections of these United States in which the cotton planters of the South, and still more obviously the inhabitants of the Western States, from their remote inland situation, and the liability of their single outlet to the ocean to be obstructed, if not closed, by hostile squadrons, have as deep an interest as the artisans and farmers of the Northern and Eastern States. Our foreign markets are, and probably for a long period will be, so limited and depressed, that the exportation of the surplus produce of our soil cannot furnish our former, nor indeed any considerable resources. Thus, while both our agriculture and our commerce languish, we must, of necessity, turn to domestic manufactures for relief. If American manufactures were duly protected, they create for agriculture an extensive and permanent home market, which would powerfully aid in removing the present severe pressure on our country; that useful branch of industry, doubly more valuable than our foreign commerce—the coasting trade—which generates no collision with other nations, would be prodigiously increased; our seamen be preserved, and in readiness to assist us in the exigencies of defensive or inevitable war.

A deadly blight ought not to be thrown upon the enterprise of our manufacturers, by the fear of lessening the revenues of the customs. Their diminution would not be so formidable as is frequently apprehended; for the higher rate of duties imposed would, in a considerable degree, counterbalance the reduction in the quantity of our imports. Even were the receipts of the custom-house diminished more than we believe, the national debt would only require a few years more for its extinguishment. This consideration should not be allowed to expose multitudes of our fellow-citizens to ruinous speculation, or inactivity, or labor for a bare penurious subsistence—the sure consequences of the prostration of American manufactures at this period.

Nations, like individuals, must become poor and dependent when they habitually purchase to an amount larger than the product of their labor. Such a state of things, unfortunately existing now among us, will soon be as injurious to morals as to property. If long continued, not only moral but political virtue would be extinct, and patriotism a word of derision or reproach. Indolence, the parent of vice, would combine with artificial wants to enervate; the luxury and domineering influence of a few rich men, acting upon the poverty of the mass of our citizens, would corrupt; and the neglect of national industry by the Government would alienate the people from our inestimable political institutions. It should never be forgotten that, in the hour of danger, a safe reliance cannot be placed on the mere love of native soil. The paternal encouragement of all the various classes, and of all the useful occupations in the community, is requisite to secure the tie which binds the people to their Government. Everywhere, and particularly in a confederation of States like ours, mutual interest is the most indissoluble bond of union. Should our artisans be treated with cold neglect, while those under monarchies are warmly cherished, strong prejudices might be excited against our Government and our country.

Agriculture alone cannot furnish all the necessities and conveniences of life. Again: independently of those engaged in the indispensable mechanic arts, a large portion of our people cannot be employed as cultivators of the soil. Women, children, and also many of our men, are incapable of tilling the ground, although they might be usefully employed in several departments of manufactures. And if they were capable, where should we find a market for the immense surplus of our agricultural products? We might have a useless superfluity of provisions, but we should be deeply in debt for our clothing and other necessary articles. It is evident that a plan of general husbandry would, in the present situation of the United States, if put in execution, be so profitable as to produce a most pernicious relaxation of national industry; because the supply of commodities is always proportionate to the demand occasioned by their consumption, and because the demand for our agricultural commodities abroad being only to a small amount, agriculture must look for its principal market at home; and, consequently, for an extension of that market, it must rely chiefly upon the encouragement of American manufactures.

Adequate protecting duties, at this juncture, would soon create or revive such a number of manufacturing establishments in this country, that ere long their rivalry would probably reduce the price of their fabrics below the present standard of those imported. But, on the other hand, if we now permit our manufactories to be prostrated by neglect, we shall be compelled to purchase from European workshops at an exorbitant advance, and thus reimburse, with excessive usury, the losses they had previously sustained. In vain we might then threaten Europe with competition; she would judge of the future from the past, and our menaces would be despised. Indeed, the mouldering ruins of our deserted manufactories would deter us from the attempt to execute our threats. We should dread lest the reluctant patronage of our Government might be suddenly withdrawn, and we be again exposed to those machinations which foreign merchants and manufacturers are now practising with success.

There are several fabrics which, possibly, for a considerable period, cannot be advantageously made in the United States. The importation and sale of such would employ a due proportion of merchants, and would be to an amount fully equal to this country's capacity of payment. But we now pay vast sums to other nations for various articles, which, with proper encouragement, we might soon make nearly, perhaps quite, as cheap ourselves. We are willing tributaries to Europe and to Asia. What is the consequence? The precious metals have nearly disappeared, and our circulating medium of trade is a precarious paper currency. For the discharge of the enormous yearly accumulating balances we owe abroad, we have remitted large quantities of our bank stock, and even of the evidence of the debt contracted by our Government with its citizens. We are thus placing not only our property, but even the credit of our country, in the power of foreign nations. It is to be feared that we are rapidly approaching a crisis not less perilous than degrading.

A complaint is sometimes heard that American fabrics were sold at high prices during the recent war with Britain. To this we answer, that, setting aside all the difficulties inseparable from new establishments, those prices were not higher than we paid for imported fabrics of the same quality; and also, that the competition of American fabrics prevented much of that extortion to which, but for them, we must have been subjected. Besides, why censure the manufacturer for obtaining the market price for his commodities, any more than the merchant, planter, and farmer for obtaining it for theirs?

In case of war with any great Power, the necessity of our possessing manufactories, particularly those for arms and clothing, is so obvious as to render comment useless. But these establishments must be previously protected and matured by Government in times of peace, before the emergency which demands them actually arrives.

Had not heavy duties been imposed to encourage our fabrics of leather, fur, wood, iron, &c., there would have been very few of those numerous and useful classes of artisans who are at present engaged in manufacturing these articles in this country. Prodigious sums would have been expended abroad which now circulate at home, enriching large bodies of industrious, valuable citizens, who contribute essentially to the support of many others, as well as to the general wealth and happiness of the community. Proper encouragement would give as powerful a stimulus to several other branches of our manufactures. We might then have a respectable home market and home trade, which, as they would not be endangered by the frequent political and commercial fluctuations of other countries, would, from their security, their permanence, and their amalgamation of the interests of different parts of the United States, be of immense importance in a national point of view. This opinion is corroborated by our rapidly increasing population, which, in conjunction with the progress of our new settlements, has a tendency to incalculably augment the products of our soil, and, of course, to render an extensive and permanent home market indispensable.

Habitations, food, and clothing, are the primary natural wants of mankind. No nation can be durably powerful that does not itself furnish them all, without recourse to others. We cannot be really independent until we make our own necessary clothing; and the prosecution of this object is also closely connected with the advancement of national morality and industry. In proof of this assertion, we refer to Portugal and Spain. All the South American gold and silver mines of the one, and the Brazilian diamonds of the other, have weighed lightly in the scale against the ruin of their manufactures. The effect produced on Portugal by the Methuen British Treaty, that abrogated the heavy duties once laid on British fabrics, places this subject in the clearest light of moral demonstration.

An evil of great moment—one, of whose extent few appear to be aware—results from the unprotected state of American manufactures, and the consequent influx of foreign woollen and cotton fabrics. This evil is the alarming diminution of our household manufactures, by which very many families formerly supplied themselves with the principal articles of their clothing. These were very durable; they were chiefly made by women and children at leisure hours, when their time would have been otherwise unproductive. Such occupations wonderfully promoted habits of industry and frugality. But, unfortunately, imported woollen and cotton fabrics, flimsy in their texture, but handsomely finished, are sold ostensibly so cheap that great numbers have relinquished their highly beneficial system of household manufacturing, and are now becoming embarrassed by contracting debts for what they could have made better and cheaper for themselves.

Your memorialists would here suggest the expediency of imposing such a per centage upon sales at auction of woollen and cotton goods, and of any other fabrics that in your judgment ought also to be included, (with the exception of property of this description belonging to bankrupts' estates, to deceased persons, or which is sold by execution,) as may in future prevent the severe injuries arising to the regular, fair American dealer, as well as to the American manufacturer, from the various artifices which are successfully practised through the medium of auctions.

Your memorialists conclude by respectfully repeating their earnest request that the honorable Congress of the United States, who are the guardians of the nation's welfare, will subject imported fabrics—more especially those of cotton and wool—to such duties as shall secure to American manufactures that protection which the interests and real independence of our country seem imperatively to require.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURES.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 17, 1820.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the subscribers, citizens of Pennsylvania, respectfully sheweth: That the policy hitherto pursued in this country, which has exposed most of our manufacturers, whose productions are excluded from nearly all the markets in Europe, to an unavailing struggle with the manufacturers of all that quarter of the world, and likewise of Hindostan, has been the principal cause of the present calamitous state of affairs, whereby industry, the source and parent of the power, prosperity, and happiness of nations, has been paralyzed; the wealth of our country, which ought to invigorate its agriculture, manufactures, trade, and commerce, been drained to foster the industry and support the governments of foreign nations; a considerable portion of our farmers, manufacturers, merchants, and traders, reduced to, and others tottering on the verge of, bankruptcy; whereby, in a word, a state of decrepitude and decay has been produced, in the short space of three or four years, of which history affords few examples, in the same space of time, during a season of peace, and without any of those great natural calamities which interrupt the happiness of nations.

When your memorialists examine the policy of Europe, (that portion of the globe from whence sound lessons of political economy can be derived,) they find that the system pursued in this country is in direct hostility with that of every wise nation there. All of them sedulously guard the interests of their manufacturers, as one of the main sources of their wealth. They restrain by prohibitory duties, or prevent by absolute prohibitions the importation of such important articles as their own subjects can manufacture.

We are persuaded that sound policy dictates to all legislative bodies, particularly those of young nations, carefully to review the systems pursued in other countries; to trace the welfare of the people on whom they operate; and to shun those which destroy the industry, enfeeble the strength, and impair the resources of the respective nations; and, on the other hand, to adopt, as nearly as may be, such as have fostered their industry, and increased their strength and resources.

The limits of a memorial prevent us from entering into detail on the tariff of different nations. We cannot, however, in justice to the public interest, omit to touch slightly on some of the prominent features of the protecting system pursued in other countries, whose statesmen are certainly not inferior to ours in intellectual attainments, and whose examples and opinions should not be lightly rejected. We shall confine ourselves chiefly to four—Great Britain, France, Austria, and Russia. Other nations, as Prussia, Holland, Denmark, &c., pursue a system marked with similar characteristic features.

Great Britain prohibits, even from her own dependencies, calicoes, manufactures of gold, silver, or metal, laces, ribands, silk goods, &c.; and her protecting duties are so high as, in most cases, to be equivalent to prohibition. The duty on hats is about seven dollars and a half each, and on woollen cloths seven dollars and a half per yard. There are above sixty articles, including manufactures of brass, copper, carriages, thread stockings, clocks,

Protection to American Manufactures.

&c., subject to fifty-nine per cent.; china and earthenware, shawls, &c., pay seventy-nine; cotton manufactures, cotton stockings, caps, thread, and linen sails, pay eighty-five; glass manufactures, generally, one hundred and fourteen; skins or furs, tanned, tawed, or curried, and articles made of leather, or whereof leather is the article of chief value, one hundred and forty-two per cent.

So minute is her attention to this grand point, that linen, when chequered or striped, painted or stained, is subject to one hundred and forty-two per cent. duty, but only to sixty-three when not chequered or striped. The object is to secure to her own subjects the profits of the staining, printing, &c.

Great Britain expended many hundred millions of pounds sterling to replace the Bourbon family on the thrones of France and Spain, and of course had high claims on the gratitude of both monarchs. Yet the paramount duty of justice to his subjects gained the ascendancy over gratitude to his friends, in the councils of Louis XVIII. One of the earliest measures of his administration was the promulgation of a tariff, whereby above two hundred different articles, including all the most important of the British manufactures, and, among the rest, muslins, cambrics, woollen cloths, all articles made of leather, steel, iron, brass, tin, wood, bronze, &c., were totally prohibited.

Let us add that Ferdinand VII., as soon as he ascended the throne of Spain, issued a proclamation, not only forbidding the importation of cotton goods altogether, but ordering those actually in the country to be reshipped within twelve months.

For the policy of Austria on this important subject, we respectfully refer you to a recent British publication—Rordanes on European Commerce. It is therein stated that “the importation of all silk, cotton, and woollen manufactures, is forbidden in the whole extent of the Austrian dominions, as it has been hitherto in the ancient Austrian States only.” There are various other prohibitions, unnecessary to be detailed.

The prohibitory system of Russia, a country, like our own, with a vast territory and a very disproportionate population, is carried to an extent far beyond that of any other in the world, except China. It embraces all the great leading articles of manufacture, as cotton, linen, leather, wool, wood, copper, iron, paper, silk, silver plate, glass, and a vast variety of articles of minor importance.

Every reason that exists for prohibitions in those nations, for the purpose of protecting the native manufacturer, and preserving the resources of the country, exists here. And we cannot but lament that the arbitrary Governments of Europe have displayed more attention to the interests of their subjects interested in manufactures than the same description of persons have experienced from their fellow-citizens in Congress. The former are protected, by the strong arm of law, against the competition of every nation whatever; while the latter are exposed to the competition of the whole world, and consequently to ruin. It therefore irresistibly follows, that so far as regards the acquisition of property, and the protection of property acquired, a large portion of this class of citizens are debarred from one of the most substantial advantages of Government. This is a stain on our annals which cannot be regarded without deep regret—a stain which, we respectfully hope, for the honor of our common country, you will speedily obliterate.

Numerous objections have been raised against the protection of manufactures in this country, which we shall freely but respectfully examine.

Among the most prominent is the extortion said to have been practised by the manufacturers during the late war, which has been by many regarded as a complete justification of the refusal of an increase of duties.

We believe this accusation can be fairly disproved, to the satisfaction of every ingenious mind; and we respectfully invite your attention to the subject. We shall state the case of superfine broadcloth, on which the chief reliance has been placed. The reasoning that applies to this article will apply equally to others. Foreign cloths were sold, in 1811, before the war, at eight, nine, and ten dollars per yard. Merino washed wool was then about seventy-five cents per pound. One hundred and fifty thousand pounds of imported merino wool were sold, in the course of that year, by Messrs. Warder and Son, of Philadelphia, to Messrs. Dupont, of Wilmington, and others, for from seventy to eighty cents. On the general establishment of the woollen manufactories, at the close of 1813, merino wool was sold at two dollars and a half to three dollars per pound, as appears by the Philadelphia price current; which also shows that on the 23th of March, 1814, the price was from three to four dollars, at which it continued stationary for the remainder of the year. The highest price of American superfine broadcloth, at that period, averaged from twelve to fourteen dollars. Foreign cloth was generally sold at a higher rate; and, but for the supplies from the American manufactories, would probably have been sold for twenty dollars. Thus, while the farmer, who advanced the raw material from four to five hundred per cent., and the importer, who raised his prices from fifty to two hundred per cent. on the various articles he had for sale, accuse the manufacturer of extortion, the latter did not advance his fabrics more than fifty per cent. on the prices current before the war, notwithstanding the extravagant rise in the price of the raw material, and likewise in wages, owing to the extraordinary demand for workmen, and notwithstanding the enormous expense of the manufacturing establishments, and the advance in the price of almost every article of food and dress.

We hope and believe that this accusation, though so often reiterated, will have no influence on your honorable Houses.

We beg leave, very respectfully, to take another glance at this subject. The cotton planters have for many years raised cotton at an expense of about eight or ten cents per pound, and sold it from twenty to thirty-five. The farmer has likewise raised wheat at an expense of one dollar per bushel, and frequently sold it from two to three dollars. While they made such exorbitant profits and independent fortunes, unenvied and uncensured by their manufacturing fellow-citizens, it cannot be very correct for them to reproach the latter (a large proportion of whom have been ruined) with extortion, for selling at thirteen or fourteen dollars an article which actually cost them ten or eleven. Let it be observed, that every yard of superfine cloth requires four pounds of merino wool unwashed, or two washed. When the heavy expense of the manufacture, and the interest on the capital invested, are taken into consideration, it will appear that the profits were very far from unreasonable. This accusation, therefore, cannot fail to recall to recollection the parable of the beam and the mote.

But even admitting that the manufacturers had really been guilty, during the war, of tenfold the extortion they are unjustly charged with, it by no means follows that the prosperity of our country should be sacrificed by the suppression of its industry, and the protection of that of foreign nations; or that, therefore, manufactures should not be protected by adequate duties, lest similar extortions should now be practised; for, to avail ourselves of the cogent and irresistible arguments of Alexander Hamilton, the competition between our citizens engaged in those branches would secure the articles to the consumer at a fair price.

"Though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of regulations controlling the competition of foreign with domestic fabrics was an increase of price, it is universally true that the contrary is the ultimate effect with every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competent number of persons, it invariably becomes cheaper. Being free from the heavy charges which attend the importation of foreign commodities, it can be afforded cheaper, and accordingly seldom or never fails to be sold cheaper, in process of time, than was the foreign article for which it is a substitute. The internal competition which takes place soon does away every thing like monopoly, and by degrees reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed. This accords with the reason of the thing, and with experience."

Another objection is, that the labor is too high in the United States to afford any chance of competing with foreign manufactures. To this we reply, there are various manufactures so well established as to overcome foreign competition altogether; and it therefore follows that this objection falls to the ground. We might instance a great number, but we confine ourselves to the manufacture of shoes and boots, of which each individual in the United States probably averages a pair and half per annum, amounting to about thirteen millions, which, at one hundred and twenty-five cents per pair, amount to $16,000,000 per annum. Of these articles, the importation in 1816, as may be seen by reference to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, was only forty-two thousand one hundred and eighty-four pairs, and in 1817 only fifty thousand five hundred and sixty-two. This decides, we trust, the question of high wages forever; for, if the objection were valid, it would apply to the manufacture of shoes and boots with as much force as to any other; and it is worthy of observation, that the duty on men's shoes is only twenty-five, and on children's fifteen cents per pair.

To this we beg leave to add another reply, of at least equal cogency. There are few manufactures, either wholly or chiefly depending on manual labor, which have not succeeded in the United States; whereas our defeat is principally in cottons and woollens, produced almost wholly by machinery, aided by the labor of an over proportion of old women and children. Hence the advantages of our boundless water power, our extraordinary mechanical skill, and the superabundance (in the case of cotton, particularly) of the raw material, are injudiciously sacrificed.

The next objection we shall notice is the alleged demoralizing effects of manufacturing establishments. To refute this, we invite your attention to, and comparison between, two neighborhoods, in one of which manufactures are established, and another remote from such establishments. In the former, there are, as already observed, numbers of aged men and of women and children, usefully employed for themselves, and adding to the mass of the resources and happiness of their country; while, in the latter, a large proportion of persons of this description are doomed to idleness, and its inseparable attendants, vice and guilt. Children in manufacturing establishments are inured to habits of industry, order, and regularity, which generally adhere to them through life.

But we are not left to the guidance of mere hypothesis alone, which, however plausible, is often very fallacious. We have the strong basis of fact to rest on. There is no country in Christendom where manufactures have been carried to a greater extent than in England proper; therefore, in no other country could the experiment be more accurately made; and there the question has been fairly decided. Colquhoun, a most indefatigable and accurate statistical writer, after a full survey of the pauperism and crimes of that country, informs us that the agricultural very far exceed the manufacturing counties in both those stains upon human nature. From this authority there can hardly be any appeal.

It is asserted that it would be a pernicious policy to entice away capital and labor from agriculture to workshops. This apprehension is wholly groundless. Farmers or planters rarely transform themselves into manufacturers. There is in this country a vast amount of capital, for which the owners cannot, in the present deranged state of our affairs, find any employment. But were there any assurance of adequate protection to manufactures, it would be immediately directed towards those objects. There are likewise great numbers of persons, skilled in the cotton and woollen branches, who are destitute of employment, and who could abundantly supply the demands of the United States, were they duly encouraged. We have already, stated that the greater proportion of the labor is performed by old men, women, and children; let us add, that were those branches in such a flourishing state as to hold out inducements to emigrants, we should have constant accessions to our population of persons skilled in them, many of whom would bring with them large capitals, equal to our utmost wants, without drawing away any portion of the capital or labor engaged in husbandry.

The danger of encouraging smuggling is regarded, by many of our citizens, as an insurmountable objection to protecting or prohibitory duties.

This will be found to disappear, like the rest, when fairly submitted to examination. For, suppose it were necessary to raise the duties on woollens and high-priced cottons to thirty-five, forty, forty-five, or even fifty per cent.; we appeal to the candor of your honorable Houses, whether the objection to any of these duties on cambrics, muslins, and broadcloths, on the ground of the danger of smuggling, can be admitted for a moment, when it is considered that gin is subject to a duty of one hundred and twenty-four per cent.; rum, to eighty-six; brandy, to ninety-six; cheese, to seventy; souchong tea, to from seventy to one hundred and twenty; manufactured tobacco, to fifty; and wines, to fifty and sixty. We shall only add, that it is indubitably as easy to smuggle a pipe of wine, a chest of tea, a cask of rum or tobacco, as a trunk of muslins or cambrics, or a bale of broadcloth.

Another objection is against the injustice of taxing the many for the benefit of the few. This assumes the groundless position, that permanent protection of manufactures would necessarily produce permanent high prices; which is refuted by the luminous maxim quoted above from Alexander Hamilton. But even admitting this maxim to be incorrect, the objection may be answered fully in another mode. If one part of the community is not to be taxed for the benefit of another, why, we respectfully ask, is gin dutied at 124 per cent. for the protection of the peach brandy and whiskey of the farmer, and cheese at 70 per cent.? Why is the coasting trade secured to our merchants, by which foreign competition is wholly excluded? And why, we ask, are "the many taxed for the benefit of the few," by the enormous expenses of a navy, foreign embassies, &c., for the protection of commerce?

The protection of manufactures is strongly objected to on account of its interference with commerce. But omitting all considerations arising from the general distress produced by the existing system, we ask, have we at present, or are we likely to have, any commerce, to which it is right or proper to offer up as a sacrifice the welfare and happiness of the useful and productive body of men engaged in manufactures? Such is the prostrate state of our commerce, which unfortunately, depends in a great measure for its success on European wars and famines, that there are few articles that can be imported, and as few that can be exported, without loss.

But even admitting for a moment that our commerce was not so highly disadvantageous as it is, and that the encouragement of manufactures would somewhat interfere with it, we cannot thence infer that it would not be amply indemnified. In fact, far from suffering, it would gain by the arrangement; for the diminution of the number of merchants, by a portion of them withdrawing to manufactures, would render the profession profitable to those who remained. It is obvious, even to a superficial observer, that the mercantile profession in this country has almost always been greatly overdone; and that an inevitable consequence of the superfluous number of merchants has been to raise the markets of our produce at home, and depress them abroad, not only to the injury and frequent ruin of the merchants, but to the injury of the nation. Hence it is more than probable that our commerce, in which for twenty years more than half of those who pursued it have been ruined, would have insured independence and happiness to two-thirds of the number, had the residue transferred their talents, their industry, and their capital to manufactures.

Another consideration deserves attention. The encouragement of manufactures would open new channels of commerce, by the importation of raw materials from abroad, and by the increase of the coasting trade, in transporting the manufactures of the Middle and Eastern States to the Southern, and the cotton and other raw materials of the latter to the workshops of their fellow-citizens. Even of late years, the tonnage employed in the transportation of raw materials to the port of Philadelphia, has exceeded that employed in the transportation of piece goods.

To foster and cherish national industry, the paramount duty and the characteristic feature of good government, most of the nations of Europe either wholly prohibit, or impose high duties on, the exportation of raw materials. We are probably the only civilized people, who, possessing to an immense extent one of the most valuable raw materials in the world, not only send it abroad to distant nations wholly free of duty, but receive it back in a manufactured state, at an advance of from one hundred to two thousand per cent. It would not be more unreasonable to export our wheat to have it ground, and purchase it again in the form of flour, than to sell raw cotton and receive it back manufactured; as the advance on the flour would hardly ever amount to a third part of the advance on cambrics and muslins.

We respectfully state to your honorable Houses, that such is the wonderful increase in the value of cambrics and muslins, beyond the price of the raw material, that the labor of 100,000 cotton manufacturers, aided by machinery, would pay for the amount of the greatest export of the productions of the United States, in any one year since the declaration of independence. This fact, which, if you require it, shall be proved at the bars of your Houses by the most unexceptionable testimony, is the more extraordinary and lamentable, as the high rate of wages here has been, as we have said, among the objections raised to manufactures; whereas it appears that we exchange the produce of the labor of ten, twenty, or thirty of our citizens, for that of one foreign manufacturer. Another objection arises from the supposed danger of impairing the revenue. We respectfully represent to you, that, in the scale of reason and justice, this objection does not appear entitled to as much importance as is attached to it. The expenses of the Government must be borne; the interest of the debt must be paid, and the debt itself gradually extinguished. But these objects can be effectually accomplished without any sacrifice of the national industry; for if low priced cottons and woollens, such as we can ourselves abundantly supply, were wholly prohibited, and the duties increased on those of greater value, the revenue would probably be indemnified, by the gain in the one case for the loss in the other. The same observation applies to most other articles which require protection.

But we beg leave further to represent to your honorable Houses, that the policy pursued, so highly injurious to the national resources and industry, has not been advantageous to, but may ultimately injure the revenue; for the general distress, and the decay of trade and commerce, resulting from the drain of specie, to pay for the extravagant and ruinous importations of foreign goods, have produced such a disability of purchase at present, that the importations of the ensuing twelve or eighteen months, and consequently the duties, will fall very far short of those of former years; and thus the future deficit will probably more than countervail the past excess.

But should the system of protection impair the revenue, it would be only in a slight degree, and merely affect the question of the period of the ultimate redemption of the public debt, which may in consequence be somewhat protracted. When the alternative is between this effect on the one hand, and a continuance of the existing state of things on the other, we trust there can, in an enlightened body, be no difficulty in the decision. It would be unsound policy in a merchant to anticipate the payment of his debts so rapidly as to deprive himself of the means of carrying on his commerce; and it is equally unsound for a nation unnecessarily to press forward the payment of its debts with such rapidity as to exhaust its resources.

Among the reasons that alienated the affections of America, in its colonial state, from the parent country, a very powerful one was the restraints imposed on its manufacturing industry. These were the subjects of loud and unceasing complaints. And we respectfully ask you, whether the consequences to the nation and to individuals are not as fatal, when our industry is torn up by the roots through the means of a tariff fatally inadequate to protect it, as by an arbitrary edict? Does it administer any comfort to the hundreds of useful citizens who invested large capitals in those valuable manufacturing establishments spread throughout the country, whose ruins bear the strongest testimony against the policy we pursue; or to the tens of thousands of workmen reduced to mendicancy, many of them with large families, that their sufferings have not proceeded from the mandates of a privy council, but from the erroneous policy of their fellow-citizens?

The policy of this country has been in a great degree predicated on the specious idea of Adam Smith, "to buy goods where they can be had the cheapest." It has had a fair trial, and its pernicious tendency has been clearly demonstrated. We buy cotton, wool, and muslins in Hindostan; cambrics, muslins, and broadcloths, in France and England, because we can purchase them cheaper there than at home; and there is good reason to believe that we shall have large importations of "cheap" wheat from Odessa. This system has caused a large portion of the existing distress. But of what avail is it that every species of goods and merchandise, and even most of the necessities of life, are "cheap," when the means of purchase are far more reduced with almost every class, and with some have nearly disappeared? The owner of houses, who was in the receipt of two or three thousand dollars per annum, and whose rents have fallen one-third or one-half; the storekeeper, who made a comfortable support for his family, and whose business is almost wholly suspended; the great body of our Western farmers, whose breadstuffs are excluded from those European markets whence their supplies of "cheap goods" have been drawn, and whose industry has thus received a vital stroke; the workman who earned six, eight, or ten dollars per week, and who is now destitute of employment; and every other class of the community now enduring more or less distress, derive little consolation in their difficulties and embarrassments from the consideration that they have bought, and can buy, foreign articles cheaper than domestic. We are persuaded, had the latter been twice as dear as the former, (the difference of price, however, has generally been insignificant,) that recent events prove it would have been sound policy to give the preference to the productions of our fellow-citizens.

We beg leave to correct an error of considerable importance. We said that "every class of the community was suffering more or less distress." There is one striking exception. Great capitalists find a golden harvest in these times. They can add farm to farm, house to house, ship to ship, and stocks to stocks, at their pleasure, to the ruin of the productive classes, who have been always regarded as the most valuable portion of society, and whom it has been the policy of all wise Governments to foster and cherish. The present state of affairs is wonderfully calculated to enrich the wealthy extravagantly; to impoverish and reduce to distress those who have heretofore furnished employment and the means of procuring a comfortable subsistence to thousands and tens of thousands of useful citizens, which they are now unable to afford; and not only to deprive the latter of the means of supporting themselves and families, but perhaps to drive many of them to desperate courses, as so frequently occurs in all countries in times of distress and difficulty. A capitalist with half a million of dollars could now purchase property which one year since would have sold for one million and a half, and which in one or two years hence, when the present calamitous state of affairs, sub-sides, may realize the same sum. This is the poisonous fruit of the upas tree, of "buying cheap goods abroad."

We hope it will appear, on such an enlarged and liberal view of the subject as ought to be bestowed on it by a legislative body, fairly chosen, in a free country, that the advantages held out to farmers and planters from purchasing foreign goods cheap, however specious and plausible they may have appeared, are wholly illusory. The great mass of those descriptions of citizens purchase so few foreign manufactured goods, which alone are to be taken into view in deciding this question, that the utmost saving that can be made on them is insignificant compared with the solid advantages of securing a permanent home market for their productions. The average consumption of foreign manufactures by the citizens of the United States is not four dollars per head. Let us suppose every species of foreign goods to be twenty-five per cent. cheaper than domestic: in this case, the saving, by preferring the former, would be only one dollar per head throughout the Union. Let us respectfully call your attention, on the other hand, to the severe loss incurred by the sacrifice of domestic industry. This will enable you to form a correct decision on this important subject. The reduction in the price of cotton from thirty to eighteen cents per pound, is thirty-six dollars on a single bale; and the reduction in the value of the wheat produced by a single acre of land, suppose twenty bushels, by a fall from two dollars and fifty cents to one dollar and a quarter per bushel, is twenty-five dollars. And it will not admit of a doubt, that had the protection of our cotton establishments provided a home market for that important staple, the price, from the steady and increasing demand, would probably have remained stationary; at all events, it would never have experienced so rapid and so ruinous a reduction. Moreover, so far as regards the farmer, it is highly probable that a due protection of manufactures would, in a few years, as already observed, attract to this country so many foreign artists and manufacturers as would consume nearly as much of the necessaries of life as are now exported abroad.

Dearly, therefore, have they paid the forfeit for adopting the maxim of "purchasing where goods could be had the cheapest;" a maxim rejected in practice, as we have stated, by every wise nation in Europe, and acted upon only by Spain, Portugal, and the United States.

On a review of the proceedings of the fourteenth Congress, your memorialists find that the present calamitous state of affairs was clearly exhibited to their view as early as February, 1816. What was then prophecy, has, alas! fatally become history.

The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, in a most excellent and eloquent report of the above date, ask:

"Do not the suggestions of wisdom plainly show that the security, the peace, and the happiness of this nation depend on opening and enlarging all our resources, and drawing from them whatever shall be required for public use or private accommodation?"

"The committee consider the situation of the manufacturing establishments to be perilous.—Some have decreased, and others have suspended business. A liberal encouragement will put them again into operation, with increased powers. But should it be withheld, they will be prostrated. Thousands will be reduced to want and wretchedness. A capital of nearly sixty millions of dollars will become inactive, a greater part of which will become a dead loss to the manufacturers. Our providence may lead to fatal consequences. The Powers jealous of our growth and prosperity will acquire the resources and strength which this Government neglects to improve. It requires no prophet to foretell what use foreign Powers will make of them."

It cannot be sufficiently lamented that these sage admonitions were unavailing. The tariff, on the most important manufactured articles, was fixed so low, that it required but little sagacity to foresee the ruin of the manufacturers, and the consequent impoverishment of the country.

Your memorialists respectfully state, that they further find that the manufacturers, while numbers of them were sinking victims of, and all of them suffering by, the overwhelming competition of foreign rivals, explicitly stated their sufferings and dangers to their fellow-citizens in Congress, each succeeding session, respectfully and earnestly soliciting that protection which they alone had the power, and which it was their imperious duty to bestow. It is painful to your memorialists to state, (but candor requires they should state,) that those applications were disregarded; that the applicants were left to fall victims in an unequal struggle; in which long established manufactures, immense capital, great credit, and Governmental protection were arrayed on one side, and on the other infant establishments, exhausted capital, slender credit, and a tariff utterly inadequate for protection. The memorials from Rhode Island, Pittsburg, Baltimore, and Oneida county, are masterpieces of eloquence, admirably calculated to excite the sympathy and to command the aid of the Legislatures to which, unhappily, they were in vain addressed.

Although this memorial has already extended to a great length, we cannot close it without placing the subject in another important point of view, deserving of your most serious consideration.

The establishment of manufactures on a respectable scale in any town or village is of transcendent benefit to the agricultural interest, as they immediately enhance the value of the lands in the neighborhood from one to five hundred per cent. Independent of the advantage already glanced at, of a steady home market for his wheat, flour, corn, rye, &c., the farmer has "a certain demand for his cabbages, peas, turnips, and other garden stuffs, and fuel, which are too perishable for foreign markets, or not worth the expense of transportation." And this is not mere theory. There are two strong cases in point. The establishment of the manufactories at Brandywine and Pittsburg enhanced the value of the neighboring lands in the ratio above stated, and wonderfully increased the prosperity and comforts of the circumjacent farmers. The same effect has been produced in other parts of the Union; and it would be everywhere produced, in a greater or less degree, by the same cause. And, moreover, the sons and daughters of the farmers and country laborers, a large portion of whose time is at present entirely wasted, would have a source of profitable employment, to add to the comforts and the happiness of their parents.

We therefore pray that, taking the premises fully into consideration, you will be pleased to revise the tariff in such a mode as to revive our drooping manufactures, and afford effectual protection to the national industry.

PETER S. DUPONCEAU,
And others.

REMONSTRANCE AGAINST AN INCREASE OF DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

[Communicated to the House, January 17, 1820.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists present themselves to your honorable Houses, as a portion of the independent agriculturists of Virginia. In that character, we design not to harass our Representatives with high-wrought pictures of distress which their wisdom could not have anticipated, and cannot remove; neither can we bring ourselves to detail, in the language of complaint, much less of reproach, those evils which we endure in common, not only with every class and denomination of our fellow-citizens, but with almost every rank, and description of civilized man. We solicit not the fostering care and patronage of the Legislature to alleviate, by bounties, monopolies, or protecting duties, calamities in their nature as inevitable as they are incurable by legislative interposition, because resulting from a combination of circumstances over which our Legislature can exercise no control. War is an unnatural and calamitous state; its evils must be felt sooner or later, and not less severely by being deferred. The transition from war to peace was sudden, and found us, like the rest of the world, unprepared. But we can bear patiently the penalty of our own improvidence, convinced that our distresses will be but temporary, and recollecting that they were preceded by twenty years of almost uninterrupted prosperity. In this frame of mind, which we recommend to the imitation of our more discontented brethren, we have only to solicit, respectfully but earnestly, from your wisdom and experience, that we be left to ourselves to disembarass our own affairs by active industry and strict economy, instead of being placed at the mercy of interested individuals, who would flatter us with relief by abridging our comforts, increasing our expense, and diverting to their own pockets that portion of the produce of our labor which, differently applied, might serve to extricate us from our present difficulties. The undefined projects and extravagant claims of the manufacturing associations, collected from their circulars, reports of committees, and other publications, could alone lead us to apprehend that we may not be left to this repose which we so earnestly solicit, and which the difficulties of our present situation so imperiously demand. We have always suspected the policy of forcing any branch of trade or manufacture by bounties, monopolies, or protecting duties; but, without entering into the discussion of the general question, we would respectfully suggest that no period more unfavorable than the present could be selected for the commencement of an experimental course of political economy, beginning with the taxation of the many for the emolument of the few. When we consider the taxes already imposed on foreign manufactures, (averaging, perhaps, twenty-five per cent.,) and estimate the amount of freight, double commissions, insurances, and various smaller charges incident to shipping and transporting to this country the products of the foreign artisan, a moderate calculation will give to the American manufacturer an advantage of forty per cent. If, to this immense advantage over the European competitor, we add the cheap terms on which the chief necessities of life—meat, bread, and fuel—can be procured; the abundance in which the raw materials are produced; our happy exemption from the whole of that frightful catalogue of oppressive taxes, which, barely to read, makes the American citizen shudder, but under the continually accumulating weight of which the foreign artisan must labor; and still further, on the authority of the advocates of protecting duties, a considerable capital unemployed, and numerous laborers starving in idleness, and you exhibit a series of advantages on the side of the American manufacturer which would seem to put competition in our own market entirely out of the question. If, with such overwhelming odds in his favor, the American declines to compete with the foreign manufacturer, we must conclude either that capital is wanting to fit him out for the trial, or he scorns the consideration of such profits as would satisfy his opponent. If the former conclusion be true, it demonstrates the impropriety of attempting at this time to force manufactures by law; for, as capital is essentially necessary, and cannot be forced by law, we had better await its slow growth, from the gradual operation of the usual causes; and whenever it arrives at sufficient maturity, manufactures will follow without force. But if, on the other hand, our manufacturers are so impatient to enrich themselves as to disdain the gradual accumulation of moderate profits, we submit respectfully to your wisdom the impolicy of subjecting so large a portion of your fellow-citizens to such unreasonable cupidity—of laying them at the mercy of an association who (competition being removed) will no longer consider the intrinsic value of an article, or what price would afford a fair profit to the manufacturer, but how much the necessities of the consumer would enable them to extort. Of this spirit, we had a sufficient specimen during our late war with Great Britain.

In reply to these arguments, we are told that many manufacturing establishments have been ruined for want of protecting duties. We doubt not the fact of ruin; but we more than doubt the cause assigned for it. We strongly suspect that, on a fair investigation, most of the failures may be accounted for very differently. For instance: 1st. By embarking in business on fictitious capitals; the sudden recall of which left the adventurers, as they originally were, without funds. 2d. Engaging in speculations unconnected with their factories, and, by the failure of these, ruining their establishments. 3d. From the impatience of growing rich, by the gradual accumulation of moderate gains, stimulating them to attempt establishments and projects beyond their means. Few, we believe, of those who commenced with real capitals, and pursued their business prudently, have failed to improve their fortunes. The greater part of this description of persons acknowledge, with honest candor, that they are sufficiently protected. But, as we have forced none of our fellow-citizens to embark their capitals in the precarious speculation of establishing manufactures—perhaps before their time; nay, as they have voluntarily involved themselves in ruinous projects not from patriotic motives, but views purely selfish, and founded on the fallacious prospect of a protracted war, we see no reason why they should call upon us to restate them by a heavy sacrifice, and this, too, at a time when it is with the utmost difficulty any of us can fulfil our own personal engagements, and many are reduced to the necessity of sacrificing their property to satisfy their creditors. Under these circumstances, we hope that your honorable Houses will not deem unreasonable our respectful remonstrance against any increase of burden beyond the necessary expenses of our Government.

One favorite argument insisted on by the manufacturers is so offensive a libel on the great body of the American people, that indignation will not suffer us to pass it unnoticed; to wit, that the establishment of home manufactures is necessary to keep the people firm to their duty in time of war. Thus, more than insinuating that the millions of independent high-minded agriculturists who people our extensive territory, constituting at once the pride and the strength of the nation, are to be taught the value of independence, and the necessity of self-defence, by the operations of an inconsiderable number of manufacturers scattered through the country.

In every nation, with whose internal affairs we are familiarly acquainted, the landed interest has been proverbial for liberality, in comparison with any other class; and we proudly believe the day will never arrive when the American yeoman will not suffer himself patiently to be shorn to the quick in defence of the independence or honor of his country; while, if "you but touch a bristle of the manufacturing interest, the whole sty is in an uproar." We wish not to be placed under such protections, especially when their projects for safety are accompanied by the expression of the alarming sentiment, that they consider the election of a President, a Governor, or a Representative of the people, as uninteresting in comparison with a question on the fabrication of druggets, calico, and penknives.

The specious vision of supplying all our own wants by our own labor, and thus being enabled to isolate ourselves from the other members of the human family, we look upon as a mere phantom, conjured up for the purpose of luring us into a prohibitory system. Could such a vision be realized, we would deprecate its influence as equally hostile to the advance of science and the duration of liberty. We do not envy the condition of the Chinese, the only people completely abandoned to this chimera; amongst whom science has been retrograde for a thousand years, the whole energies of the human mind reduced to the servile talent of imitation, and man degraded to a state of abject grovelling slavery. Compare the timid slave creeping through shallows in his clumsy junk, with the American seaman "among the tumbling mountains of ice of the arctic circle, penetrating to the antipodes, and engaged under the frozen serpent of the South." "Yet we know that he has not been squeezed into this hardy form, or inhaled this daring spirit from the constraints of a watchful and suspicious Government, but that, through a wise and salutary neglect, a generous nature has been suffered to take its own way to perfection. We are firmly persuaded that the best interests of men and of nations are promoted by free and extensive intercourse one with another. The great object of nations ought to be, to procure the greatest possible quantity of produce with the least possible expenditure of labor and of capital. This can be effected only by permitting the people to purchase such articles as they can buy cheaper than they can fabricate. Thus would be produced a most unrestricted state of commerce, permitting every country to employ its capital and industry to the greatest advantage, in devoting them to pursuits adapted to the soil and climate of each, and consonant with the genius of their respective inhabitants.

For these, and other considerations equally cogent, your memorialists feel themselves constrained to remonstrate against the pretensions of the manufacturing interest, as of a highly dangerous tendency, whether considered with respect to their influence on our Government, by establishing the precedent of investing one class with peculiar privileges and immunities at the expense of the rest—a measure pregnant with the most fearful consequences, being as inconsistent with the principles of justice as incompatible with the spirit of our free Constitution; their tendency to demoralize our people, by the introduction of smuggling—an evil inseparable from high protecting duties, and one from which the united navies of Europe and America could not guard a coast as extensive as ours; or their effect on our revenue, already diminished by protecting duties, without producing any corresponding energy on the part of our manufacturers, and which, if further diminished by an increase of tariff, and by diverting capital from the purchase of public lands, must necessarily call for a system of internal taxation; in the present state of our affairs, productive of incalculable distress. Commerce must decline under such a system; with its decline our seamen must diminish; and our gallant Navy, after achieving more than our fondest hopes could anticipate, dwindle into insignificance. This sacrifice, too, we are called upon to make, that our manufacturers may be enabled to furnish us with cottons and woollens fifty per cent. higher than we could procure them in a foreign market.

With this view of the subject, your memorialists pray that no further protection be granted to manufactures, excepting such as in your wisdom you deem essential for national defence; and that the existing duties be so reduced, as to produce the greatest possible revenue. And we revert to our original prayer, to be left to ourselves to disembarass our own affairs, without being called on to repair the losses of any other class, still less to advance them to wealth and power at the expense of the best interests of the American people.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURERS OF PAPER.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 18, 1820.]
To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled.

The memorial of the Society of Paper Makers of the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware, respectfully sheweth, that at a time when the economy of the United States, in all its various branches of manufacture, presses itself upon the public attention by the extreme injury it sustains, your memorialists are impelled, by the deplorable state of that which they particularly represent, to ask for the patronage and assistance of the National Legislature.

Your memorialists believe there are some peculiar features in this manufacture which, if known, will entitle it to the attention of Congress. And they hope to be allowed to mention some general facts respecting the American manufactures which are needful to a full view of their own.

Your memorialists represent a manufacture which arose in these States at an early period of the settlement of the country—about the year 1730; and, being produced from the domestic saving of a raw material which offered no interference to agriculture or commerce, they conceive has always been so much gained in favor of its economy and industry. The arts depending upon it render it necessary to almost every branch of improvement, as the printing of books, maps, charts, prints, newspapers, &c., which materially promote the extension of knowledge, the advancement of education, and the various purposes of the State.

In an object of such extensive consumption, we cannot avoid bringing into view the amount which must have been saved to the nation for a period of one hundred years by the use of a domestic material which must otherwise have been lost; and by the employment of the youth of both sexes in a manufacture which has been more productive than even agriculture itself; the importation of which would have required the country to pay large sums annually for the refuse materials and industry of foreign nations instead of its own.

The paper, in common with several of our manufactures, was protected previous to the Revolution by the general effect of the English laws in favor of its national industry; for, although they offered no encouragement to us to come into competition with manufactures abroad, they secured from general interference the benefit of our home market.

These domestic establishments were of great importance during the Revolution, when the importations ceased. The security arising from the war contributed much to their improvement, and continued after the peace of 1783, in consequence of the limited intercourse with Europe. During the long period of the European war many of our manufactures were preserved by the interruption to those of the Continent, and the heavy charges of shipment; so that from their first origin until the late treaty they experienced a virtual protection, and were prevented from being exposed to ruin by the effect of the laws made by foreign Governments to promote their commerce and the extension of their trade.

After this time an unlimited intercourse took place with distant nations, without regard to the important effects it would produce upon our domestic arrangements and economy; and it was not foreseen that when the policy of every nation of Europe prevented a use to us of their markets whenever our products come into collision with theirs, we were at all times exposed to an introduction of their manufactured articles, not for our regular wants, but as a vent for such goods as they might have in excess. This had an effect to paralyze the internal industry of the country in a manner never before experienced since its settlement; and it has placed us in the situation of several of the countries of Europe whose manufactures had become superseded by those of a rival nation which had acted under the patronage and encouragement of its own Government. This, without affording a regular supply, eventually creates dependence for necessities abroad, by the destruction of the productive objects of national wealth.

Your memorialists beg leave to represent that an effect of this kind is easily produced; for as manufactures become organized, the raw materials of the country are always enhanced by competition, and the prices of goods reduced so that they yield little more than a bare living; the economy of business then affording its chief emolument. Of course, an interference in the home market produces ruin to the regular establishments, by taking away the sale of the goods; creates in their place similar ones abroad, to supply the country; and subjects it in future to pay advantageous if not exorbitant prices, without affording a value to the raw materials of the country, or furnishing its labor.

It appears from the conduct of the nations surrounding us that this effect has been well understood, and they have found that the employment of the people in manufactures, with the aid of machinery, gives the means of buying from neighboring agricultural nations more agricultural products than the same number of people could raise on their own soil at home, and that the difference is again in favor of their national wealth. From this principle they have confined the people to the consumption of the manufactured products of the nation, in preference to buying those of a foreign one, even at a lower price; because the payment takes out of the country the full manufactured price, including both cost and profit; whereas, if the articles are made at home, the country receives all the profit of manufacture, which is so much added to its national stock; and though the consumer may pay something more for the domestic articles he may use in consequence of protecting duties, yet as these will not amount to the profit on the manufacture of the goods, the difference gained to the country is in favor of its improvement; and it is more than made up to the consumer in the benefit derived either in raising the materials, the employment of the people, the increase of industry, the benefit to agriculture, the circulation of money, or in the full use of all the natural advantages of the country.

While the introduction of manufactures prevents this injurious exchange, their establishment at home must increase a population to consume the product to great advantage.

The local situations for mills and factories occupy but little land fit for cultivation, and afford a market to the farmer, at his own door, for the articles of the easiest and most profitable description, which could not bear the expense of carriage; they give an immediate value to his property, to be paid in barter for his demands upon the manufacturer. The raw material, whether it be wool, iron, rags, leather, or wood, or the many wants a population requires, are new objects free from the expense of the labor of carriage, which takes place in transporting them to an uncertain sale in a distant market.

Your memorialists refer the application of these general remarks to their business. This has yielded from the factories within forty miles of Philadelphia a manufactured amount of eight hundred thousand dollars, a year, by which it has employed nine hundred and fifty persons, half of them women and children. This gives a product of near one thousand dollars per head per year, the material in this case being a clear gain. It is, therefore, a far greater amount than could possibly be obtained by the employment of the same people on the land. Now, as the nation would have to pay this amount for paper from abroad, it would have to send abroad the produce of at least four thousand people, employed upon the land to obtain it, even were the prices not raised in consequence of our dependence upon them.

The rising establishments of the country have suffered from the effect of the system pursued; and we believe, if they had been timely guarded in the manner they have been abroad, so as to take the advantage of their prosperity, they would have preserved their standing, and have been now a great support to the nation, to its agriculture, and to the Government.

A view of the progress of the manufacture abroad will give us an illustration of the principle.

"The art of making paper was brought from China into Persia in the seventh century, introduced into Spain, by the Arabs, the eighth or tenth; it passed into France and into Germany in 1312, and last of all into England, in 1320 and 1342."*

"Before the year 1690, there was scarcely any other kind of paper made in England but the coarse brown sort; but the war with France coming on, occasioning duties on foreign paper, the French Protestant refugees settled in England chiefly, and the English artificers also, began to make white writing and printing papers, which were brought to so great a perfection for beauty and elegance, as to supersede the importations of the continental papers into the British dominions. These, it was said, saved a remittance to France alone of one hundred thousand pounds sterling annually; and the country became able, in addition to the supply of its own wants, to export large amounts of papers to foreign markets, which had previously been supplied from the Continent."†

The protection which the manufactures have since received in England, added to the scientific skill of the people, has carried it to a higher degree of perfection than any other nation of Europe, so that they have had a general preference and afford one of her advantages of obtaining the products of other nations by the employment of her people.

The duty on papers taken into England has remained for a long time, by the tariff, at nineteen pence sterling per pound, and a drawback of three pence per pound is allowed on the export of her own paper, which is equal to the excise laid on that consumed at home; so that it appears the advantages derived from the employment of the people have not been retarded, even when in competition with the revenue.

But we have had to contend alike against the manufactures of England and those of the Continent; for while the improvements in this country required us to make paper of a superior quality, to compare with the English paper, we have had to do it under a competition with the prices of the low qualities of the papers from France, Spain, and Italy; which being excluded from England, were sent here, and obtained a sale from their cheapness, when their quality would not have commanded it.

We have been thus exposed to the collision of the interests of different nations from which their own laws severally protected them at home, and in one of which the export has been even promoted by a bounty. This would never have taken effect but among ourselves, and it affords at once a striking instance of the means used to export their surplus products, and to contend with each other for the advantage of a distant market. Nor have the various objects of the country been promoted by this competition.

The revenue obtained has not been considerable; for although large quantities of low priced paper, from France, Spain, and Italy, have been imported, so as to prevent the demands upon our factories, and to anticipate the consumption of the country very greatly, they have come in as objects of speculation, charged low to yield very little ad valorem duty; the collusion of duties being a leading motive for importing them.

Our commerce has not received much benefit, for papers which have been brought from the south of Europe have not given near so great an employ to our vessels as the same amount of capital invested in rags from thence would have done, if our paper manufacturers at home had been protected; for in this case the import of the manufactured paper would have been superseded by the rags, which would have been a great object of commercial attention.

Nor have our internal demands been usefully supplied. Paper is not only consumed for writing, but for books, maps, newspapers, prints, &c.; respectively requiring a particular style for the various orders, which these European papers could not meet, nor would have been used except from an extreme reduction of price; and they have in a measure retarded the advancement in our arts. When we place these considerations with that of their coming in direct interference with the whole system of our domestic industry and produce, the sacrifice of our improvement and labor with that of the very great expenditures and investments of mills, materials, and people, and every spirit of ambition to bring this business as an object under the security of a home market, we may fairly state the loss sustained not only to have been private but national.

Your memorialists, therefore, beg leave to call the attention of your honorable body to interpose for our relief.

We possess fully the means to supply the consumption of the United States with paper, the domestic saving of our own soil, which would otherwise be lost to the community, of a quality equal to that of any other country on earth, entirely adapted to every demand of use or elegance. That in a state of fair trade we will be able to export a considerable excess of manufactured paper to South America, and many other countries where the arts have not advanced as far as here. That, therefore, all foreign supply is not only unnecessary, but injurious. That it has offered not a fair rivalry, but to give overwhelming quantities of paper upon us, ordered upon speculation, and sold at auction, which has drawn off our wealth, and operated to the discouragement of the emulation and industry which would have arisen by the employment of our capitals at home.

The establishments which have been long in operation have afforded the public every advantage of competition, which has reduced the price of paper to the consumer as low as anywhere in the world; and were it even to advance, would tend to an improvement of the arts, and place them more on a footing with England and other nations, where printing, engraving, and other branches of science, tending to public education and improvement, are objects of national encouragement, from which the people derive so pre-eminent an advantage.

The district we represent offers, we think, a comparative view of the state of this manufacture in the country at large. In this there are erected seventy paper mills, which were in full operation until the importations after the late war; in these there were ninety-five paper vats, with a cost of establishments of about half a million of dollars, employing nine hundred and fifty persons at annual wages of two hundred and seventeen thousand dollars, consuming annually 2,600 tons of rags, value $260,000, and producing about $800,000 worth of paper a year; and from the causes we have mentioned we find now that there remain but seventeen vats at work, whose annual amount of wages is $45,000, and production $136,000; leaving unemployed seven hundred and seventy-five persons to seek other means of living, with a loss to the community of 2,128 tons of rags unconsumed, which would have produced a saving of $212,000 in raw materials, and a manufactured amount of $624,000.

Your memorialists cannot but state that the ruinous effects produced, as we have represented, would be as severely felt by the Government as ourselves, should it be found needful to rely upon national industry for support; and we cannot but bring into view the aid derived from the paper establishments, and the amount of the internal taxes collected during the war, when they were an availing source of income.

In this district, the mills then in active operation paid, at an average, two hundred dollars to two hundred and fifty annually, per vat; yielding together a revenue of twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars, when importations afforded none; and we conceive the Government may form an estimate of the loss to the country from that which the revenue would suffer between the income derived from ninety-five vats in full employ, and the aid afforded by the security of our home market, contrasted with that which would now accrue from seventeen vats existing under the depression from filling our market with the produce of foreign nations, which has shut up seventy-eight vats, left our employers and workpeople embarrassed and dispirited, while we have given our resources, the natural basis of our own support, toward the establishment of business, and the creation of revenues in the hands of nations who are the rivals of the country in its domestic as well as political advantages.

Your memorialists believe they have given a candid statement of the facts which they have brought before you; they can only rely upon the wisdom of the Government to guard its national interests. They believe their cause to be mutually involved with that of their country; it remains with its Government to prevent the extension of the present, or the recurrence of future calamities. Their business cannot remain as it is now situated; its advantages have left us, and the shadow of it only exists. They truly believe a protection granted to them protects thus far the property of the nation; that the policy adopted by the other Governments in this case would secure the same results to us which it has done to them; that it would render us independent at home, would employ and enrich the nation, and would give us a surplus value to export in barter for the products of foreign countries, useful and necessary to our wants.

Your memorialists propose a duty of twenty-five cents per pound on all writing, printing, and copper-plate papers, and fifteen cents per pound on all others.

Your memorialists remain with great respect.

By order of the society.

PROTECTION TO PRINTERS OF BOOKS.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 26, 1820.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The subscribers, inhabitants of the city of Philadelphia, beg leave to state that they are extensively engaged in the manufacture of printed books, a branch of business which has increased within a few years to such an extent as could not have been anticipated, and in which there is at this moment as much capital engaged as would suffice to answer the demand, were it to be increased to treble its present amount. As an evidence of this, they state the fact that there are no less than five Family Bibles, and numerous smaller Bibles and Testaments, kept constantly standing in type in this country; that a large Latin Dictionary has been recently stereotyped in Philadelphia, and an English one in New York; and refer also to the numerous extensive works lately published, or now in a course of publication, among which are Rees's, Gregory's, and Edinburgh Encyclopedias, the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews, Hume and Smollett's England, (three editions,) Gibbon's Rome, (two editions,) British Classics, British Poets, Ramsey's Universal History, &c. &c.; and also to the circumstance that there are five type foundries in the United States, capable of producing types to almost any extent.

It has attained its present height without the aid of high duties (the highest, except during the war, ever imposed, being 15 per cent.,) and would not now require protection against importations regularly made; but the present state of affairs in Great Britain having lessened the demand for books there, many persons in that country have been induced to turn their attention to the United States, to obtain a vent for their publications.

In consequence, there are great quantities, and of very inferior quality, sent out for the purpose of being disposed of in this country by subscription, deliverable in numbers, by which method the purchasers are deluded into a belief that they are obtaining them at lower prices than they could be procured of domestic manufacture; whereas the contrary is the fact. These books are disposed of by hawkers, (all of whom are foreigners, and pay nothing whatever for the support of the General or State Governments,) who are traversing the whole country, and obtaining subscribers to a great extent; thereby destroying the business of the regular trader, whether manufacturer or importer. They are frequently shipped to this country in such a fraudulent manner as to be passed at the custom-houses for little more than waste paper; one part or volume of a work being shipped to one port, and the remainder to another, thereby defrauding the revenue of almost the whole duty; the books being appraised as imperfect, and therefore of little value.

Your memorialists believe that it can only be necessary to state the fact, that, from the best information they can obtain, there have been recently imported not less than seven or eight hundred thousand numbers of a Family Bible, (while at the same time there were, as before stated, not less than five Family Bibles, one of movable types, and four of stereotype plates, existing in this country, with a capital sufficient to supply almost ten times the present demand for that book,) to convince you of the necessity of adopting a system that will give protection to this branch of manufactures, without which there will be a most deleterious effect produced upon it, which will very seriously affect the type founders, paper makers, printers, manufacturers of leather, bookbinders, gold-beaters, engravers, &c.; in all of which branches the supply is, we believe, fully equal to the demand.

Your memorialists believe that when your honorable body take into consideration the powerful effect produced in enlightening the great body of the community by the quantity and cheapness of books, manufactured in this country, compared with what would have been the effect had we been dependent upon Europe for our supplies, burdened with the expenses of freight, &c., and also that every article made use of in this business is entirely of domestic manufacture, and the great number of persons whose support depends wholly upon it, you cannot fail to see the propriety of securing the home market to those citizens who have embarked their capital in it, and who have displayed as much enterprise as any other part of the community, without exception.

Your memorialists, aware that you would feel indisposed to make any alteration that would be likely to be injurious to the cause of literature, and believing that their interests and those of literature are perfectly reconcilable, beg leave to propose a plan by which they believe both will be served. It is, that the present duty of fifteen per cent. on books be repealed; that, in lieu thereof, there be levied on them a specific duty of thirty-three and one-third cents per pound weight; and that, in order to give greater encouragement to the business of bookbinding, as well as to place the person who imports books in sheets, with a view of having them bound in this country, on an equal footing with those who import them bound, there be a duty of fifty per cent. upon the binding of whatever books are imported in that state.

This alteration will have the effect of excluding, almost entirely, the common articles, of which the means of production in this country are almost unlimited, and in the manufacture of which the competition is so great as to insure an ample supply at fair prices; and will, at the same time, admit at a fair rate of duty those books in the higher departments of literature and science, for which there is not yet a sufficient demand to warrant printing them. It will also have the effect, which is greatly to be desired, of preventing those frauds upon the revenue which have been practised to a very considerable extent, and will make all importers pay the same duty upon the same articles.

REMONSTRANCE AGAINST AN INCREASE OF DUTIES, &c.

[Communicated to the House, January 31, 1820.]

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned memorialists, merchants and inhabitants of Salem, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and of the towns in its vicinity, beg leave most respectfully to represent: That they have seen, with unfeigned regret and surprise, some propositions recently brought forward in Congress, and others advocated by respectable portions of the community, which, in their humble opinions, are calculated seriously to injure, if not eventually to destroy, some of the most important branches of the commerce and navigation of the United States. The memorialists have not the slightest intention of casting any imputation of unworthy motives upon those, from whom on this occasion they feel themselves compelled to differ in the most decided manner. They are ready to admit that many of those who were inclined to revive commercial prohibitions and restrictions, and to change some of the fundamental rules of our financial policy, are governed by motives solely suggested by their own views of the national interest. They are free also to admit that the manufacturing interests of the country deserve to receive the fostering care and patronage of the Government. But while they make these admissions, they also beg leave to suggest that the interests of commerce are not less vital to the welfare and prosperity of the Union than manufactures; and that it never can be a sound or safe policy to build up the one upon the ruins of the other. Under a wise and enlightened revenue system, the commerce of our country has hitherto advanced with a rapidity and force which have exceeded the most sanguine expectations of its friends. This commerce has contributed largely to the employment of the capital, the industry, and the enterprise of our citizens. It has quickened the march of agriculture, and, by increasing the value as well as amount of its products, has given to the planter and husbandman a reward in solid profit for their toils. It has also materially sustained the credit and finances of the nation, by insuring a regular and growing revenue through a taxation scarcely felt, and cheerfully borne by all classes of our citizens. It has also given birth to our naval power, by fostering a hardy race of seamen, and patronizing those arts which are essential to the building, preservation, and equipment of ships. It has greatly enlarged, and the memorialists had almost said created, the moneyed capital of the country. And the memorialists believe, that it cannot be too frequently or deeply inculcated as an axiom in political economy, that productive capital, in whatever manner added to the stock of the country, is equally beneficial to its best interests. Its real value can never be ascertained by the sources from whence it flows, but from the blessings which it dispenses. A million of dollars added to the productive capital by commerce is at least as useful as the same sum added by manufactures.

The benefits of the commerce of the United States, which have been enumerated, are not deduced from theoretical reasoning; they are established by thirty years' experience, since the Constitution was adopted. At that time our capital was small, and had suffered for a series of years a continual diminution. Our agriculture was depressed, and our finances were embarrassed. The changes, which a thrifty commerce during this period has contributed to produce, are so striking, that they scarcely require to be stated. There is not a single portion of the country that has not felt its beneficial influence. On the seaboard we have everywhere flourishing towns and cities, the busy haunts of industry, where the products of our soil are accumulated on their transit to foreign countries. In the interior, hundreds of towns have arisen, which but a few years since were desolate wastes or dreary forests. The agriculture of the old States has grown up and spread itself into a thousand new directions; and our cotton and our wheat, our tobacco and our provisions, are administering to the wants of millions, to whom even our very name was but a short time ago utterly unknown.

Remonstrance against an Increase of Duties.

The memorialists would respectfully ask, if it be not a part of the duty of a wise nation to profit by the lessons of experience? Is it just, is it salutary, is it politic, to abandon a course which has so eminently conduced to our welfare, for the purpose of trying experiments, the effect of which cannot be fully ascertained, which are founded upon mere theoretical doctrines, at best complex and questionable, and it may be, in practice, ruinous as well to morals as to property? Suppose it were practicable to arrest the present course of commerce, to narrow its limits, and even reduce it to the mere coasting trade of the nation; is it clear that the capital, thus withdrawn from commercial pursuits, could be as usefully or as profitably employed in any other branch of business? It is perfectly certain that such a change must be attended with severe losses to the merchants, and with ruin to numerous classes of our citizens, to our seamen and shipwrights, and other artisans, whose business depends on, or is connected with, commerce. Cases may possibly arise in which the interests of a respectable portion of the community may be justly sacrificed; but they are cases of extreme public necessity, not cases where the rivalry and the interest of one class of men seek to sustain themselves by destruction to another. In a free country too it may well be asked if it be a legitimate end of government to control the ordinary occupations of men, and compel them to confine themselves to pursuits in which their habits, their feelings, or their enterprise, forbid them to engage. While the manufacturers are left free to engage in their own peculiar pursuits, enjoying in common with others a reasonable protection from the Government, the memorialists trust it is no undue claim on their own part to plead for the freedom of commerce also, as the natural ally of agriculture and naval greatness. Nothing, however, can be more obvious than that many of the manufacturers and their friends are attempting, by fallacious statements, founded on an interested policy, or a misguided zeal, or very short-sighted views, to uproot some of the fundamental principles of our revenue policy, and to compel our merchants to abandon some of the most lucrative branches of commerce—branches which alone enable us to contend with success against the monopoly and the competition of foreign nations.

It is not a little remarkable, too, that these attempts, to which the memorialists allude, are not only repugnant to those maxims of free trade which the United States have hitherto so forcibly and perseveringly contended for as the sure foundation of national prosperity, but they are pressed upon us at a moment when the statesmen of the Old World, in admiration of the success of our policy, are relaxing the rigor of their own systems, and yielding themselves to the rational doctrine, that national wealth is best promoted by a free interchange of commodities, upon principles of perfect reciprocity. May the memorialists be permitted to say, that it would be a strange anomaly in America to adopt a system which sound philosophy is exploding in Europe; to attempt a monopoly of the home market, and yet claim an entire freedom of commerce abroad; to stimulate our own manufactures to an unnatural growth, by the exclusion of foreign manufactures, and yet to expect that no retaliatory measures would be pursued by other nations? If we are unwilling to receive foreign manufactures, we cannot reasonably suppose that foreign nations will receive our raw materials; we may force other nations to seek an inferior market for their productions, but we cannot force them to become buyers when they are not sellers, or to consume our cottons when they cannot pay the price in their own fabrics. We may compel them to use the cotton of the West Indies, or of the Brazils, or of the East Indies, or the wheat of the Mediterranean—an experiment in itself sufficiently dangerous to some of our most vital interests; but we cannot expect them to carry on with us a ruinous trade, when the profit is all on one side. Nations, like individuals, will pursue their own interests, and sooner or later abandon a trade, however fixed may be its habits, where there is no reciprocity of benefit.

There is another consideration which the memorialists would respectfully suggest, that is entitled, in their opinion, to great weight on questions of this nature; and that is, the dangers and inconveniences which fluctuations in the commercial policy of a nation unavoidably produce. The trade of a nation is of gradual growth, and forms its channels by slow and almost imperceptible degrees. Time and confidence, and protection and experience, are necessary to give it a settled course. It insinuates itself into the general commerce of the world with difficulty, and, when incorporated into the mass, its ramifications are so numerous and intricate, that they cannot be suddenly withdrawn, without immense losses and injuries. Even the temporary stoppage of but a single branch of trade throws thousands out of employment, and, by pressing the mass of capital and shipping which it held engaged in its service into other branches, it is sure to produce embarrassment and depression, and not unfrequently ruin to the shipholders and the merchants. Besides all this, men are slow to engage their capital in new pursuits. They have a natural timidity in embarking in enterprises to which they are not accustomed; and if the commercial policy of the nation is fluctuating, they feel so much insecurity in it that they are unwilling to yield themselves up even to prospects apparently inviting. No nation ever prospered in commerce until its own policy became settled, and the channels of its trade were worn deep and clear. It is to this state of things that the capitalist looks with confidence; because he may conclude that, if his profits are but small, they are subject to a reasonable certainty of calculation. Another state of things may suit the young and enterprising speculators; but it can never be safe for a nation to found its revenue upon a trade that is not uniform in its operations. The memorialists most sincerely believe that it is a sound political maxim, that the more free trade is, and the more widely it circulates, the more sure will be its prosperity and that of the nation. Every restriction, which is not indispensable for purposes of revenue, is a shoal which will impede its progress, and not unfrequently jeopard its security.

Having made these preliminary observations, which they cannot deem unworthy of the serious attention of the National Legislature, the memorialists now beg leave more particularly to call the attention of Congress to the measures which have been recently proposed, and apparently approved, for the purpose of prohibiting the introduction of foreign woollen and cotton goods, and, as auxiliary thereto, the abolition of drawbacks and credits upon the duties due upon goods imported into the United States; measures which, if adopted, will, in the opinion of the memorialists, bring a premature decay and a general distress upon the whole commercial and agricultural interests of the nation.

It has been suggested, both in and out of Congress, when measures have been heretofore proposed having a direct bearing upon commercial interests, that the silence of merchants ought justly to be considered as an acquiescence in the justice and policy of such measures. Truth compels the memorialists to say that the reverse has generally been the case. The merchants of our country have had a deep, and it is hoped not an ill-founded, confidence, in the firmness, the wisdom, and enlightened policy of Congress. They have not been prepared to suppose that old, and well-tryed, and successful systems would be abandoned, merely because they were assailed by those whose interest or whose mistaken zeal led them to plan their overthrow. They have believed (nor is it an idle or vain credulity) that our statesmen, selected from the whole community, would watch with anxiety and diligence over the interests of all; and that they would distinguish the natural biases of those whose judgments were blinded by a partial view of their own interests, from the just influences of superior political foresight, aided by the most comprehensive knowledge. On many occasions, therefore, in which their interests have been assailed, (and, as the memorialists think, injuriously assailed,) the merchants have been silent, not from indifference, but from confidence; not from a sense of propriety and justice, but from a proud belief that their interests were safe, when they were understood, and that the National Legislature could not be presumed to want knowledge or inclination to protect them. On the present occasion, however, so wide have been the exertions of the manufacturers, so plausible some of their statements, and so popular, though delusive, some of their doctrines, that the memorialists feel themselves called upon to resist them in the most serious manner, as injurious to the country, and to throw themselves upon the intelligence and firmness of the representatives of the nation to vindicate their rights.

The subjects of drawbacks and of credit upon duties are intimately connected in their general aspects, but, at the same time, admit of some distinct views, which may well entitle them to separate consideration. Both of them originated at the earliest period of our Government, and were incorporated into our first revenue laws. Both of them had the unequivocal approbation of our most enlightened statesmen of that day, and both of them have the sanction of nearly thirty years of experience in their favor. At no period of our political history, until the present, has any doubt been publicly breathed, at least to the knowledge of the memorialists, of their practical advantages; and during this whole period our commerce has been progressively increasing. Almost all commercial nations, too, have a system analogous to ours ingrafted into their revenue regulations. In all, it is believed, a discrimination is made between goods imported for home consumption, and those designed for exportation; and the duties on the latter are very trifling, especially when compared with the duties usually paid on the former. In respect to credit for duties, the known equivalent is the deposit of the goods in entrepot, and the duties are only paid after a limited period, or upon an eventual sale in the domestic market. In Great Britain, to whose system of revenue ours bears the strongest resemblance, imported goods are warehoused under the joint direction and keys of the Government and the owner, and the duties are in general paid when they are disposed of in the market. This system of deposit is exceedingly expensive, and onerous, and complicated, and requires large stores in every commercial city, and numerous officers, and is attended with injurious delay. Its object is to give the benefit of credit to the merchant; and it has that effect, but it is at a heavy expense to the Government. In this country the same object is obtained, at a very small expense, in a much more simple way; and, where the officers of the customs act with prudence and vigilance, the risk of loss to the Government, from the non-payment of the bonds, given with sureties, for the duties, is small—very small, indeed—compared with the expense of the other system. In the district of Salem and Beverly, the whole amount remaining unpaid on bonds for goods imported, from the origin of the Government to the present time, deducting the debentures due and unpaid on the same goods, is but $1,562 46; yet that district alone has furnished many millions to the revenue of the United States.

The fact, however, that in all foreign commercial nations, a credit is allowed for duties upon goods imported, and a drawback is allowed directly or indirectly upon exportation, seems to justify, in an eminent degree, the opinion that the system is useful to the public, and salutary to commerce. And the experience of this country is entirely in its favor. It may, then, with some confidence, be asked, why should it be changed? Why should we leave fact for conjecture, and hazard new experiments in cases where the great objects of the Government have been already attained? Why should we involve the immense manufacturing, agricultural, and other interests, connected directly with commerce, in distress or ruin, for the purpose of speculating in new schemes, ill adapted to the state of our country, and whose success is yet to be ascertained? It appears to the memorialists that it is incumbent on those who would lead the nation into such schemes, to demonstrate their wisdom and policy before they are adopted; and not, by arithmetical calculations, bottomed on visionary notions, to call upon the nation to reject the lights already furnished by its own experience.

But it may, perhaps, be inquired, what are the benefits derived to commerce from a credit upon duties? The memorialists are perfectly willing to state some of the leading benefits, public as well as private; for in this, as in almost all the like cases, public and private interests go hand in hand.

It will not be denied that the United States, even at the present time, does not, when compared with the great nations in Europe, abound in moneyed capital. This is in almost every nation a subject of slow accumulation, even under circumstances peculiarly favorable to its growth; but in a young nation the obstacles are generally great, from the character and various pursuits of the inhabitants, the extent of their wants, and the rivalry and superior advantages for its employment presented by flourishing nations. At the time when the United States adopted its system of credits and drawbacks on duties, its moneyed capital was very small; and the great policy of the Government was to give every facility for its full employment. It is obvious that the more capital is employed in commerce, the more extensive will be its reach, and the more revenue will be acquired by the Government. Whatever of capital, naturally flowing in this channel, is withdrawn from it and remains unemployed, is so much lost to the commerce of the country. The duties upon the importation of goods are, on an average, at least twenty-five per cent. of the value of those goods, or of the capital employed. It follows that, if this is immediately withdrawn from the funds of the merchant, it is so much loss of his commercial capital. A little detail will render this apparent. Whenever a voyage is undertaken, the merchant invests as much capital as he thinks necessary for the purchase of the goods to be imported, and also as much more as will be necessary to meet all the disbursements and expenses of the voyage. All this is paid in advance. When the goods are imported, they are not immediately sold. The market may be depressed, or the goods be of slow consumption, or not be adapted to the wants of this country, or be ultimately destined for a foreign market. In these cases, (and these are common cases,) it is obvious that no immediate sale can be made without great sacrifices—sacrifices which are wholly inconsistent with any profitable commerce. Even when sales are effected, they are rarely made for cash. A credit is almost universally allowed to the purchaser, varying according to the nature of the commodity and the demand in the market, from four to eight, and even twelve months. Under such circumstances, if a cash payment is required for the duties, it is obvious that the merchant must either, in anticipation of this demand, gradually withdraw from his other business a portion of his capital equal to the duties; or he must divert an equal portion ready to be employed in another voyage; or he must procure money upon credit from other sources, loaded with the payment of interest; or he must consent to make enormous sacrifices, by an immediate forced sale. If he be a prudent, cautious merchant, this very circumstance will operate to prevent him from employing his whole capital in commerce, lest he should be compelled to make ruinous sacrifices, or, by a mere temporary depression of the market, be exposed to the most painful embarrassments. It is with the express view of preventing this palsy upon commercial operations, that a credit upon duties has been allowed by the wise and great men who have hitherto governed our country; and this credit is carefully adjusted to the different portions of our trade, so as to form a credit equal, in a general view, to the time consumed and credit allowed before the merchant receives his money upon the sales of the goods upon which the specific duties have accrued.

In confirmation of this general statement, the memorialists would respectfully call the attention of Congress to the East India trade—a trade in which Salem has been long, and deeply, and successfully engaged; a trade, too, which, however, decryed by the misguided zeal of some, and the interested suggestions of others, has largely contributed to the revenue of the United States, and yields not in importance to any other branch of commerce. Voyages to the East Indies are undertaken at very heavy expense, and with proportionably large capitals. The goods that are brought home consist of articles either of such high prices, such slow consumption, or of such bulk and quantity, as require a considerable length of time before they can be sold at a reasonable profit, and the money actually realized upon the sale. The home market, too, for many of these goods, is so limited, that, ultimately, a re-exportation to Europe becomes indispensable; and, after a second voyage, thus undertaken, the proceeds find their way, by a circuitous remittance, to England; and then again, before the merchant can realize his funds, he must have notice of the remittance, and be able to sell his exchange at a reasonable rate in the market. It is not uncommon for cargoes designed for home consumption to remain on hand for six months, and sometimes a twelvemonth; and when sales are effected, the usual credit is from four to eight and twelve months. So that, even with the credit for duties allowed in this trade, it usually happens that the first and second instalments become due before the proceeds of the sales have been realized, and, not unfrequently, before the cargoes have been finally disposed of. Yet the duties on these voyages are exceedingly heavy, amounting, in some cases, to $100,000; a sum which even our wealthiest merchants could not readily advance, and which would materially check even their commercial expeditions. It is not too much to declare that, in all probability, an abolition of the credit of duties would immediately occasion a diminution of the East India trade one-quarter part, and, of course, occasion a proportionate diminution of our revenue, and of employment to those whose bread is as hardly earned, and whose lives are as dear, and whose welfare is as important to the country, as those of the manufacturers, who seek to found their own fortunes upon the ruins of this commerce.

Some of the ill effects which would result from the abolition of this credit will be obvious to the most careless observer. There is no pretence to say that there is a superabundance of moneyed capital in our country. The universal opinion proclaims, in a manner too audible and too distinct to be misunderstood, that much of the public distress arises from a deficiency of capital. The first effect, therefore, of the abolition of this credit, would be a diminution of active capital engaged in trade, and yielding a profit. It would be hoarded up to meet the anticipated demands of the Government for accruing duties. The revenue would, as has been already intimated, immediately suffer. But other evils, of a still graver cast, would ensue. Men of small capitals could no longer engage in trade, and least of all in a trade where the voyages were long and the returns slow. Capitalists, and they alone, could successfully carry on the great branches of commerce; and in their hands it would become a monopoly, which they might wield and manage at their own pleasure. The young and enterprising merchants would be crushed in their attempts at competition, and would be compelled to navigate only in those narrow channels where trade almost stagnates, or yields a scanty subsistence. Another necessary result would be the enhancement of the prices of all foreign articles of domestic consumption. The merchant would charge an interest and profit upon every advance made to the Government in the shape of duties; and thus the consumer, upon whom all such charges ultimately fall, would pay these additional charges, together with the enhanced price, which a smaller importation, with an equal demand, would necessarily produce. These are evils of no ordinary magnitude; and it is confidently believed that no wise Legislature would introduce them upon mere speculations, thus taxing the whole for the conjectural benefit of the few.

In respect to drawbacks, some additional considerations seem necessary to be stated, inasmuch as the subject has been greatly misunderstood by some of those who advocate their abolition. The drawback of duties is allowed upon importations of goods into the country, which are re-exported within a year from the time of their entry. The object of the system is to increase the navigation and commerce of the country, by securing to our citizens a carrying trade, between distant and foreign nations, in commodities which are either unsuitable to our market, or of which a great surplus is imported. In every such case, the Government derives a direct revenue of two and one-half per cent. on the duties of the re-exported goods; this amount being always retained. This is a positive benefit to the Government. It is obvious that, if no drawback were allowed upon such re-exportation, no surplus beyond the consumption would ever be imported; for, upon such re-exportation, the goods would be loaded with the whole duty, and the merchant could not afford to sell them so cheap in the foreign market, by the full amount of that duty, which would much exceed the whole profit reasonably to be expected upon the goods. Under such circumstances, the shipping and capital of foreign merchants would be exclusively engaged in the carrying trade, and all the benefits of an increased employment for our seamen, our shipwrights, and our ships, including freight and profits, would be entirely lost. This is stated upon the supposition that such a trade could not be carried on, except circuitously, and after an actual importation into the United States; and this is regularly true in respect to the whole trade with the British East Indies, with which we are not permitted to carry on any trade direct to Europe, but are compelled, by treaty, first to land the goods in the United States.

In respect to the other portions of the carrying trade, the abolition of drawbacks would immediately lead to a direct trade between foreign ports, whenever foreign nations would permit our merchants to engage in it. This would compel them to equip, repair, and man their ships in Europe, and thus to give all their disbursements in this great trade to foreigners. No goods would be imported into the United States, either from Europe or India, which were not indispensable for our consumption; and this diminished supply of the home market would increase speculation, and tend to produce, in a very great degree, alternating fluctuations from a depressed to a high market. Commercial adventures would be thereby rendered more hazardous and precarious, since the foreign market would be ordinarily cut off after an importation into the United States; and if, at any moment, the foreign market should happen to be so high as to justify an exportation, an artificial scarcity, far beyond what now can ever arise, would immediately ensue in the United States. The abolition of drawbacks would, in this view, operate as a direct tax upon the consumers in this country. It would diminish the productive revenue, and give a foreign character to our seamen and commerce, instead of concentrating both as their home in the bosom of the country. Nor should it be forgotten how highly important the carrying trade has hitherto been, and how much it has increased our moneyed capital. During the years 1802, 1803, and 1804, the drawbacks allowed, on an average of these years, considerably exceeded a quarter part of the duties secured to the Government; in the succeeding years, 1805, 1806, and 1807, they constituted more than a third of the whole duties. So that, on an average of these six years, the last three of which were the most prosperous years of our commerce, the carrying trade constituted nearly one-third of our whole foreign commerce. And although this carrying trade be now, from the general state of the world, somewhat diminished, yet it still remains one of the most lucrative branches of our commerce, and yields a steady revenue to the Government. Under this aspect of the subject, the memorialists would respectfully inquire whether the abolition of drawbacks would not be disastrous to the most important interests of our country, and dry up some of the best sources of our national glory as well as national wealth? Let it be considered, also, that the policy of all commercial nations has uniformly dictated the same course, and that drawbacks, or their equivalent, are uniformly held out as an encouragement to importations, and thus the supply is always kept considerably above the domestic consumption, and enterprise and industry are protected and rewarded. Will America be the first to abandon a policy by which she has so greatly profited? At the very moment when her commerce is gasping for life, from the accumulated competitions of foreign nations, zealous for their own interests, will she aid the blows aimed at its existence, and consign it to a premature destruction?

The next subject to which the memorialists would respectfully ask the attention of Congress, is a measure very pertinaciously and zealously advocated by manufacturers and their friends—they mean the entire prohibition, either directly, or by duties equivalent to a prohibition, of the importation of cotton and woollen goods. That the tariff of duties now existing is singularly favorable to manufactures, the memorialists had supposed would have been freely admitted. Whatever articles are useful for domestic manufactures pay but a trivial duty; whatever articles can be wrought here are loaded with a heavy duty, varying from fifteen to thirty per cent. ad valorem. The duty upon East India cottons is indeed enormous, and practically amounts to a total prohibition. The coarser fabrics of cotton in the British East Indies cost about six cents a square yard, and were formerly imported in large quantities into the United States, and supplied the poorer classes of citizens with necessary though humble clothing. The tariff directs all such cottons to be estimated at the cost of twenty-five cents per square yard, and levies upon them, therefore, a duty of one hundred per cent., or a sum equal to their original cost. During the years 1802, 1803, and 1804, the average imports from the British East Indies were about three millions and a half of dollars; of which a little short of three millions were goods paying ad valorem duties, being principally white cotton goods. In 1807, the goods paying ad valorem duties, imported from the same places, had increased to upwards of four millions of dollars. In the same year fifteen ships were employed in this trade from the town of Salem alone. In the past year two only have been so employed, and, for the four years last past, no cotton piece goods have been imported into this town for home consumption; the duty alone amounting to a prohibition. The sacrifice of this branch of our trade alone has very seriously affected the whole mercantile community engaged in East India commerce, and has nowhere been more sensibly or injuriously felt than in Salem. It has operated, too, as an excessive tax upon the poorer classes of the community, who have been compelled to buy domestic fabrics to supply their wants, at higher prices, which their narrow means could ill afford. It has also annually struck off from the revenue of the Government the whole duty upon seven-eighths of the importations of East India cottons; that proportion having been absorbed by the domestic consumption. The loss to our ship owners, and seamen, and commercial artisans, has been proportionably great. And the memorialists cannot refrain from expressing their decided convictions, that this sacrifice was not called for by the public interests, but was a liberal indulgence granted for the exclusive benefit of the manufacturers, and pressed upon the nation by their importunate solicitations. However painful this measure was, it was borne in silence, under the hope that experience would one day establish the propriety of its repeal, and that the zeal of the manufacturers would be satisfied with the destruction of one branch of commerce, and the heavy duties imposed upon all others.

These expectations, however, have not been realized; and the memorialists now learn, with regret, that one sacrifice is to be demanded after another, and one prohibition heaped upon another, by the friends of manufactures, until all the sources of foreign commerce are dried up, and domestic manufactures sustained, by enormous bounties, absorb the whole moneyed capital of the nation. The memorialists would most respectfully, but most solemnly, protest against the policy and the justice of such measures.

And what are the claims, the memorialists beg leave respectfully to ask, of any class of our citizens, to throw such enormous burdens upon the other classes of the community? Is the agricultural interest nothing? Is the commercial interest nothing? Are the interest of the public and its revenues nothing? The cotton and woollen trade is already loaded with twenty and twenty-five per cent. duties; and if there be added the freight and charges upon importation, the domestic manufactures have now an encouragement of the profit of from thirty to thirty-five per cent. more than the European manufacturers possess, if the same art can be manufactured as cheap at home as abroad. In respect to the East India cotton trade, the encouragement is still more striking; the duties upon the coarsest fabrics in that trade amounting, as has been already seen, to one hundred per cent. upon the original cost. And if cotton and woollen goods cannot be manufactured here and sold as cheap, with all these differences of duty in their favor, does it not establish the conclusion that such manufactures are not the natural growth of our present situation, and are not adapted to the physical, and moral, and happy condition of the people? Why should the farmer, and the planter, and the merchant, and the mechanics, and the laboring classes of the community, be taxed for the necessities of life a sum equal to more than one-quarter part of their whole expenditures on these objects, that the manufacturers may put this sum into their own pockets?

The memorialists are no enemies to manufactures; but they most sincerely express it as their deliberate judgment that no manufactures ought to be patronized in the country which will not grow up and support themselves in every competition in the market, under the ordinary protecting duty; that the only manufactures which can ultimately flourish here are those which are of slow growth and moderate profit, such as can be carried on by capitalists with economy and steadiness; and that a change of system, which should suddenly introduce great profits, by encouraging undue speculation, and the expectation of inordinate gain, would end in the deepest injuries even to manufacturing establishments. The history of the cotton manufactories in New England completely demonstrates the truth of these positions. They grew up gradually, under the protection of our ordinary duties, in a time of peace, and were profitable to those engaged in them. But when the embargo and non-importation systems produced a deficiency in the foreign supply, a feverish excitement was produced; manufactories were established without sufficient capital; extravagant expenditures in buildings and machinery followed; for a while the demand was great, and the profits high, but, upon the return of the ordinary state of things, many of these establishments sunk, one after another, and involved their owners in ruin. And such, in the opinion of the memorialists, would be the scene acted over again in a few years, if the manufacturers could now succeed in accomplishing their present objects. For a short time their establishments would flourish; but in a free country like ours, there would be a reaction of the other great interests of the community, and the national distress and national policy would soon require a repeal of the monopolizing system. A moderate protecting duty is the best support of domestic manufactures, for the very reason that it may be safely calculated on as permanent. It may not encourage speculation, but it will encourage the employment of capital, as fast as safety and a reasonable profit are connected with it.

Nor will the high prices and eventual insecurity to domestic manufactures be the only evils attendant upon this prohibitory system. It will encourage smuggling and frauds to an extent truly formidable, and never yet practised in our country; and the same effect will arise, though in a more limited degree, from the abolition of drawbacks and credit on duties. The utter impossibility of suppressing frauds and smuggling, where the markets are very high, and the prohibitions very extensive, has been demonstrated by the experience of all Europe. During the most rigorous enforcement of the continental exclusion of British manufactures, aided by civil vigilance, and military bayonets, and despotic power, these manufactures found their way into every part of Europe, from the cottage to the throne. Great Britain herself, insulated as she is, and with a naval force adequate to every object, has not been able to suppress smuggling. Prohibited goods find their way into the United Kingdom, notwithstanding the vigilance of her custom-houses, and the unwearied jealousy of her manufacturers. In the United States, with a thousand miles of seacoast, indented with innumerable bays and harbors, how can it be reasonably expected that the temptations to illicit traffic will not soon outweigh the habits of obedience to the laws, especially when those laws shall become odious, as the supposed instruments of one class to oppress another? Hitherto our country has exhibited a spectacle not unworthy of a free people. Frauds upon the revenue have been comparatively few; and smuggling has been repressed by the general sense of the mercantile community. What system could be more disastrous than that which should hold out permanent temptations to smuggling, connected with a sense of the impolicy and injustice of the laws? The memorialists believe that one of the first objects of legislation is to become auxiliary to the preservation of the morals of the people, by interfering as little as possible with pursuits consonant with their habits and feelings, lawful in their objects, and adapted to their wants.

Upon the whole, the memorialists would respectfully state their unequivocal opinion, that all the measures to which they have alluded are calculated to impair our naval strength and glory; to injure our most profitable commerce; to diminish, in an alarming degree, the public revenue; to promote unjustifiable speculation; to enhance the prices of manufactures; to throw the great business and trade of the nation into the hands of a few capitalists, to the exclusion of the industrious and enterprising of other classes; to introduce general distress among commercial artisans and agriculturists; to aggravate the present distress of the other classes of the community; to provoke and extend an undue appetite for fraud and smuggling; and, in fine, to destroy many of the great objects for which the Constitution of the United States was originally framed and adopted.

The memorialists, therefore, most respectfully ask the interposition of Congress to prevent these great evils, and to promote the general good, by a perseverance in that system, under the protection of which our commerce, and navigation, and agriculture have flourished; a system, conceived in political wisdom, justified by experience, and approved by the soundest maxims of national economy.

SALEM, January, 1820.

PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN COTTON AND WOOLLEN FABRICS, AND IRON.

[Communicated to the House, February 1, 1820.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 27, 1820.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th instant, directing the Secretary of the Treasury "to inform the House what reduction, in his opinion, it will make in the revenue, if the importation of cotton and woollen manufactures, and iron, be prohibited; and in what manner the deficit in the revenue may be supplied, should the prohibition be made;" I have the honor to submit statements of the amount of revenue which accrued from those articles from the year 1815 to 1818, inclusive.

The very great difference in the amount of revenue which accrued during those years renders it difficult to determine what the reduction would be, should the prohibition be enforced. It is probable that the deficiency, for a number of successive years, would amount to the average sum of six millions of dollars.

If an increase of the rate of duty would necessarily augment the revenue in the same proportion, the deficiency might be readily supplied. But reason and experience forbid the expectation of such a result, the importation of foreign merchandise is regulated by the capacity of the importing country to pay an equivalent for them. Any increase of duty diminishes this capacity. When carried to an extreme, it amounts to prohibition. But the revenue will frequently be diminished by an increase of duty, when the consumption of the article is not diminished. Whenever the duty is raised so high as to equal the risk incurred by an attempt to introduce dutiable articles illicitly, smuggling, upon an extensive and systematic plan, commences. In that case, not only their consumption, but the capacity to pay for them, may be increased, whilst the revenue may be diminished.

Considering the facilities which the extent of our coasts and frontiers, and the numerous harbors, bays, inlets, and rivers, by which they are indented, furnish for the illicit introduction of foreign merchandise, the settled policy of the Government has been to diminish, as far as practicable, the temptation which high duties would furnish to take advantage of these facilities. Should the existing duties be considerably raised, there is just ground to apprehend that the revenue will be reduced rather than augmented by the change. Indeed, there is just reason to believe that, with the present rate of duty, the practice of smuggling is gradually increasing. Any attempt to raise the deficiency which will be produced by the prohibition under consideration, by an increase of duty upon the articles which will still be imported, will greatly increase the expense of collection, by the necessity which it would create to employ a greater number of officers of the customs to guard against smuggling, and eventually fail to augment the revenue to the required extent. The principal reliance for supplying the deficiency which would be produced by the adoption of the measure contemplated by the resolution, must, it appears to me, be placed in a system of internal duties or direct tax.

In aid of either of these modes of augmenting the revenue, a small addition might be made upon the rate of duty now paid upon linens, manufactures of hemp, stuff goods, coffee, brown sugar, teas, wines, molasses, spices, and other small articles. If a system of internal duties should be deemed at this time advisable, an entire prohibition of ardent spirits might be adopted without material injury to the revenue, and with manifest advantage to the agricultural interest. In that event, the revenue which has been heretofore received from the duties imposed upon foreign spirits might be collected from domestic spirits.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.
Secretary of the Treasury.

The Honorable SPEAKER
Of the House of Reps.

A statement of the duties arising on imported merchandise paying an ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent. to the 30th June, 1819, of which woollens and cottons form almost the exclusive articles, for the years 1815, 1816, 1817, and 1818, with the amount of drawback annually paid on re-exportation.

YEARS.	Amount of duties.	Amount of drawback.	Net amount of duties.
1815 - -	$17,813,277	$189,768	$17,623,509

1818 - -	6,753,008	534,307	6,218,701

NOTE.—The Treasury records do not afford any means of ascertaining the amount of duties, so as to distinguish woollens from the various descriptions of cottons, whether from India or Europe; nor of cotton yarns from cotton piece goods.

*Balances in the Treasury—Public Debt.BALANCES IN THE TREASURY—PUBLIC DEBT.

[Communicated to the House, February 3, 1820.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 24, 1820.

SIR: In obedience to sundry resolutions of the House of Representatives of the 17th instant, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report, first, the actual balances in the Treasury, and in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent of the Navy and War Departments, and the amount of any subject to the control of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, on the first day of January, 1820; second, the principles upon which the receipts into the Treasury from the sales of the public lands for the year 1820 have been estimated; and, third, what amount of the public debt will be redeemable, according to the terms of the contract, in the years 1820, 1821, 1822, 1823, and 1824; and what amount would be left of the Sinking Fund in each year respectively after payment of the interest of the public debt, and the portion of the principal which may be redeemable within the year; I have the honor to submit two statements, marked A. and B.

If the payments for public lands are made when they fall due, the greatest accuracy might be attained in estimating the receipts into the Treasury from the sales previously made. So far as the receipts would be affected by sales made during the year embraced by the estimate, it would necessarily be conjectural. But, as the purchasers are subject to no penalty for delay of payment until the expiration of five years from the date of the sale, except the payment of interest, a general want of punctuality everywhere prevails. The sums which ought to be paid at the end of the second, third, and fourth years, are more generally paid in the fifth year.

If the indulgence which, since the year 1809, has been uniformly extended to the purchasers of the public land, had not grown into a system, it would be practicable to determine with sufficient accuracy the amount of the receipts into the Treasury during any year, so far as they depended upon sales previously made, after the principal land offices had been opened for five years. The debt contracted by the purchase of lands in any given year would not materially differ from the sum which would be receivable during the fifth year after it was contracted. But the frequent and general indulgence which has been extended to the purchasers of the public land has rendered the application of this rule for estimating the receipts into the Treasury from that source of the revenue entirely nugatory. The payment of interest is, in fact, under this system of indulgence, the principal inducement to the punctual discharge of the instalments as they become due, or at any later period. As the use of money is generally worth more than legal interest, where the payments are made, the want of punctuality will probably become more general. In estimating the probable receipts into the Treasury during the year 1820, more reliance has been placed upon the quantity of land which will within the year be offered at public sale, than upon the sums which may be payable during that period on account of sales previously made.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

The Hon. SPEAKER of the Ho. of Representatives.

REMONSTRANCE AGAINST A CHANGE IN THE REVENUE SYSTEM.

[Communicated to the Senate, February 8, 1820.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled :

The undersigned, merchants and inhabitants of Baltimore, beg leave to present to your honorable body the sentiments which they anxiously entertain on the proposed measure of discontinuing credit on import duties and denying drawbacks on duties.

Your memorialists contemplate the proposed change with concern; and they would, indeed, view any such projected innovation with alarm if they did not believe that the mercantile interest is under watchful and wise control in your honorable body. A lenient system of imposts on foreign commerce is, in the opinion of your memorialists, not only conducive to active commerce, but also favorable to the public revenue: and under such a system the commerce of the United States has flourished, and the national Treasury has been enriched. For a course which hitherto has richly and faithfully answered every object of the laws, and every demand which the fiscal policy has made upon commerce, it is now proposed to substitute a system at once experimental, harsh, and precarious. Under the existing terms of the collection of duties, the United States have surely experienced but little cause for discontent; and your memorialists can, with the most confident anticipation, declare, that fewer evasions of law and fewer defaults in payment have taken place under the present system than what will occur under the rigid and peremptory conditions to which that system is proposed to be contracted. The exaction of duties hitherto, on principles liberal and prudent, and gradual and gentle in its operation, has afforded to industrious commercial enterprise the patronage which judicious policy owes to it. Such a patronage is vitally due to it in a country whose energies are excited and cultivated by commerce, whose power is in so great a degree the fruit of commerce, whose rank among nations owes to it so much of its elevation. The policy which pervades our present code of duties contemplates and adopts meritorious enterprise as part of the national wealth, and, viewing a free and extended commerce as the most bountiful source of revenue, and surest means of power, does not consecrate the field of commerce to the capitalist, and make it the monopoly of the rich.

The policy which now dignifies our system of duties assumes that principle of sterling truth, that all duties on imports are taxes on consumption; and hence, how fair and important is it that some time should be granted to the importer to convey to the consumer the articles of importation. Not only the custom, but the very nature of commerce requires, in almost every instance of sale, that at least some term of credit shall be afforded to the purchaser; and hence, some period must be allowed to the importer to levy the tax for the United States, and some estimate ought to be made by our system of revenue of the delay of sales. In few or no cases does the credit on the duty exceed the period within which the capital can be realized, or recovered from suspense.

In the terms of those duties upon which a drawback is paid, the principle to which your memorialists allude appears to receive a more distinct and marked respect. The duty originally charged is there only contingent upon the stay and consumption of the articles in the country, and the term of credit there extended by the United States is the period to the importer for ascertaining whether they shall be appropriated for consumption or exported to a foreign quarter. Duties in these cases being thus contingent in the eye of our revenue policy, a credit is here not so much an indulgence to the importer as a necessary sequel from the nature of the duty. Must, then, all principle be here violated, and the intolerable severity be here prescribed by Government to the importer, that he shall enjoy no credit, however natural and essential an attendant it be on the duty charged against his importation? Your memorialists do believe as a maxim, safe as a guide, and propitious wherever it is applied, that not only by the dictate of the law, but, in every construction of policy, duties are emphatically a lien on the articles subjected to them; they attach to them, and should be gathered from them.

Where, in the collection of duties, the United States surrender to the importer the specific articles, their claim against him is not then embarked upon the conscience or substance of the individual importer; but two additional pledges are involved in the responsibility. Their means are bound, and the assurance of their character is given, all tributary to the demand of the United States. Interwoven with this strong defence, is that preferred claim which the United States has against the property of its debtor, a supreme prerogative lien, which thus furnishes a security calculated to elevate the United States almost above the danger of loss. The necessity which binds every importer to give to the Government such a security, while their discretion in considering it is unrestricted, would seem to be a sufficient guard against all importations destined for sacrifice, or to aid any wanton schemes of private finance; and your memorialists can scarcely imagine that, for premeditated sacrifice, any goods have been imported into this country. Your memorialists cannot conceive that, where a three-fold security, in fortune and commercial reputation, is required by the United States, as preliminary to the credit on duties, the indulgence of credit could prompt or facilitate any importations not in the course of honest industry. Commerce always tends to extremes; excesses of trading occur under all systems and in the freest periods of commercial prosperity. But if importation does sometimes swell until business stagnates, commerce has a power of self-correction and the resource of self-recovery, and reverses soon allay the intemperate ambition of gain.

Your memorialists need not, however, dwell upon the inherent energies of commerce, and its ebbs and flows; nor show how certainly, by the salutary force of experience and competition, it is soon shorn of all inordinate adventure, built upon desperate or fanciful speculation. The present system of duties, although its indulgence, or rather its equity, is so necessary an auxiliary to the small commercial capital of the United States, has connived at and contributed to none of the irregularities of our commerce. All that have occurred may be explained by the late history of Europe, or traced to the very spirit of commerce itself, since fluctuation and irregularity are inseparable from its life and motion. Restriction may make commerce of smooth and uniform surface, but it cannot be so without being sluggish and shallow; and until commerce be so tamed by restriction and embarrassment, and become the privilege of the wealthy, it will be subject to irregularity and this inequality of character. Young as our country is, and far from being endowed with abundant commercial capital, the necessary consequence of the proposed alteration in the payment of the duties will be to consign commerce to the grasp of a few, expelling from the franchise of commerce, as it will, those who have but moderate means, although they be annexed to character and enterprise. This revolution in our revenue system will limit commerce to the circle of the capitalists; and commerce, the basis and pride of our fame, will dwindle into the diminutive condition, and fade into the pitiful character of a monopoly! Witness the fate of Spain! What if goods do now occasionally accumulate inordinately, and if regular calculating industry sometimes suffers by the careless sacrifices made by wanton speculators; will not the consumer, the whole mass of society, be subjected to severe and painful terms under the new system? Is there not more enormity in the danger that exorbitant prices will then be dictated by the select importers than ground of rational regret that prices have sunk while the existing system has prevailed? This is one of the sure results of the proposed change, and, though there be a pause in business now, commerce will ever be partial and inadequate then.

There is, indeed, one palliative against all restrictions which press on the very nerve of commerce, and, though the refuge be a profane one, your memorialists appeal to human nature, and the history of the commercial world, whether it be not certainly and invariably the resource, where commerce is severely confined. Your memorialists here allude to the practice of smuggling; and they make this allusion not only under perfect conviction, but with feelings of alarm. Your memorialists call on your honorable body to consider how far the universal fidelity of this country to the revenue law has been commensurate with the interest of the mercantile community, and with their sense of justice; and, though your memorialists do not mean to identify mercantile virtue with interest, yet, with many, even the justice of Government is measured by calculations of interest! Your memorialists beg you to reflect whether the proposed severity will not instigate delinquency; whether the revenue laws will not, in many instances, be evaded, with all the serious consequences of such criminality, not only to the national morals, but also to the national Treasury.

Unless the United States can make a discrimination in the amount of duties between citizens and foreigners, no change in the terms of payment can ever exclude foreigners from competing with citizens, whenever such privileges belong to them. But they enter into the crowd of competition, and competition always regulates its own wholesome extent. Your memorialists on this point think it indisputable that the introduction of foreign capital into our country, by this foreign participation in our trade, has been of essential benefit—an important aid in the present inadequate amount of our own commercial capital.

Your memorialists beg you to reflect earnestly and feelingly on the subject of discontinuing drawbacks on duties, and to remember that the advantage of drawback is emphatically our license for conducting a carrying trade. It is to the benefits of this branch of trade that the United States principally owes all that rapid advancement which is at all attributable to commerce, and to this that it has hitherto been indebted for its pecuniary abilities. To extinguish drawbacks is at once a sentence of banishment against American merchants from a commercial sphere of the greatest national and individual profit. If the United States thus deprives us of all that remains to us of our former greatness in this branch of commerce, but a miserable fragment of commerce will continue to the American people! To abolish drawback will have this fatal effect; for what shall we meet but inevitable loss, if we venture into the competition of a foreign market with goods loaded with the gross duty, of which, by the judicious policy of our present system, we are now disencumbered? The question of drawback is indeed a vital question, and involves the vocation and prosperity of thousands whose pursuits, during a long and brilliant lapse of time, have been tributary to the treasure and renown of the Union.

When your memorialists consider that the present system of duties has pressed leniently upon American commerce, and has yet been richly and faithfully productive to the United States; when we consider that the proposed change of making duties payable in cash will imprison commerce within the limits of a dictatorial monopoly, whose members will by their wealth be constituted the representatives of the once universal American commerce; when we consider that the consumers, the great body of society, will be subjected to oppressive terms, which give an unfair proportion to their labor and their relation to the Government—when all this is, to the minds of your memorialists, the certain offspring of this paralyzing change, your memorialists ask you, not only in justice but humanity—not as the patrons of commerce, but as friends of your country—to forbear from this innovation.

Your memorialists, viewing the abolition of drawbacks as an excommunication from a trade which yielded so much to enrich and distinguish us, and which, in many points, does not in the remotest degree conflict with any imaginable views of domestic policy, cannot but consider the discontinuance of drawback as a useless privation to the United States of commercial benefit, and a work of ruin to the individuals who depend on that trade which is fostered by the indulgence of drawback.

BANKS AND THE CURRENCY.

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, February 24, 1820.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 12, 1820.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives, passed on the 1st of March, 1819, directing "the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to Congress, at an early period in the next session, a general statement of the condition of the Bank of the United States and its offices, similar to the return made to him by the bank; and a statement, exhibiting, as nearly as may be practicable, the amount of capital invested in the different chartered banks in the several States and the District of Columbia, the amount of notes issued by those banks and in circulation, the public and private deposits in them, the amount of loans and discounts made by them and remaining unpaid, and the total quantity of specie they possess; and, also, to report such measures as, in his opinion, may be expedient to procure and retain a sufficient quantity of gold and silver coin in the United States, or to supply a circulating medium, in place of specie, adapted to the exigencies of the country, and within the power of the Government," I have the honor to submit the subjoined report and statements.

Statement A exhibits the condition of the Bank of the United States and its offices on the 30th of September, 1819.

Statement B exhibits the amount of bank capital authorized by law during the years 1814, 1815, 1816, and 1817. As this statement is founded upon the applications made to the Treasury under the acts imposing stamp duties, it is believed to be substantially correct. The average dividends upon which the stamp duty was paid, during those years, amounted to about seven and a half per cent. upon the nominal amount of capital; it is, however, a matter of general notoriety that the dividends upon bank capital actually paid exceeded that rate. If it is assumed that the dividends declared, and upon which the duty was paid, amounted during those years to ten per cent., then the capital actually paid in the year 1817, instead of being more than $125,000,000, as it is exhibited in statement B, will be found to be about $94,000,000; but, when it is recollected that, after the first payment required by the charters of the different banks, they have generally gone into operation, it is probable that a considerable proportion of the remaining payments have added nothing to their active capital. This fact being assumed, and a deduction being made of the amount of permanent accommodation enjoyed by the stockholders, in their respective banks, the active bank capital of the United States may be fairly estimated at a sum not exceeding $75,000,000. That these deductions ought to be made, in an attempt to ascertain the real amount of bank capital, cannot, it is presumed, be contested. If a stockholder to the amount of $10,000 has a permanent accommodation in the bank of $8,000, he has, in fact, but $2,000 of capital in the bank. This is equally true when a portion of his subscription has been paid with his own note, however well endorsed; so long as the note remains unpaid, it adds nothing to the real capital of the bank.

Such, it is believed, has been the process by which the capital of most of the banks has been formed, which have been incorporated since the commencement of the late war. Since that period, banks have been incorporated, not because there was capital seeking investment; not because the places where they were established had commerce and manufactures which required their fostering aid; but because men without active capital wanted the means of obtaining loans, which their standing in the community would not command from banks or individuals having real capital and established credit. Hence the multiplicity of local banks, scattered over the face of the country, in particular parts of the Union, which, by the depreciation of their paper, have levied a tax upon the communities within the pale of their influence exceeding the public contributions paid by them.

Statement C presents the condition of the State banks from which returns have been received, or have been transmitted by the Secretaries of State of different States, in conformity with the request of the Treasury Department. By comparing this statement with statement B, it will be perceived that it is very imperfect. Independently of the banks which have been created since the year 1817, it will be discovered that bank capital to the amount of more than $18,000,000, comprehended in statement B, is not embraced in it. As the amount of bank capital exhibited in statement C is $72,000,000, and its specie $9,828,000, the whole specie possessed by the State banks may be estimated at $12,250,000; if to this sum be added the specie in the possession of the Bank of the United States and its offices, the specie capital of all the banks in the United States may be estimated at $15,500,000. There are no means of ascertaining, with any degree of precision, the amount of specie in circulation; it is probable, however, that it does not exceed $4,500,000. Assuming this amount to be nearly correct, the whole metallic currency of the Union may be estimated at $20,000,000. Applying the same rule for ascertaining the circulation of the banks not embraced by statement C which has been employed to determine their specie, the whole amount of bank notes in circulation may be estimated at $46,000,000. It is probable, however, that this estimate is too high, as, according to the general practice of banks, all notes issued are considered in circulation, which are not in the possession of the bank by which they were issued. A reasonable deduction being made from the notes supposed to be in circulation, but which are, in fact, in the possession of other banks, it is probable that the actual circulation, both of paper and specie, is less at this time than $45,000,000. By the same mode of calculation, the whole amount of discounts may be estimated at $156,000,000.

The destruction or loss of the returns made to the Treasury before the year 1816, by the banks in which the public money was deposited, prevents any satisfactory comparison being drawn between their condition before and since that period. Comparative statements, however, have been received from sixteen banks in different parts of the Union, showing their situation on the 30th day of September, in the years 1813, 1815, and 1819. By statement D, it appears that those banks, at the first period, with a capital of $6,903,262, and with $3,059,149 of specie in their vaults, circulated $6,845,344 of their notes, and discounted to the amount of $12,990,975; at the second period their capital was $8,852,371, specie $1,693,918, circulation $9,944,757, and discounts $15,727,118; and at the third period their capital was $9,711,960, specie $1,726,065, circulation $4,259,234, and discounts $12,959,560.

By statement B, already referred to, it has been shown that, in the year 1814, the nominal bank capital in the United States exceeded $80,000,000. It is understood that a large addition was made to it in that year in several of the States. If it be admitted that such addition amounted to $15,000,000, the bank capital in operation in the year 1813 may be stated at $65,000,000. Allowing to this capital the same amount of specie, circulation, and discounts, as was comparatively possessed by the banks comprehended in statement D, the estimate will be, specie $28,000,000, circulation $62,000,000, and discounts $117,000,000. In 1815 the bank capital had increased to $88,000,000; whilst, upon the same principle of calculation, the specie would have been estimated at $16,500,000, circulation at $99,000,000, and discounts at $150,000,000. Applying this principle to the $125,000,000 of bank capital in operation during the year 1819, the specie possessed by all the banks would amount to $21,500,000, circulation $53,000,000, and discounts $157,000,000.

These last results, with the exception of the discounts, very materially differ from those which have been obtained by the mode of calculation previously adopted; they, nevertheless, furnish materials which may be useful in the progress of this inquiry. From them the following deductions may be drawn :

1st. That, in the year 1813, the circulation of bank notes was nearly equal to the bank capital.

2d. That, in the year 1815, it exceeded the capital by one-eighth.

3d. That, in the year 1819, it was less than the capital nearly in the proportion of 1 to 2.5.

4th. That, whilst the amount of bank capital has increased since 1813 from sixty-five to one hundred and twenty-five millions, the metallic basis, upon which the circulation of notes is founded, has decreased in the proportion of 15.5 to 28; being equal to 44.6 per cent.

5th. That the circulation of notes in the year 1819, in proportion to the specie in the possession of the banks, exceeded that of 1813 by 25.9 per cent.

6th. That, in the year 1813, the discounts, in proportion to the bank capital employed, exceeded those of 1815 in the ratio of 18 to 17, and those of 1819 in the ratio of 18 to 12.

7th. That the increase of bank notes in circulation, between the years 1813 and 1815, exceeded the increase of discounts during the same period by $4,000,000; whilst the specie in the vaults of the banks was diminished $11,000,000.

8th. That whilst, between the years 1815 and 1819, an addition of $37,000,000 has been made to the nominal bank capital, but $6,000,000 have been added to the aggregate amount of discounts.

It is probable that, between the year 1811 and the year 1813, a considerable addition was made to the paper circulation of the country. From a return of the former Bank of the United States, made to the Treasury in 1808, it appears that, with $15,300,000 of specie, is circulated only $4,787,000 of notes. Another return made in 1810 shows its condition was not materially changed. Shortly after the expiration of its charter, bank capital, to a great amount, was incorporated in some of the States. The expenditures produced by the war which was declared in 1812, without doubt, contributed, in some degree, to produce the difference between the condition of the sixteen banks already referred to, and that of the former Bank of the United States. If it be admitted, however, that the circulation in 1813 was not redundant, it must have become excessive in 1815. An increase of the currency, in the space of two years, in the proportion of 99 to 62, even if it had been wholly metallic, could not have failed to have produced a very great depreciation; but, when it is considered that not only the increase, but the whole circulation, consisted of paper not convertible into specie, some idea of its depreciation may be formed. The depreciation, however, was not uniform in every part of the Union. The variation in the degree of depreciation depended not only upon the greater issues of banks in one section of the nation than in others, but also upon the local advantages which they enjoyed as to commerce. It is impossible to determine, with precision, where the most excessive issue of bank notes occurred. Statement E, which exhibits the rate of exchange between the principal cities to the east of this place and London, and the price of bills at New York upon Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, during the years 1813, 1814, 1815, and 1816, may be considered presumptive evidence of that fact. So far as it can be relied upon for that purpose, Baltimore was the point of greatest depreciation among the above-mentioned places. This is probably true; as it is known that the banks in that place made greater advances to the Government in the loans which it obtained during the late war, in proportion to their capital, than those of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. But the greatest depreciation of the currency existed in the interior States, where the issues were not only excessive, but where their relation to the commercial cities greatly aggravated the effects of that excess.

This statement may also assist in explaining the cause of the necessity which existed in 1814 for the suspension of specie payments by the banks. From the commencement of the war until that event, a large amount of specie was taken out of the United States by the sale of English Government bills, at a discount frequently of from 15 to 20 per cent. Immediately after the suspension, they commanded a premium in those places where the banks had suspended payment, which gradually rose to 20 per cent.; while at Boston they remained at a discount of about 14 per cent. until February, 1815.

Whatever may have been the degree of depreciation of the currency in 1815, it continued to augment throughout the first six months of the year 1816, if the rate of exchange with London is considered conclusive evidence of that fact. The excessive importations of British merchandise during that period, and in the preceding year, might indeed account for the increase of premium paid upon sterling bills, and was, probably, one of the principal causes of it. The great fluctuations which occurred in the latter part of that period furnish some reason, however, for ascribing them, in some degree, to changes in the value of the currency in which their price was calculated rather than to the ordinary principles of exchange. It is more probable that the currency, in those places where it was not convertible into specie, fluctuated in value according to the efforts which were made, in particular places, to prepare for the resumption of specie payments, than that the balance of payments between the two countries should have varied to such an extent as is indicated by the sudden variations which occurred during that period in the rate of exchange. So far as these fluctuations are ascribable to the currency in which the rate of exchange was determined, a considerable appreciation of that currency took place in the last months of the year 1816. From that period until the present time, the circulation has rapidly diminished; and all the evils incident to a decreasing currency have been felt in every part of the Union, except in some of the Eastern States.

If, as previously stated, the circulation of 1813 be admitted to be the amount required to effect the exchanges of the community with facility and advantage, and that, in the year 1815, that circulation was extended to $99,000,000, (which was, in some degree, augmented in 1816,) the extent of the diminution of the currency, in the space of three years, may be perceived. But it is probable that the currency in 1815 exceeded $99,000,000. The banks, upon whose situation that estimate is founded, were established at a period when the practice of dispensing with the payment of those portions of their capital falling due after they went into operation had not been generally introduced. Some of them did not suspend specie payments during the general suspension. The rest were among the first to resume them, and have continued them to the present time. It cannot be expected that banks which went into operation during the war, and after the general suspension had occurred, were conducted with an equal degree of prudence and circumspection. A reasonable allowance being made for bank notes supposed to be in circulation at that period, but which were, in fact, in the possession of other banks, and for the excess of issues beyond the estimate, the circulation may, it is believed, be safely calculated at not less than $110,000,000. The paper circulation in 1813 has been estimated at $62,000,000. At that period, however, gold and silver formed a substantial part of the currency. The condition of the old Bank of the United States in 1810, and of the sixteen banks in 1813, proves that the demand for specie from the vaults of the banks was inconsiderable. It is therefore probable that the whole circulation of 1813 amounted to $70,000,000. In 1815, it is estimated to have risen to $110,000,000; and this amount was probably augmented in 1816. At the close of 1819, it has been estimated, upon data believed to be substantially correct, at $45,000,000. According to these estimates, the currency of the United States has, in the space of three years, been reduced from $110,000,000 to $45,000,000. This reduction exceeds 59 per cent. of the whole circulation of 1815.

The fact that the currency in 1815 and 1816 was depreciated has not sensibly diminished the effect upon the community of this great and sudden reduction. Whatever was the degree of its depreciation, it was still the measure of value. It determined the price of labor, and of all the property of the community. A change so violent could not fail, under the most favorable auspices in other respects, to produce much distress, to check the ardor of enterprise, and seriously to affect the productive energies of the nation. The reduction was, in fact, commenced under favorable auspices. During the year 1817, and the greater part of 1818, all the surplus produce of the country commanded in foreign markets higher prices than ordinary. The rate of foreign exchange afforded no inducement for the exportation of specie, for the purpose of discharging debts previously contracted. The only drain to which the metallic currency was subject was the demand for it for the prosecution of the trade to the East Indies and to China. In this trade, specie being the principal commodity, and indispensable to its prosecution, the amount exported during those years was very great, and seriously affected the amount of circulation, by compelling the banks to diminish their discounts.

Notwithstanding the drain for this commerce during these years was unusually large, every other circumstance was favorable to the restoration of the currency to a sound state, with the least possible distress to the community. The capacity of the country to discharge a large portion of the debts contracted with banks, and which had occasioned their excessive issues, was greater than at any former period, and than it probably will be again for a lapse of successive years. The effort to reduce the amount of currency during those years, though successful to a considerable degree, was not pursued with sufficient earnestness. In the latter part of 1818, when the price of the principal articles of American production had fallen nearly 50 per cent. in foreign markets, when the merchant needed the aid of additional loans to sustain him against the losses which he had incurred by the sudden reduction in the price of the commodities he had exported, he was called upon to discharge loans previously contracted. The agriculturist, who saw his income reduced below his indispensable necessities; the manufacturer, who was not only struggling against foreign competition, but who saw the sale of his manufactures reduced, by the incapacity of his customers to buy; in fact, all classes of the community, under circumstances so adverse to the command of funds, were subjected to curtailment wherever they had obtained discounts.

All intelligent writers upon currency agree that where it is decreasing in amount, poverty and misery must prevail. The correctness of the opinion is too manifest to require proof. The united voice of the nation attests its accuracy. As there is no recorded example in the history of nations of a reduction of the currency so rapid and so extensive, so but few examples have occurred of distress so general and so severe as that which has been exhibited in the United States. To the evils of a decreasing currency are superadded those of a deficient currency. But, notwithstanding it is deficient, it is still depreciated. In several of the States the great mass of the circulation is not even ostensibly convertible into specie at the will of the holder. During the greater part of the time that has elapsed since the resumption of specie payments, the convertibility of bank notes into specie has been rather nominal than real in the largest portion of the Union. On the part of the banks, mutual weakness had produced mutual forbearance. The extensive diffusion of bank stock among the great body of the citizens, in most of the States, had produced the same forbearance among individuals. To demand specie of the banks, when it was known they were unable to pay, was to destroy their own interests, by destroying the credit of the banks in which the productive portion of their property was invested. In favor of forbearance was also added the influence of the great mass of bank debtors. Every dollar in specie drawn out of the banks, especially for exportation, induced the necessity of curtailments. To this portion of the community all other evils were light when compared with the imperious demands of banks. Their exertions to prevent the drain of specie in the possession of those who controlled their destiny equalled the magnitude of the evils which were to be avoided. In most parts of the Union this forced state of things is passing away. The convertibility of bank notes into specie is becoming real wherever it is ostensible. If public opinion does not correct the evil in those States where this convertibility is not even ostensible, it will be the imperious duty of those who are invested with the power of correction to apply the appropriate remedy.

As the currency is, at least in some parts of the Union, depreciated, it must in those parts suffer a further reduction before it becomes sound. The nation must continue to suffer until this is effected. After the currency shall be reduced to the amount which, when the present quantity of the precious metals is distributed among the various nations of the world, in proportion to their respective exchangeable values, shall be assigned to the United States; when time shall have regulated the price of labor and of commodities, according to that amount; and when pre-existing engagements shall have been adjusted, the sufferings from a depreciated, decreasing, and deficient currency will be terminated. Individual and public prosperity will gradually revive, and the productive energies of the nation resume their accustomed activity. But new changes in the currency, and circumstances adverse to the perpetuity of the general prosperity, may reasonably be expected to occur. So far as these changes depend upon the currency, their recurrence, to an extent sufficient to disturb the prosperity of the nation, would be effectually prevented, if it could be rendered purely metallic. In that event, we should always retain that proportion of the precious metals which our exchangeable commodities bear to those of other nations. The currency would seldom be either redundant or deficient to an extent that would seriously affect the interests of society. But when the currency is metallic, and paper convertible into specie, changes to such an extent, it is believed, will frequently occur.

The establishment of banks which are restrained from issuing notes of small denominations furnishes great facilities for the transmission of money, and increases the efficiency of the capital subject to their control to the extent of the credit employed by them. The degree of facility afforded by them for the transportation or transmission of money depends upon the extent of country within which their notes circulate, and preserve a value equivalent to specie. Ordinarily, this extent is determined by the interior trade of the country; they will circulate through the whole extent of country, the produce of which is carried for sale to the place of their establishment. If they are established only in the principal commercial city of the nation, their notes will circulate through the whole extent of its territory, and afford the greatest possible facility for the transmission of money. If they are established in several of the commercial cities, their circulation will be circumscribed by the sections of country the inhabitants of which trade to those cities. The facility for transmitting money will be diminished by their establishment. But if banks should be established in all the interior towns, this facility would be impaired to a still greater degree. In that event, their notes would circulate within very narrow limits; but, within those limits, the notes of the banks in the commercial cities would no longer form part of the circulation. Should they, by accident, be carried within it, the first individual having remittances to make, and into whose hands they might come, would use them for that purpose.

The degree of credit which a bank can employ, in proportion to its capital, depends upon a variety of circumstances. If the community repose great confidence in the prudence and integrity of those who direct its concerns; if the capital employed be small in proportion to the demand for the transmission of money; if there be no other bank whose local situation repels its circulation from those sections of the country, the produce of which is ultimately carried to the place where it is established, the credit which it will be able to employ will be very great. Where all these facilities are wanting, the extent of the credit which it will employ will be very inconsiderable. The additional efficiency which, in the latter case, will be imparted to capital invested in banks, will not, it is believed, countervail the evils which necessarily result from their establishment.

Among the advantages which have been supposed most strongly to recommend their establishment, especially in a community whose resources are rapidly expanding, their capacity suddenly to increase the currency to the utmost demand for it has been considered the most important.

In a country where the currency is purely metallic, no considerable addition can be made to it without giving, at the time of its acquisition, articles in exchange of equal value. No addition can be made to the currency without affecting, to the extent of such addition, the enjoyments of the community. The amount so added will, to the same extent, diminish the quantity of articles which would otherwise be imported into the country for domestic consumption, or for re-exportation.

Ordinarily, the currency of one country will not be exported to another, because its value in every country is nearly the same. It will not, therefore, like other commodities, command a commercial profit upon exportation. It will be taken from one country to another only when the price of commodities in the former is so high as to produce a loss in the latter equal to the expense of transporting specie. It is this condition, annexed to every acquisition to the currency of a State, when it is purely metallic, of diminishing, to the same extent, the enjoyments of the community, which affords the most efficient protection against its becoming redundant. It is equally efficient in guarding against a deficiency, to an extent that can seriously affect the interest of the community. But this condition is not annexed to the increase of the currency by the issue of bank notes, even when convertible into specie. The notes by which the currency is suddenly augmented do not, in any degree, diminish the enjoyments of the community. No equivalent is, by such issue, transferred to another community, as is invariably done when an acquisition is made to a metallic currency. Whenever the currency can be augmented, exempt from such transfer, it must be subject to some degree of fluctuation in quantity. Every addition made to the currency by the issue of bank notes changes the relation which previously existed between the amount of the currency and the amount of the commodities which are to be exchanged through its agency. Their issue depends not upon receiving in exchange articles of equal value, but upon a pledge of the credit of one or more individuals to the amount of such issue. No evil can result to the community from the advance of the capital of a bank in exchange for the credit of individuals. In that case, no addition is made to the amount of the currency previously in circulation. It is perfectly immaterial to society whether this capital be lent by individuals or by corporations. The relation between the currency and the exchangeable commodities of the State is not disturbed. But, when their credit is greatly extended, the currency is expanded, and that relation is deranged. An expansion of the currency, through the agency of banks, will generally occur only in periods of prosperity. During such periods, enterprise will be fostered, industry stimulated, and the comfort and happiness of the people advanced, without the factitious aid of an expansive currency. But there can be no doubt that a sudden increase of the currency, during periods of prosperity, through the agency of bank issues, gives additional force and activity to the national enterprise. Such an increase will be followed by a general rise in the value of all articles, especially of those which cannot be exported. The price of lands, houses, and public stock, will be augmented in a greater degree than if no such increase had taken place.

If these prices could be maintained, if they could even be protected against sudden reduction, they would be cause of gratulation rather than of complaint. But the expansion of the currency, by the issue of paper, in a period of prosperity, will inevitably be succeeded by its contraction in periods of adversity. The extent to which the currency may be contracted, through the agency of banks, depends upon the use which they may have made of their credit. The excess of their discounts beyond their capital actually paid determines the amount of the credit which they have employed. Thus, in 1813, the capital of the banks in the United States has been estimated at $65,000,000, and their discounts at $117,000,000. The extent to which their credit was then employed was $52,000,000. Their circulation, the same period, has been estimated at $32,000,000. In this estimate no allowance was made for notes stated to be in circulation, but which were probably in the possession of other banks. A reasonable deduction being made on that account, it is probable that the paper circulation did not much exceed $52,000,000. But the liability of the banks for specie was equal to the whole amount of notes represented to be in circulation, besides the individual deposits. To meet an immediate demand, they are estimated to have had $28,000,000 in specie. If the deposits of individuals should be estimated at $18,000,000, their ultimate means of meeting the demand of $62,000,000, without sacrificing their capital, would consist of $10,000,000 in specie, and $52,000,000 secured by the notes of individuals; this sum being the excess of their discounts over their capital. Under ordinary circumstances, the basis upon which the credit of this circulation rested might be considered sufficient to sustain it. A debt of $117,000,000 could not, under the most adverse circumstances, be considered inadequate to meet one of $52,000,000. But, in the case of currency, the capacity of ultimate redemption is not sufficient. The capacity to redeem it as it is presented is indispensable. Whenever the public confidence in this capacity is impaired, an immediate demand for specie will be created; and, if it is not promptly met, depreciation will ensue. But, even in circumstances in some degree adverse to the operations of banks, if their discounts consisted principally of notes founded upon real transactions, in which the idea of renewal was excluded, and if specie formed a considerable proportion of the circulation, the capacity of the banks to meet the demands upon them for specie might have been sufficient to sustain the credit of the currency. If, on the other hand, the debts due to the banks consisted chiefly of fixed or permanent loans, generally denominated accommodation paper; if specie had been banished from circulation, by the issue of dollar notes, the suspension of payment by the banks could not fail to be the result of any considerable pressure upon them for specie. In the former case, as their notes should be withdrawn from circulation, they would gradually be reduced to the demand for them for the transmission of money. If the effort to withdraw them should be continued beyond that point, specie would be paid into the banks by their debtors, in preference to bank notes; and the just proportion between the paper circulation and the specie in their vaults would be promptly restored. In the latter case, as the debts due to the banks would not, according to the understanding of the parties, become due at short intervals, the only mode of meeting the increasing demands upon them for specie would be to require of the whole mass of debtors the payment of a fixed proportion of the sums due by them. As the circumstances which would require this measure, on the part of the banks, would generally affect the community in the same degree, the capacity of their debtors to meet this demand would generally be found to be in an inverse ratio to the demand. The demand itself, being inconsistent with the impression under which the debt was contracted, would be resisted in every case where the interest of the debtor would be subserved by delay. As specie formed but an inconsiderable part of the currency, the reduction of the paper circulation would have to be carried to a greater extent than in the former case. A just proportion between the paper circulation, and the specie necessary to support it, could be obtained only by the positive reduction of the former, as it would be impracticable to increase the latter, while the demand continued. Under such circumstances, the suspension of payment would be the probable result.

Such, in fact, were the circumstances under which the suspension in 1814 occurred.

The injudicious multiplication of banks, where capital in that form, to some extent, might have been useful; the establishment of them where they could only be injurious; the permission to issue dollar notes, by which specie was banished from circulation; and the demand for specie for exportation, which existed during the years 1813 and 1814, imposed upon the banks in the Middle, Southern, and Western States the necessity of suspending payment. A longer effort to discharge their notes in specie would not only have been ineffectual, but would certainly have postponed, to a more remote period, the resumption of specie payments. The evils which have resulted to the community from that suspension have certainly been great; but it may well be doubted whether others of equal magnitude would not have been suffered, if that event had not occurred. The extent to which the currency must have been reduced, in order to have avoided the suspension, could not have failed, at any period, to produce great embarrassment and distress to the community. But, in a time of war, when the country was invaded; when the public safety required that the energies of the nation should be fully developed, a sudden and extensive reduction of the currency, by any cause whatever, would have been fatal. Under such circumstances, the demand for currency would have been too imperious to be resisted. It would, from necessity, have been supplied by the issue of Treasury notes.

The fact that, in a small portion of the Union, specie payments were continued, cannot be admitted as evidence that it was practicable throughout the nation. In that part of the country, the extensive bank issues consequent upon loans to the Government in the Middle States had not occurred. Foreign trade, which, in the other parts of the Union was nearly annihilated, still preserved there a languid existence, through the permission or connivance of the enemy. These circumstances could not fail to enable the banks in the Eastern States to continue specie payments longer than those of the Middle, Southern, and Western States. In an effort to preserve their credit, they would, inevitably, be the last which would fail. In such a struggle, however, they must have failed, had not the circulation of the paper of their weaker neighbors and the issues of Treasury notes come to their aid. But for this adventitious assistance, wholly unconnected with the wisdom and foresight of their directors, specie payments must have been suspended there, or the best interests of the community have been sacrificed. From that period, until the resumption of specie payments in the early part of 1817, Treasury notes, and the notes of the banks which had suspended payment, formed the great mass of the circulation in the eastern part of the Union. Specie, or the notes of banks which continued to pay specie, formed no part of the receipts of the Government in Boston and the districts east of that town, until about the close of the year 1816.

In all great exigencies, which, in the course of human events, may be expected to arise in every nation, the suspension of payment by banks, where the circulation consists principally of bank notes, is one of the evils which ought to be considered as the inevitable consequence of their establishment. Even in countries where paper does not form the principal part of the circulation, such an event will sometimes happen. In the year 1797, when the restriction was imposed upon the Bank of England, the average of its circulation for several successive years was about £10,000,000 sterling, whilst the metallic currency was estimated at £30,000,000. Yet, in that country, whose trade in time of war, through the protection of its fleets, was rather expanded than contracted, it was found necessary to authorize the bank to suspend payment; which suspension, after a lapse of twenty-three years, still continues. When the existence of banks depends upon the authority which regulates the currency, it may be practicable to impose salutary checks against excessive issues of paper during suspension, and, in some degree, to guard against an excessive depreciation of the currency. But, where these institutions are created by an authority having no power to regulate the currency, and especially where they are created by a great variety of authorities independent of each other, and practically incapable of acting in concert, it is manifest that no such checks or restraints can be imposed. It is impossible to imagine a currency more vicious than that which depends upon the will of nearly four hundred banks, entirely independent of each other, when released from all restraint against excessive issues. By the term currency, the issue of paper by Government, as a financial resource, is excluded.

Banks and the Currency.

Even such an issue, in a State where the reign of law is firmly established, and public opinion controls the public councils, would be preferable to a currency similar to that which existed in some parts of the United States during the general suspension, and which now exists in some of the States. This truth has been practically demonstrated by the redemption of the whole of the Treasury notes issued during the war, within the short space of about two years after the peace; whilst a large amount of bank notes issued during the suspension are yet unredeemed, and greatly depreciated.

There can be no doubt that a metallic currency, connected with a paper circulation, convertible into specie, and not exceeding the demand for the facile transmission of money, is the most convenient that can be devised. When the paper circulation exceeds that demand, the metallic currency, to the amount of the excess, will be exported, and a liability to sudden fluctuations to the same extent will be produced.

If banks were established only in the principal commercial cities of each State; if they were restrained from the issue of notes of small denominations; if they should retain an absolute control over one-half of their capital, and the whole of the credit which they employ, by discounting to that amount nothing but transaction paper payable at short dates, the credit and stability of the banks would at least be unquestionable. Their notes could always be redeemed in specie, on demand. The remaining part of their capital might be advanced upon long credits to manufacturers, and even to agriculturists, without the danger of being under the necessity of calling upon such debtors to contribute to their relief if emergencies should occur. Such debtors are, in fact, unable to meet sudden exigencies, and ought never to accept of advances from banks but upon long credits, for which timely provision may be made. The latter class, of all others, is the least qualified to meet the sudden demands which a pressure upon banks compels them to make upon their debtors. The returns of capital invested in agriculture are too slow and distant to justify engagements with banks, except upon long credits. If the payment of the principal should be demanded at other periods than those at which the husbandman receives the annual reward of his toil, the distress which would result from the exaction would greatly outweigh any benefit which was anticipated from the loan. That the establishment of banks in agricultural districts has greatly improved the general appearance of the country, is not denied. Comfortable mansions and spacious barns have been erected; lands have been cleared and reduced to cultivation; farms have been stocked and rendered more productive, by the aid of bank credits; but these improvements will eventually be found, in most cases, to effect the ruin of the proprietor. The farm, with its improvements, will frequently prove unequal to the discharge of the debts incurred in its embellishment. Such, in fact, is the actual or apprehended state of things wherever banks have been established in the small inland towns and villages. Poverty and distress are impending over the heads of most of those who have attempted to improve their farms by the aid of bank credits. So general is this distress, that the principal attention of the State Legislatures, where the evil exists, is, at this moment, directed to the adoption of measures calculated to rescue their fellow-citizens from the inevitable effects of their own indiscretion. If, in affording a shield to the debtor against the legal demand of his creditor, the axe shall be applied to the root of the evil, by the annihilation of banks where they ought never to have existed, the interference, however doubtful in point of policy or principle, may eventually be productive of more good than evil.

The general system of credit which has been introduced through the agency of banks, brought home to every man's door, has produced a factitious state of things, extremely adverse to the sober, frugal, and industrious habits which ought to be cherished in a republic. In the place of these virtues, extravagance, idleness, and the spirit of gambling adventure have been engendered and fostered by our institutions. So far as these evils have been produced by the establishment of banks where they are not required, by the omission to impose upon them wholesome restraints, and by the ignorance or misconduct of those who have been intrusted with their direction, they are believed to be beyond the control of the Federal Government. Since the resumption of specie payments, measures have been adopted in some of the States to enforce their continuance; in others, the evil has been left to the correction of public opinion. There is, however, some reason to apprehend that the authority of law may be interposed in support of the circulation of notes not convertible into specie.

But the Federal Government has, by its measures, in some degree, contributed to the spirit of speculation and of adventurous enterprise which, at this moment, so strongly characterizes the citizens of this Republic. The system of credit, which in the infancy of our commerce was indispensable to its prosperity, if not to its existence, has been extended at a period when the dictates of sound discretion seemed to require that it should be shortened. The credit given upon the sale of the national domain has diffused this spirit of speculation and of inordinate enterprise among the great mass of our citizens. The public lands are purchased, and splendid towns erected upon them, with bank credits. Every thing is artificial. The rich inhabitant of the commercial cities and the tenant of the forest differ only in the object of their pursuit. Whether commerce, splendid mansions, or public lands be the object of desire, the means by which the gratification is to be secured are bank credits.

This state of things is no less unfriendly to the duration of our republican institutions than it is adverse to the development of our national energies when great emergencies shall arise; for, upon such occasions, the attention of the citizen will be directed to the preservation of his property from the grasp of his creditors, instead of being devoted to the defence of his country; instead of being able to pay with promptitude the contributions necessary to the preservation of the State, he will be induced to claim the interference of the Government, to protect him against the effects of his folly and extravagance.

This ought not to be the condition of a republic when menaced by foreign force or domestic commotion. Such, it is apprehended, will be the condition of the United States, if the course which has been pursued since the commencement of the late war be not abandoned. Since that period, it is believed, the number of banks in the United States has been more than doubled. They have been established in the little inland towns and villages, and have brought distress and ruin upon the inhabitants. When the cause and the extent of the evil are known, no doubt is entertained that the appropriate remedies will be applied by those who, in our complex form of government, are invested with the necessary authority.

But the resolution requires the Secretary of the Treasury "to report such measures as, in his opinion, may be expedient to procure and retain a sufficient quantity of gold and silver coin in the United States."

It has already been suggested, that, if the currency were purely metallic, or connected with paper convertible into specie, to the extent only of the demand for the transmission of money, the United States would retain a proportion of the precious metals which the value of their exchangeable commodities bore to those of other States. But if paper can be made to circulate independent of its employment in the transmission of funds, gold and silver to the same extent will be exported. If paper will be received and employed generally as the medium of exchange, and especially if it be issued in bills of small denominations, the amount of specie which will be exported will be great in proportion to the paper in circulation. If this position be correct, the power of Congress will be insufficient to retain any considerable portion of gold and silver in the United States. Bank notes, from one dollar to those of large denominations, have circulated, and, it is presumed, will continue to circulate, independent of its authority. As long as bank notes will be received as a substitute for specie, the quantity of specie necessary for currency will be small and may be easily retained without the aid of Government. But the demand for specie, where the circulation is principally paper, is extremely fluctuating. When there is but little or no demand for it, the temptation to increase their discounts, by the issue of more paper, is too strong to be resisted by banks. When a demand for specie arises, the currency has to be suddenly diminished by the contraction of their discounts. Fluctuations in the amount of the currency, produced by this means, is the principal mischief to be remedied; these fluctuations will frequently occur in every State, where the currency is principally paper convertible into coin. In the United States, where the specie exported as a primary article of commerce to the East Indies and to China bears so large a proportion to the metallic currency of the country, they must not only be more frequent than in States where no such commerce exists, but more extensive in their effects. The demand created for Spanish milled dollars, by the exportation of specie, in the prosecution of this trade, has, without doubt, caused their importation to an extent which otherwise would not have occurred. As this demand is in some degree contingent, the supply will also be contingent. When it exceeds the demand, the banks will be tempted to new issues of paper. When it is deficient, the deficiency will be drawn from the banks, and will cause a sudden diminution of the currency. If this diminution could be limited to the amount of the deficiency thus drawn from the banks, the evil would be no greater than if the currency were metallic. But this is not the fact. When the paper circulation is returned upon the banks for specie, prudence requires that an effort should be made to preserve the same proportion between the specie in their vaults and their notes in circulation as existed at the moment the pressure commenced. If the paper in circulation should be three times the amount of specie in possession of the banks, a demand upon them for $1,000,000 of specie would produce a diminution of $3,000,000 in the currency if the specie should be exported, and of $2,000,000 if it remained in the country. It is even probable that the comparative diminution would exceed this ratio. As the demand increased, apprehensions would be excited for the credit of the banks; the exertions produced by that apprehension would correspond with the magnitude of the evil to be avoided, rather than with the positive pressure; this, it is presumed, would be the effect of such an emergency, where banks had not become familiarized with bankruptcy, and were not countenanced by society in a course of conduct which, in private life, would be considered dishonest.

If, by any Constitutional exercise of the power of Congress, banks can be restrained, first, from issuing notes of small denominations, and, secondly, from excessive issues when their notes are not returned upon them for specie, fluctuations in the currency, to an extent to derange the interests of society, may be prevented. But if the imposition of these restraints is not within the Constitutional powers of Congress, the evils which have been suffered for the want of those restraints must continue until the present system of banking shall be abandoned.

In an inquiry into the state of the currency, the consideration of the coinage is necessarily involved. The principles upon which the coinage of the United States has been established are substantially correct. The standard fineness of the gold coinage corresponds with the coinage of England and Portugal. The standard of the silver coinage differs but little from that of Spain. The American dollar is intrinsically worth about one per cent. less than the Spanish milled dollar. This difference, if the Spanish dollar had not been made a legal tender, might have secured to the nation a more permanent use of its silver coinage. American dollars would not be exported as long as Spanish dollars could be obtained for that purpose at a reasonable premium. If this latter coin were not a legal tender, the banks might afford to import it, and might sell, at a fair premium, the amount which might be required of them for the China and East India trade.

The relative value of gold and silver has been differently established in different nations. It has been different in the same nation at different periods. In England, an ounce of gold is equal in value to about 15.2 ounces of silver; in France, it is equal to 15.5; and in Spain and Portugal to 16 ounces. In the United States, an ounce of gold is equal to 15 ounces of silver. But the relative value of these metals in the markets frequently differs from that assigned to them by the laws of the different civilized States. It is believed that gold, when compared with silver, has been for many years appreciating in value, and now everywhere commands, in the money markets, a higher value than that which has been assigned to it in States where its relative value is greatest. If this be correct, no injustice will result from a change in the relative legal value of gold and silver, so as to make it correspond with their relative marketable value. If gold, in relation to silver, should be raised five per cent., one ounce of it would be equal to 15.75 or 15 $\frac{3}{4}$ ounces of pure silver. This augmentation in its value would cause it to be imported in quantities sufficient to perform all the functions of currency. As it is not used to any considerable extent as a primary article of commerce, the fluctuations to which the silver currency is subject from that cause would not affect it. It would be exported only when the rate of exchange against the country should exceed the expense of exportation. In ordinary circumstances, such a state of exchange would not be of long continuance. If the currency of the United States must, of necessity, continue to be paper convertible into specie, an increase of the gold coinage, upon principles which shall afford the least inducement to exportation, is probably the most wholesome corrective that can be applied, after the rigid enforcement of that convertibility.

The copper coinage is believed to be susceptible of improvement. Copper itself is too massive to serve the purposes of change. One hundred cents are too cumbrous to be carried and used in the numberless transactions which daily occur between individuals. Coin compounded of silver and copper, of from one to ten cents, would be much more suitable for that object. This kind of coinage has been adopted in other countries with great advantage.

It has, however, been objected to this coinage—

1. That, as compounded metals are much harder than the component ingredients, it would be difficult, and, consequently, expensive to work.

2. That the coin itself would be of little or no intrinsic value; copper or brass being of superior value in the manufactures to which it might be applied. And that the public would scarcely submit to the circulation of a coin so worthless.

3. That it might be counterfeited by a composition of zinc and copper.

After giving to these objections their due weight, it is believed that a change of this nature, in the copper coinage, would be beneficial. Although the expense of such a coinage should be twice as much as that of an equal number of silver coin, still it might be advantageous. Small change, both of silver and copper, may be abundant in Philadelphia, the seat of the Mint, but it is not generally so elsewhere. If it were, tickets of 6 $\frac{1}{2}$, 10, 12 $\frac{1}{2}$, 25, and 50 cents, issued by mayors and corporation officers, and dollar bills torn in two pieces, for the purposes of change, would not be employed for that purpose. This single fact is an answer to the second objection. The fractional parts of a dollar are so indispensable in the transactions of individuals, that any thing which assumes that character will be employed. If the tickets which at this moment form so great a portion of the change of this city, and of various other places, are employed for that purpose it is inconceivable that the community should refuse to permit a compound coin of silver and copper to circulate, containing the intrinsic value which it represents, merely because, for manufactures, it will not be worth more than brass or copper, and that the expense of refining will be equal to the value of the silver. Change (that is, the fractional parts of a dollar) is so indispensable to the community, that its inapplicability to manufactures, and its exemption from liability to exportation, instead of forming objections, are recommendations in its favor.

The objection that this coin may be easily counterfeited is, if it cannot be obviated, entitled to great consideration. As has been before stated, this compound coinage has been successfully practised in other States. If compound metals are much harder than their component ingredients, may not a sufficient security against counterfeiting be derived from that circumstance? The dimensions and power of the machinery, which constitute one of the objections to the coinage, will render it extremely difficult to secure that secrecy and concealment which are indispensable to the success of the counterfeiter. If this compound coinage should not be carried higher than ten cent or dime pieces, the inducement, compared with the danger of detection, resulting from the magnitude of the machinery, would not, it is believed, be sufficient to encourage counterfeiting. If, however, it should be deemed impracticable to guard against this evil, in a coinage composed of silver and copper, an attempt might be made to obtain a supply of small change, by a mixture of silver and zinc. The danger of counterfeiting would then be removed.

As various plans have been suggested, during the last twelve months, for alleviating the general distress which has prevailed, by the emission of a large amount of Treasury notes, a few observations on that subject will close this part of the report.

If the Treasury notes are to be issued for this purpose, they will be either receivable in all payments to the Government, or they will be made redeemable at a fixed period.

1. If they are made receivable in all payments to the Government, the revenue will, from the time that $5,000,000 are issued, be substantially received in them. The Government will be immediately unable to pay the interest and reimbursement of the public debt in specie as it becomes due. These notes, when compared with the notes of the Bank of the United States, will be at a discount. The latter notes, independently of their being every where receivable in all payments to the Government, are convertible, at the place of their issue, into specie. They are equal to the Treasury notes in payment of the revenue, and superior to them, as they can command specie when the holder shall desire it.

If the fourteenth section of the bank charter were modified, so that the notes of the bank and of its offices should be receivable by the Government only when tendered where they are made payable, a small amount of Treasury notes might be issued, and circulated, without depreciation. In that case, they would be used for the transmission of money, and would be in constant demand for that purpose. It is the reception of the notes of the Bank of the United States, and its offices, by the Government, wherever they are tendered, that causes them to be considered as a good remittance throughout the United States. If they should cease to be so received, a demand for Treasury notes to a small amount, for the transmission of money, would be created, and would preserve them from depreciation. If the notes thus issued should be made redeemable at the Treasury, in specie, upon demand, the amount which might be put and retained in circulation would probably exceed, to a considerable extent, the sum demanded for the facile transmission of money. Such Treasury notes would, however, have no advantage over the notes of the Bank of the United States, as long as they are receivable in all payments to the United States, without reference to the place where they are payable. It is even probable that they would not be of equal value and currency with those notes, as the latter would generally be made payable in the principal and commercial cities, where remittances are continually made, whilst the Treasury notes would be payable only at this place. If Treasury notes, payable in specie, on demand, when presented at this place, should be preferred to the notes of the Bank of the United States, it would be in consequence of the abuses which have been practised by banking institutions, which have, in some degree, shaken the public confidence in the integrity of their direction.

2. If Treasury notes were to be issued, not receivable in payments to the Government, but redeemable at a fixed period, they would immediately depreciate, unless they bore nearly six per cent. interest. In the latter case, they would be of little more use, as currency, than the funded debt. They would not perform the functions of money.

3. In any case whatever, whether they are receivable in payments to the Government, or bear an interest, and are redeemable at a fixed period, they will afford no substantial relief where the distress is greatest, unless they should be advanced as a loan in order to alleviate that distress. If they are to be issued from the Treasury in discharge of the demands upon Government, they would never reach those sections of the country where relief is most required. There, the Government already collects more than can be expended. One of the causes of this distress is the necessity of transferring the public funds from those sections, for the purpose of being expended, to those where there is no deficiency of currency.

As a financial resource, the issue of Treasury notes is justifiable only where the deficiency which they are intended to supply is small in amount, and temporary in its nature. As a measure of alleviation, it will be more likely to do harm than good. If a sufficient amount of those notes, of any description whatever, should be issued, and put into circulation where they are most wanted, unless they were given away, a debt in that part of the Union would be contracted to the extent of the issue. It might enable the borrowers to pay debts previously contracted, but their relative situation would be the same. Unless the currency became vitiated by the relief which was afforded, the ultimate payment of the debt would consummate the ruin which the measure was intended to prevent. But it is probable that the sums which might be advanced, by way of loan, would, in a great degree, be lost. The Government is not, from its nature, qualified for operations of this kind. The general system of credit which has been introduced by the agency of banks, and by the inevitable effect of the measures of the General Government, has produced an artificial state of things, which requires repression rather than extension. The issue of Treasury notes for the purpose of alleviating the general distress, would tend to increase this unnatural and forced state of things, and give to it a duration which it would otherwise never attain. If much of the evil resulting from a decreasing currency had not already been suffered, there might be some plausible reason for urging the issue of Treasury notes as a measure of alleviation. This ground cannot be urged in its favor; it is therefore indefensible, upon the ground of expediency as well as of principle.

The last member of the resolution assumes, by implication, the practicability of substituting, by the Constitutional exercise of the power of Congress, a paper currency for that which now exists.

In considering this proposition, the power of Congress over the currency of the United States cannot, consistently with the respect which is due to that body, be either affirmed or denied. It cannot be supposed that the House of Representatives, in adopting the resolution in question, intended, through the agency of an Executive department of the Government, to institute an inquiry as to the extent of the Constitutional authority of a body of which it is only a constituent member. Yet it will necessarily occur to the House, that, if the power of Congress over the currency is not absolutely sovereign, the inquiry, whatever may be its immediate result, must be without any ultimate utility. The general prosperity will not be advanced by demonstrating that there is no intrinsic obstacle to the substitution of a paper for a metallic currency, if the power to adopt the substitute has been withheld from the Federal Government. Without offering an opinion upon the weight to which these views would have been entitled had they been urged whilst the resolution was under consideration, it is admitted that they furnish no ground for declining the performance of the duty imposed by its adoption. In the discussion of a question of so much delicacy and importance, the utmost confidence is reposed in the justice and liberality of those who have rendered it indispensable.

At the threshold of this inquiry, it is proper to observe that it is deemed unnecessary to present an analysis of the motives which led, even in the most remote antiquity, to the general adoption, by civilized States, of gold and silver as the standard of value, or of the advantages which have resulted from that adoption. The circumstance to which, in the course of this investigation, it will be necessary to advert, is the tendency which a metallic currency has to preserve a greater uniformity of value than any other commodity; and the facility with which it returns to that value whenever, by any temporary causes, that uniformity has been interrupted. No argument will in this place be offered in support of this proposition. It is founded on the experience of all nations. Its truth, for the present, will therefore be assumed. But the proposition itself admits that gold and silver, when employed by the consent of all civilized States as the standard of value, are subject to temporary variations of value. It is equally true that they are subject to permanent variations. The cause and effect of these changes will be considered previously to the discussion of the practicability of substituting a paper for a metallic currency.

1st. When, by any circumstance whatsoever, a greater portion of these metals is found in a particular State than is possessed by other States having articles of equal value to be exchanged, they will in such State be of less value than in the adjacent States. This will be manifested by an increase in the price of the commodities of such State. This increase of price will continue until the metallic redundancy is exported or converted into manufactures. Whenever this redundancy is disposed of, the currency will return to its former value, and the price of other commodities will be regulated by that value.

2d. But the exportation of specie may take place where there is no such redundancy. This occurs whenever the general balance of trade continues for some time unfavorable to a particular State. The currency then appreciates in value, and the price of all other commodities in such State is diminished. As commerce is nothing more than the exchange of equivalents, the reduction in the price of the articles of such State, and the increased value of the currency, will promptly produce a reaction; and gold and silver will soon return in the quantities required to reduce their value to that which they maintain in the adjacent States. With the return of specie, all other articles will return to the prices which they commanded before its exportation. Like fluids, the precious metals, so long as they are employed as the general measure of value, will constantly tend to preserve a common level. Every variation from it will be promptly corrected without the intervention of human laws. These fluctuations, being temporary in their nature, are wholly independent of the permanent causes which may affect the value of gold and silver when employed as the general standard of value. They will equally occur, whether the quantity of these metals, compared with the exchanges which they are destined to effect, be redundant or deficient. The limits, however, within which these fluctuations are confined, are so contracted, that the great interests of society cannot be seriously affected by them. But this observation must be understood to apply to a currency purely metallic, or, at least, when the paper which is connected with it does not exceed the demand for the convenient transmission of money.

3. Gold and silver, when employed by the common consent of nations as the standard of value, are subject to the variations in value from permanent causes. When their quantity is increased more rapidly than the articles which are to be exchanged through their agency, their price will fall, or, what amounts to the same thing, the price of all exchangeable articles will rise. It has been admitted by all intelligent writers upon this subject, that, immediately after the discovery of America, towards the close of the fifteenth century, a sudden and extensive depreciation in the value of these metals occurred; and that, from that time to the close of the eighteenth century, they continued gradually to depreciate. This depreciation, it is believed, has been accelerated during the last century, as much by the substitution of paper for specie, as by the increase in the quantity of those metals during that period, beyond the demand which would have existed for them as currency had that substitution not taken place. The precise effect upon the depreciation of these metals, produced by the partial substitution of paper in various countries for a metallic currency, will not now be inquired into; but it is generally conceded that the depreciation has been more rapid since that substitution than at any former period, except when the accumulated stock of ages in the New World was brought into Christendom, and thence distributed into every other region where gold and silver were in demand. Since the close of the last century doubts have existed whether those metals, even when employed as currency, have not appreciated in value; and it is contended, by the advocates of a paper currency, that this appreciation will probably continue through a long succession of years, and seriously affect all the operations of the civilized world. It is maintained by these writers that the demand for currency at present, throughout the world, is greater than the supply which the existing quantity of the precious metals will afford, without materially depressing the price of all the objects of human industry and human desires. When it is recollected that production is regulated by demand, and that both are directly affected by the quantity of currency compared with the quantity of articles to be exchanged, it is readily perceived that an increase in the currency of the world, by the substitution of paper, even when convertible into coin, will increase the quantity of exchangeable commodities in the world beyond what would have existed had such increase of currency not taken place. Under such circumstances, a sudden reduction of the currency, by the rejection of the paper which had been employed, could not fail to derange all the relations of society, by diminishing the quantity of currency, whilst the articles to be exchanged through its agency would suffer no such diminution. An immediate depression in the price of all commodities would be the inevitable consequence of an unequalled return to a metallic currency, upon the supposition that the quantity of gold and silver annually produced should remain undiminished. But, if this return to a metallic currency should be attempted at a period when the annual product of these metals, either from temporary or permanent causes, should have considerably decreased, all the great interests of society would be most seriously disordered; property of every description would rapidly fall in value; the relations between creditor and debtor would be violently and suddenly changed. This change would be greatly to the injury of the debtor; the property which would be necessary to discharge his debts would exceed that which he had received from his creditor; the one would be ruined without the imputation of crime, whilst the other would be enriched without the semblance of merit. Until the engagements existing at the moment of such a change are discharged, and the price of labor and of commodities is reduced to the proportion which it must bear to the quantity of currency employed as the medium of their exchange, enterprise of every kind will be repressed, and misery and distress universally prevail. When this shall be effected, the relations of society, founded upon a new basis, will be equitable and just, and tend to promote and secure the general prosperity.

Such, it is contended by the advocates of a paper currency, are the circumstances under which the principal States of Europe are endeavoring to return to a metallic currency. For a century past the currency of those States has been greatly increased by the employment of paper, founded, it is true, originally, upon a metallic basis. During the last twenty years this paper has ceased to be convertible into specie; and as no systematic effort has been made to prevent excessive issues, it has become redundant, and, consequently, depreciated. Notwithstanding this depreciation, the productions of those countries it is believed have more rapidly increased than those of countries where a metallic currency has been preserved. The efforts that are seriously made by those States to return to a metallic currency, will be the repression of enterprise of every description among themselves. It will be foreseen that the currency must appreciate, and that all other articles must depreciate in value. The effects of this appreciation of money will be first manifested in those States by the fall of the price of all articles which cannot be exported. In the progress of these measures, the price of the ex-portable articles will also be affected, by the reduction in the currency employed in effecting their exchange. It is even probable that the quantity of exchangeable articles will be diminished. Whilst the appreciation of the currency is perceptibly advancing, the manufacturer will not hazard his capital in producing articles the price of which is rapidly declining. The merchant will abstain from purchasing, under the apprehension of a further reduction of price, and of the difficulty of revending at a profit. It is even probable that the interest of money will fall, whilst the cry of scarcity of money will be incessant. Under such circumstances, loans will not be required, except to meet debts of immediate urgency. None will be demanded for the prosecution of enterprises by which the productive energies of the community will be increased.

As the measures which have been adopted by England and several of the continental States of Europe, for returning to a metallic currency advance, the interest of those States which have adhered to it will be affected. Whilst gold and silver were, in the former States, dispensed with as coin, they were sought for merely as commodities. The quantity necessary for their manufactures was readily obtained without deranging, in any serious degree, the currency of other States.

It has been estimated that from eighty to one hundred and twenty millions of dollars were necessary to England. Taking the mean sum, and admitting that the other European States engaged in the same effort require an equal amount, a supply of two hundred millions of dollars is necessary. The commencement of the measures necessary to obtain that portion of this sum which cannot in a short time be drawn from the annual product of the mines, may not be immediately felt by other States. But when these measures approach their completion; when a large quantity of gold and silver is necessarily withdrawn from the currency of other States, the price of specie will, in the latter, appreciate, and the price of all commodities will decline. All the evils incident to an appreciating currency will be felt in those States, though in a less degree than where a paper currency had been exclusively adopted. The example presented by the return to a metallic currency in France, even in the midst of a revolution, which probably had some influence upon the decision of this question by other States, is believed to be in no degree analogous in its principal circumstances. At the precise period that this change was operating, England and the principal continental States abandoned the precious metals as currency. The supply demanded by France was not only at hand, but was seeking the very employment which that change had made indispensable. At the same time, immense sums were brought into France by her conquering armies, which, being raised by military contributions, had in some degree rendered a resort to paper currency in the United States necessary. At present the civilized world is at peace, and each State is endeavoring, by systematic measures, to secure to itself a just participation of equal and reciprocal commerce. The States which are now attempting to return to a metallic currency will find much greater difficulty in effecting this change than was experienced by France.

The demand for gold and silver, as the medium of exchange, cannot be supplied until the price of all exchangeable articles has fallen in proportion to the reduction of the currency, which the abandonment of paper must produce. It is even probable, as has been before suggested, that, after the price of commodities and of labor shall have fallen, so as to bear a just proportion to the currency which is to be employed in effecting the necessary exchanges, the currency will continue gradually to appreciate. This, however, is matter of conjecture. It depends entirely upon the fact, whether the annual product of the mines, after furnishing the quantity necessary for the consumption of the precious metals in manufactures, will be equal to the increased demand for currency, arising from the increase of exchangeable commodities throughout the world. The great advancement in the arts and sciences, the rapid improvements in machinery which characterize the present age, acting through a long succession of ages, cannot fail to augment, in an astonishing degree, all the products of human industry.

It may however be urged that the same improvements will augment in an equal degree the product of the mines, and that therefore the quantity of precious metals in the world will continue to bear to other commodities the same relation which they may assume when the return to a metallic currency is effected. This may be true; but, so far as it depends upon the general principle that the supply of all articles is regulated by the demand, there is reasonable ground of doubt. The maxim, although good as a general rule, admits of exceptions. A demand beyond the supply increases the price of the thing demanded, and invites to the investment of additional capital in its production. But, when the article demanded is to be produced from a material which no investment of capital, no application of skill, can augment, the only effect of such investment and application is to produce the most which the material has the capacity to furnish. Such, in fact, is the case of gold and silver. The material from which they are made is limited in quantity, which neither capital nor skill can augment. It is probable that the improvements in machinery and the art of refining will be counterbalanced by the exhaustion of the mines, or the difficulty of working them, arising from the depth and extent of their excavations. It is therefore possible that the demand for the precious metals, for currency and for manufactures, may exceed the production of the mines.

Previously to entering upon the immediate discussion of the practicability of substituting a paper for a metallic currency, it is proper to observe, that gold and silver derive part of the uniformity of value which has been ascribed to them, from the general consent of civilized States to employ them as the standard of value. Should they cease to be used for that purpose, they would become more variable in their value, and would be regulated, like all other articles, by the demand for them, compared with the supply in any given market. It is presumed that, if they should cease to be employed as the standard of value by several States, their uniformity of value would be, in some degree, affected, not only in those States where they were considered as mere commodities, but in those where they were still employed as currency. Whenever, as commodities, they should rise in value, a drain would take place from the currency of other States; and when they should fall in value, as commodities, they would seek employment as currency, and render, in some degree, redundant the currency of the States where they are employed. After making due allowance for the depreciation of bank notes in England, from the time of the bank restriction, in 1797, to the present period, the price of gold and silver in that country is believed to have varied more than at any former period. Their price, when compared with bank notes, from the year 1797 to 1808, showed but a slight degree of depreciation—considerably less in all human probability than actually existed. During that interval the demand for those metals was limited in England to the sum required for manufactures. It is highly probable that, if the quantity of the paper circulation had been reduced to the amount of the currency in circulation at the time, or for one year before the restriction, the price of bullion would have been below the Mint price. On the contrary, in the year 1808, when the employment of a British force in Spain created a sudden demand for specie, the depreciation of bank notes, indicated by the price of bullion, was probably greater than that which really existed. In the year 1814, after the Treaty of Paris, the price of bullion, estimated in bank paper, was not above the Mint price; while, in the succeeding year, it rose to more than twenty per cent. above that price: the amount of bank notes in circulation at the former exceeding, in a small degree, that of the latter period. It is impossible that these variations in the price of gold and silver, in the short space of one year, can be entirely chargeable to the depreciation of bank notes. The effect which these variations, in a great commercial State, where the precious metals were considered only as commodities, were calculated to produce upon the currency of the neighboring States, has not been ascertained. The convulsions to which most of these States were subject during that period may account for the want of sufficient data to elucidate the subject. It is, however, highly improbable that these fluctuations were not sensibly felt by them.

Having considered the nature and extent of the variations in value, to which a metallic currency is necessarily subject, it remains to examine whether it is practicable to devise a system by which a paper currency may be employed as the standard of value, with sufficient security against variations in its value, and with the same certainty of its recovering that value, when, from any cause, such variations shall have been produced. It is distinctly admitted that no such paper currency has ever existed. Where the experiment has been made directly by Government, excessive issues have quickly ensued, and depreciation has been the immediate consequence. Where the experiment has been attempted through the agency of banks it has invariably failed. In both cases, instead of being used as a mean of supplying a cheap and stable currency, invariably regulated by the demand, for effecting the exchanges required by the wants and convenience of society, it has been employed as a financial resource, or made the instrument of unrestrained cupidity. In no case has any attempt been made to determine the principles upon which such a currency, to be stable, must be founded. Instead of salutary restraints being imposed upon the moneyed institutions which have been employed, the vital principle of whose being is gain, they have not simply been left to the guidance of their own cupidity, but have been stimulated to excessive issues, to supply deficiencies in the public revenue. This is known to have been the case, in an eminent degree, in the experiment which has been attended with most success. The issues of the Bank of England, on account of the Government, were frequently so great as to destroy the demand for discounts by individuals. In consequence of these excessive issues, the interest of money fell below five per cent., the rate at which the bank discounted; the demand for discount at the bank, therefore, ceased. It is, indeed, not surprising that no systematic effort has been made to restrain excessive issues. In the case of banks, the experiments which have been made were intended to be temporary; they were the result of great and sudden pressure, which left but little leisure for the examination of a subject so abstruse.

The employment of a paper circulation convertible into specie, the favorite system of modern States, having, as has been attempted to be shown in a previous part of this report, the inevitable tendency to produce the necessity of resorting, in every national emergency, to paper not so convertible, imposes upon those who are called to administer the affairs of nations the duty of thoroughly examining the subject, with a view, if practicable, to avoid that necessity. If the examination should not result in the establishment of a paper currency, unconnected with specie, it may lead to the imposition of salutary checks against excessive issues, when the necessity of suspending payment may occur.

It has already been said that every attempt which has been made to introduce a paper currency has failed. It may also be said, that of all the systems which, during the discussion of this interesting subject, both in Europe and the United States, have been proposed, none are free from objections. It is possible that no system can be devised which will be entirely free from objection. To insure the possibility of employing such a currency with advantage, it is necessary—

1. That the power of the Government over the currency be absolutely sovereign;
2. That its stability be above suspicion;
3. That its justice, morality, and intelligence, be unquestionable;

4. That the issue of the currency be made not only to depend upon the demand for it, but that an equivalent be actually received;

5. That an equivalent can only be found in the delivery of an equal amount of gold or silver, or of public stock;

6. That whenever from any cause it may become redundant, it may be funded at an interest a fraction below that which was surrendered at its issue.

1. This proposition needs no elucidation. Coinage and the regulation of money have, in all nations, been considered one of the highest acts of sovereignty. It may well be doubted, however, whether a sovereign power over the coinage necessarily gives the right to establish a paper currency. The power to establish such a currency ought not only to be unquestionable, but unquestioned. Any doubt of the legality of the exercise of such an authority could not fail to mar any system which human ingenuity could devise.

2. A metallic currency, having an intrinsic value, independent of that which is given to it by the sovereign authority, does not depend upon the stability of the Government for its value. Revolutions may arise; insurrections may menace the existence of the Government: a metallic currency rises in value under such circumstances; it becomes more valuable, compared with every species of property, whether moveable or immovable, in proportion to the instability of the Government. Not so with a paper currency: its credit depends, in a great degree, upon the confidence reposed in the stability of the authority by which it was issued. Should that authority be overthrown by foreign force or intestine commotion, an immediate depreciation, if not an absolute annihilation, of its value would ensue.

3. It might, however, be saved from such destruction by a well-grounded confidence in the justice and intelligence of the Government which should succeed that which had been overthrown. The history of modern times furnishes examples that are calculated to inspire this confidence. In France, during the revolution which has just terminated, the public debt was reduced to one-third of its amount. The same rule was applied to the public debt of the Dutch Republic, when it fell under French domination. In the successive political changes to which France has, since that period, been subjected, the public debt and the public engagements have been maintained with the strictest good faith. In Holland, that portion of the public debt which had been abolished by the French Government has been restored. In the opinion of well informed men, however, the conditions connected with that restoration were so onerous as to render it almost nominal. Indeed, the public debt in that country had become so disproportionate to the means of the nation when deprived of the resources it enjoyed when the debt was contracted, that the reduction which it underwent while the country was annexed to the French Empire was not generally considered an evil. The reduction of the national debt of France during the Revolution was perhaps equally indispensable. If the intelligence of the age, and the influence of public opinion, even in States where the reign of law was but imperfectly established, have been sufficient to induce the Governments which have alternately succeeded each other for the last twenty-five years, in France and Holland, to respect the public engagements which had been previously contracted, well-grounded expectations may be cherished that the period is rapidly passing away when the public faith of nations can be violated with impunity.

If public engagements, under such circumstances, have been considered obligatory upon those who have successively administered the affairs of those nations, a reasonable confidence may be reposed in the fulfilment of the obligations which may be contracted by existing Governments, where the reign of law is firmly established. It is not denied that a paper currency furnishes strong temptations to abuse. Millions may be issued in a few days, and the deficiencies in the revenue promptly supplied, if the condition of receiving an equivalent is abandoned. The moment the currency shall be issued as a financial resource, depreciation will follow, and all the relations of society will be disturbed. If the Government of the nation in which a paper currency has been established shall be deeply impressed with this truth, will it not be restrained from the apprehended abuse? Currency of every kind is liable to great abuses. The history of the coinage of every nation whose annals are known, is little more than a detail of the frauds which have been practised by Governments upon the people. Until the twentieth year of the reign of Edward III. of England, a pound troy of silver, of standard fineness, and a pound sterling, were synonymous terms; twenty shillings sterling being, in fact, a pound troy of standard silver. Change followed change in rapid succession, until, in the reign of Elizabeth, a pound troy of standard silver was directed to be coined into sixty-two shillings. This immense change in the value of the currency was effected in the space of about two centuries. In other modern States, during the same period, changes not less important occurred in the coinage. Frequently, these changes were effected by deteriorating the standard fineness of the coin. For more than a century past, the coinage of the civilized world has undergone no material change with a view to the practice of fraud upon the people. Whether this forbearance is to be attributed to an improvement in the morality of modern Governments, or to a more correct understanding of the principles of currency and of the consequences that must result from every change by which the relations of society are affected, it furnishes just ground of expectation that they will not hereafter be attempted. Nothing more is necessary to secure an unalterable adherence to the maxims upon which it is manifestly necessary that a paper currency must be founded, in order to preserve a uniformity of value than the same morality and the same intelligence. Without assuming the principle of the perfectibility of human nature, the hope may be indulged that the nature of currency will continue to command the attention of statesmen, and that the abuses which have resulted from improper changes in the currency will not again occur in the same degree.

4. When the currency is metallic no addition can be made to it without giving an equivalent. It is indispensable that this condition should be annexed to the acquisition of the paper currency, preliminary to its entering into circulation. If it can be put in circulation only on paying its nominal amount in that which has a general and fixed value, determined by the consent of other nations, it will continue to preserve that value during the time it circulates, unless the relation which it bore at the time of its issue to the quantity of articles the exchanges of which it is destined to perform shall be varied.

5. As a paper currency is issued upon the national credit, the whole property of the nation is pledged for its redemption, whenever, by any circumstance, it may become the interest of the community that it should be redeemed. It is therefore manifest that it should not issue upon the credit of any individual, or association of individuals. A part can never be equal to the whole. The credit of any individual, or association of individuals, cannot be equivalent to that of the nation, of which they form a part. But it may be said that, although the credit of individuals is not equivalent to the credit of the nation, yet an equivalent for a particular portion of that credit may be found in the pledge or mortgage of property of equal or greater value than the currency issued upon it. This may be true; but the value of property has been continually fluctuating: it will continue to fluctuate, after giving to the advocates of a paper currency full credit for the superior stability which they suppose will attempt its substitution for gold and silver as the standard of value. But this is not the only objection to the acceptance of property, as a pledge for the payment, by individuals, of an equivalent for the paper currency which may be advanced upon such pledge. Frauds will be practised by pledging property which is encumbered, which it would be extremely difficult to detect. The Government will be involved in endless litigation with individuals who are interested in the encumbrances by which its rights to the property pledged is embarrassed. In such contests, the interest of the Government is always endangered, even where right is on its side. It is not qualified to enter into such litigations with an equal chance of success. The feelings of the community are always, except in flagrant cases of fraud, upon the side of an individual supposed to be struggling with the overwhelming influence of authority. Besides, in all contests of this nature, something of the respect for the Government, which ought to be cherished by the citizens, especially of a free State, will be lost. The situation is invidious, and ought not voluntarily to be assumed by a Government jealous of its dignity and purity of character. It is therefore believed that a national currency cannot be issued with safety, with a reasonable prospect of success, and with sufficient security against redundancy, but in exchange for gold and silver of a definite standard, or for the public stock at certain fixed rates. When issued in exchange for them, and for them alone, there is, though not the same, yet perhaps an equal security against redundancy as in the case of a metallic currency. When it is issued in exchange for coin, there is no addition made to the currency. When it is issued in exchange for public stock, commanding, previously to the exchange, its par value in coin, the party who acquires the currency parts with that which was equal to specie, and is deprived of the annual interest which it produced. Unless the interest of the currency, resulting from its scarcity, should exceed that paid upon the stock, it would not be demanded in exchange for the stock. In either case, the danger of redundancy is extremely remote. By the exchange of specie for currency, the active capital of the country will be increased to the amount of the currency; and the capacity of the nation to redeem it, whenever it shall, by any circumstance whatever, become expedient, will be unquestionable.

But it may be doubted whether, under such conditions, a paper currency ever can be put in circulation. Under a Government firmly established, conducted by upright and enlightened councils, and possessing absolute power over the currency, it is believed there is no just reason to apprehend a difficulty of that nature. If, in such a Government, banks existed, deriving their powers from it, the specie in their possession would be gradually exchanged for the paper currency which would become the basis of their operations. Not only the specie which they possessed would be thus exchanged, but exertions would, from time to time, be made to acquire the sums necessary to support their banking operations. Specie would be imported, even at an expense, for the purpose of being exchanged. Whilst specie formed the basis of the operations of banks, its importation could not fail to be productive of loss; each importation not only producing the necessity of additional importations, but at an increased expense. But, when importations shall be made for the purpose of being exchanged for the currency, the exportation of the specie thus imported will not affect the operations of the banks. It is only when the funding of the currency shall commence, that they will be admonished to desist from further importations. Individuals and banks would likewise exchange public stock at the rates prescribed by the system for the paper currency. Whenever the demand for currency should be such as to raise the interest of money considerably above that produced by the public stock, it would, by banks and individuals, be given in exchange for the currency. But the facility which the existence of a public debt furnishes in procuring the paper currency is counterbalanced by the difficulty of complying with the public engagement to discharge such debt in a metallic currency. After a paper circulation shall be substituted for gold and silver, they will be found in the country only in the quantity demanded for manufactures, and for such branches of commerce as are entirely dependent upon them. A considerable demand for gold and silver by the Government, to meet its engagements previously contracted, would raise their price, in the market, and render the obligation to discharge those engagements in the precious metals not only extremely onerous, but, perhaps, sometimes impracticable. In such a state, a compromise with the public creditors would seem to be a preliminary measure. This, under any circumstances, would be a measure of great delicacy and difficulty, and, in some cases, would probably be utterly impracticable.

6. Whenever, from any cause, the currency should become redundant, the redundancy may be funded at a rate of interest a fraction below the rate of legal interest.

In determining the rate at which it may be funded, due regard should be paid to the rate of interest previously existing in the State. The rate of interest, it is conceived, ought not to depend (and, where a metallic currency prevails, does not depend) solely upon the amount of currency necessary to perform with facility the exchanges required by the wants and convenience of society. In a new country, where there is but a slight accumulation of capital, the interest of money will be high, notwithstanding there may be even a redundancy of currency beyond what is necessary to effect its exchanges. In such a country, all the objects upon which capital may be employed, except those of the most simple kind, are unoccupied. The currency necessary to effect the exchanges of its property, moveable and immoveable, will be entirely insufficient to satisfy the demand for capital for those objects. If it should be multiplied so as to equal that demand, it would exceed the demand for the necessary exchanges of society, and consequently depreciate; such, in fact, it is believed, would be the consequence of issuing the currency upon individual credit, or upon the pledge of property, at a rate of interest below that which previously existed in the State. Any change of the interest of money by law, previous to its having taken place in individual transactions, in consequence of the accumulation of capital, would be unjust, and could not fail to produce serious inconvenience to the community. Admitting the rate of interest, in a State about to make the experiment, to be six per cent., then the currency should be issued only in exchange for specie, or six per cent. or other stock, according to that ratio. If the currency should, when by any means a redundancy existed, be fundable at five and a half per cent. interest, the utmost depreciation to which it could be subject would be eight and one-third per cent. But it is probable that the real depression in its value would not, at any time, be more than half that amount. Before funding would commence, the public stock receivable in exchange for the national currency would be above the rates at which it was receivable. Its issue upon the exchange of stock would therefore have ceased. There are, in every community capitalists who would prefer lending to the Government at five and a half per cent., than to individuals at six. The funding of the currency would therefore begin before the redundancy would offer any general inducement to that mode of reducing it. The variation to which its value would be subject, would therefore be less than eight and one-third per cent. It would be the interest of the Government to reserve the right of redeeming the stock created by funding at its par value, under the condition, however, of redeeming it according to the order of time in which it was created. Connected with this system should be a permission to the banks to purchase public stock, but not to dispose of it, except to the Government, at its par or current value when under par, unless the Government should decline the purchase. The currency, upon being funded, should be invariably cancelled. Under a system of this kind, if no other paper were permitted to circulate than the national currency, a redundancy which would affect its value could only occur by a temporary diminution of the articles which were to be exchanged through its instrumentality. In that event, the price of the articles would be enhanced so as to require a greater amount of currency to effect their exchange. Should the price not be enhanced in proportion to the diminution in the quantity of the articles, that portion of the currency which would, under such circumstances, be left without employment would be funded. A just relation between the amount of currency and the demand for it would be promptly restored, without affecting injuriously the relations between individuals. On the other hand, should a greater quantity of exchangeable articles be produced, the demand for currency would exceed the supply, and lead immediately to additional issues, until the necessary supply should be obtained.

But, in a State where banks already existed which derived their charters from the sovereignty that regulated the currency, where the people were accustomed to bank notes, and in the habit of receiving them, the agency of these institutions might be admitted in supplying a portion of the currency. They might be permitted to issue their notes, payable on demand, in the national currency; their notes would, of course, be issued on personal security. In this case, the currency might become redundant by the issues of the banks. Whenever this should happen, the national currency would be demanded of them for the purpose of being funded; the banks would be compelled to curtail their discounts, to relieve themselves from the pressure; and the amount of the currency would be promptly reduced to the legitimate demand. Wherever the agency of banks should be employed in furnishing part of the circulation, a refusal or omission to discharge their notes, on demand, in the national currency, should be treated as an act of bankruptcy. The national currency, being a legal tender in the payment of debts to individuals and to the Government, would, in relation to the banks, perform the functions of specie, where bank notes are convertible into coin. But, in order to impose a salutary check against excessive issues of bank notes, the national currency should alone be receivable in all payments to the Government.

In an attempt to trace the probable results of a paper currency, founded upon the principles which have been developed in the preceding pages, the influence which it will have upon foreign exchange requires investigation. The want of stability, morality, and intelligence in the Government which may undertake to substitute a paper for a metallic currency, are the objections which have already been considered. To these, according to common opinion, is to be added the injurious effect which it is supposed it will have upon foreign exchange. In a country where the currency is metallic, an unfavorable state of foreign exchange will probably have the following effects:

1st. To raise the price of exportable articles as much above that which they ought to bear as the premium paid upon foreign bills, until it exceeds the expense of exporting specie to the foreign market.

2d. When this rise exceeds the expense of such exportation, the price of exportable articles will fall gradually below what they ought to command, to the extent of that excess.

3d. Until this fall in their price shall be effected, specie will be exported; after which it will cease.

4th. This fall in their price, by increasing their consumption in the foreign markets, ultimately provides for the return of the specie which had been exported.

5th. During the second and third stages of this process, the price of all articles not exportable is affected in a greater degree, enterprise is damped, and distress prevails.

Such are the necessary effects of an unfavorable state of foreign exchange, where the currency is metallic. As the vital principle of commerce is gain, it is probable that, generally, the price of exportable articles would, in fact, be rather higher than is stated in the preceding deductions. The timid might export specie before the premium upon exchange exceeded the expense of its exportation; but timidity is not the predominant characteristic of commercial enterprise. On the other hand, the sanguine and enterprising, relying upon the chance of better markets, would give higher prices rather than submit to certain loss upon the exportation of specie, or the purchase of bills above par.

In a country where a paper currency has been adopted, and the principles by which a redundancy may be prevented have been enforced, an unfavorable state of foreign exchange will probably have the following effects:

1st. The effect of raising the price of exportable articles as much above what they ought to bear as equals the premium upon foreign bills; but, in this case, gold and silver, being exportable articles, will rise in the same proportion as all other articles.

2d. When the price of all articles is raised so high that a loss will be incurred by their sale in foreign markets, those who have no remittances to make will withdraw from the competition. If profitable investments in other enterprises cannot be made, a portion of the currency, at their disposition, will be withdrawn from circulation, by being converted into funded stock; competition will,

in this manner, be diminished; the price of articles for exportation will be reduced by the reduction of the currency, and by diminished competition among the purchasers. It is not probable, however, that the price will fall so low as to admit of a profit in foreign markets, as long as the premium upon exchange continues above the ordinary commercial profit upon exported articles. But exportation will not be continued at a certain loss longer than the discharge of debts previously contracted renders indispensable; foreign articles will not be imported, when the loss upon remittances, whether made by bills of exchange, or by the exportation of commodities, is equal to the profit upon importation; the high price given for exported articles will increase their production, and restore foreign exchange to a favorable state. The balance of trade and the rate of foreign exchange, which have given so much trouble to statesmen for two centuries past, when left to the laws by which they will be governed, in despite of human devices, as invariably regulate themselves, as fluids, when unrestrained, find their common level. They will probably more promptly conform to these laws in a State where a well regulated paper currency prevails, than where it is metallic. In the latter, the currency is exported to make up any temporary deficiency, and, by that means, provides against the recurrence of the evil, by indirectly causing an increase of the exportable articles of the State, and diminishing the importation of foreign articles. Until the capacity to purchase these by the exchange of articles shall be restored in the former, as the currency cannot be exported, the importations will be more promptly reduced to the capacity of the country to purchase, whilst the increase of its exportable articles will be the direct, instead of the indirect, consequence of a temporary incapacity to pay for previous importations.

3d. During the whole process of restoring a favorable state of exchange, in a country where a well regulated paper currency prevails, the price of all articles not exportable will suffer no material variation. The funding of the currency, which will probably take place, will not be immediately carried so far as to reduce the price of exportable articles so as to command a profit in foreign markets. They will, so long as the rate of exchange is unfavorable, continue to command higher prices than when the exchange is favorable. This increased price will encourage industry and enterprise, and constantly tend to augment the productive energies of the community. This effect cannot fairly be attributed to any depreciation in the currency. That will continue to bear nearly the same proportion to the exchangeable articles of the State as when foreign exchange was favorable. It is probable, even, that its relation to those articles will be changed, so as to produce an appreciation of the currency; and that this appreciation will be perceived, in a slight degree, in the depression of the value of all articles not exportable. The effects of this appreciation will, however, be diminished by the impulse given to industry and enterprise, by the increased price of all articles which can be exported.

These are conceived to be the effects which a well regulated paper currency will have upon the foreign exchanges, and upon the domestic industry of the country which may adopt it. If the value of currency depends, like that of all other articles, upon the quantity compared with the demand, the idea of its depreciation, in raising the price of articles in the case which has been considered, must be rejected. That this position is incontrovertible, seems to have been admitted by all writers upon the subject. This admission is found in the reports which have been made to the British Parliament; in the evidence upon which those reports have been founded; and in the essays of those who have opposed the paper system in that country since the year 1797. The objection to the paper system, as it existed in England, was the absence of all restraint upon the issue of paper, and the supposed impossibility of imposing any efficient restraint. In fact no attempt has been made to impose such restraint in that country, unconnected with the convertibility of bank notes into the precious metals. So far as this restraint is limited to the convertibility of bank notes into bullion, at any given rate, it is rather an attempt to regulate foreign exchange through the instrumentality of the bank, than to confine the issue of bank notes to the sound demand for currency. The restraint imposed seems to rest upon the idea that an unfavorable state of foreign exchange must be the result of a redundant currency. Nothing can be more incorrect than this hypothesis. Considering the vitiated state of the currency of England for more than twenty years past, it is not surprising that this idea should there be entertained. During that period the unfavorable rate of foreign exchange which generally prevailed was, if not directly, at least indirectly, attributable to the depreciation of their currency. But, in this interval, a favorable rate of foreign exchange more than once occurred. To what could this favorable change be attributed? Certainly not to the depreciation of their currency. But it would be as unjust to attribute every unfavorable state of foreign exchange to the depreciation of the currency, as to ascribe to that currency the credit of any favorable state of such exchange. The truth is, that fluctuations in the exchange between two countries having a metallic currency continually occur, and depend upon principles wholly unconnected with the idea of a depreciated currency.

If these views be correct, the only obstacles to the establishment of a paper currency, by a Government having a sovereign right to establish it, is the danger of the instability and want of integrity and intelligence of the Government. There is certainly just reason to apprehend that emergencies may arise in the affairs of every nation, in which their stability may be menaced, by foreign force or domestic insurrection. In such an event a panic might ensue, and the credit of the currency be utterly annihilated. How far the recent examples which have been adverted to in other States; how far the influence of public opinion over the conduct of Governments may be relied upon, as an efficient preventive against evils of such magnitude, must be determined by those to whom, under Divine Providence, the prosperity and happiness of nations are committed. The subject involves all the complicated interests of society, except the enjoyment of civil, political, and religious liberty. It ought to be approached with more than ordinary circumspection. In States the best qualified to attempt the change it is environed with doubts, which can only be dispelled by the light of experiment. In the United States these doubts are greatly increased by the complex form of the Government. In the division of power between the Federal and State Governments, the line of separation is not sufficiently distinct to prevent collisions, which may disturb the harmony of the system. Collisions have already arisen, and, in the course of human events, may be reasonably expected to arise, until the line of separation, by which their relative powers and duties are determined, shall be distinctly defined by practice, or by explanatory amendments of the Constitution, effected according to the forms prescribed in that instrument. Upon no question will collision more likely arise than that contemplated by the resolution under which this report is submitted. No attempt to make the change has succeeded. The measure, when stripped of extraneous difficulties, must be admitted to be of doubtful tendency. Under the most auspicious circumstances it may prove abortive; under circumstances in any degree adverse it must inevitably fail. Any obstacle opposed to its execution, by one or more of the State governments, would be decisive of its fate. Their simple acquiescence in the measure would not be sufficient to secure to it that issue to which the principles upon which it might be established would necessarily lead. Their active co-operation would be indispensable. The banks which derive their authority from the State governments are generally bound by their charters to discharge their notes in specie on demand. From this obligation it would be necessary to the system to relieve them. The obligation to discharge their notes upon demand, in the national currency, should be substituted for that of paying them in specie.

If these obstacles should be removed, that connected with the public debt, which has been suggested in a previous part of the report, would still remain. After the substitution of the national currency, gold and silver would be imported only in the quantity required for manufactures, and for the prosecution of those branches of trade in which they are primary articles of commerce. For these purposes the importations would be sufficient. They might even be sufficient, and at a reasonable price, for the payment of the annual interest of the public debt. But after the year 1824, when the sum of $10,000,000 would annually be expended by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, it is probable that the premium which would be paid upon it would be considerable, until the debt was extinguished. A compromise, as has already been suggested with the public creditors, would seem to be a measure preliminary to any attempt to establish a paper currency. It is more than probable that the attempt would not only be unsuccessful, but that it would injuriously affect the public credit.

It may also be proper to observe, that those sections of this Union where a measure of this kind would be most likely to be acceptable, would probably derive from it the least benefit. In the West and in the South, the complaints of a deficient currency have been most distinctly heard. In the latter these complaints are of recent date. In both, they proceed in a greater degree from the disbursement of the public revenue than from any other cause. The great mass of public expenditure is made to the east of this city. The revenue accruing from imports, though principally collected in the Middle and Eastern States, is paid by the great mass of consumers throughout the United States. That which is paid for the public lands, although in some degree drawn from every part of the Union, is principally paid by the citizens of the West and the South. The greatest part of the revenue accruing from the public lands, as well as that collected in the Southern States, upon imports; has been transferred to the Middle and Eastern States to be expended. The necessity of making this transfer arises from the circumstance that the great mass of the public debt is held in those States, or by foreigners, whose agents reside in them; and from the establishments of dock yards and naval stations in their principal ports. This transfer will continue to be necessary until the public debt shall be extinguished, and until the other expenditures of the Government can, consistently with the public interest, be more equally distributed. If a national currency should be established, the demand for it in the Southern and Western States, for the purpose of transmission, would be incessant; whilst its return, by the ordinary course of trade, especially in the latter, would be slow, and in some degree uncertain. The currency being everywhere receivable by the Government, would, for the purpose of remittance, be more frequently demanded in that section than specie, for the same reason that the notes of the Bank of the United States and its offices command there, at this time, a premium in specie. As the transfers of the public money are made by the Bank of the United States, the excitement produced by the demand for specie, or funds that can be remitted consequent upon such transfers, has been directed against that institution. All the evils which the community, in particular parts of the country, has suffered from the sudden decrease of the currency, as well as from its depreciation, have been ascribed to the Bank of the United States, which, in transferring the public lands, has been a passive agent in the hands of the Government.

It is, then, believed that the evils which are felt in those sections of the Union where the distress is most general, will not be extensively relieved by the establishment of a national currency. The sufferings which have been produced by the efforts that have been made to resume and to continue specie payments have been great. They are not terminated, and must continue until the value of property and the price of labor shall assume that relation to the precious metals which our wealth and industry, compared with those of other States, shall enable us to retain. Until this shall be effected, an abortive attempt, by the substitution of a paper currency, to arrest the evils we are suffering, will produce the most distressing consequences. The sufferings that are past will, in such an event, recur with additional violence, and the nation will again find itself in the situation which it held at the moment when specie payments were resumed. I have the honor to be, &c.

INTEREST ON OUTSTANDING MISSISSIPPI STOCK.

[Communicated to the Senate, March 3, 1820.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
March 2, 1820.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 23d ultimo, referring to this Department the petition of Henry Remsen and others, stating, among other things, that they are largely interested in Mississippi stock, issued under an act entitled "An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," that the outstanding stock created under that act was, on 10th December, 1819, $1,909,576 81; and that it appears, by the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, that sales of lands to an amount much exceeding the outstanding Mississippi stock have been made, but that the memorialists have not been able to ascertain at what period the claims of the State of Georgia have been satisfied, so as to entitle them to have their certificates paid; and stating that they consider themselves entitled to interest on the amount of their certificates from the period when the sales have amounted to a sum sufficient to pay the same, whether the amount was in the Treasury in money, or in obligations bearing interest; I have the honor to submit the enclosed proceedings of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, which will, it is believed, sufficiently explain the nature of the claim of the memorialists.

By referring to the act under which this claim has originated, it will be seen that the claim to interest, before the money is received into the Treasury, is without foundation. Their claim is to the money in the Treasury arising from the sales of the lands pledged, and not upon the United States for money due for those lands. As the act does not prescribe the manner in which the payment is to be made, when there shall be money in the Treasury applicable to the discharge of the outstanding stock, it is presumed that the United States have the right to direct the mode in which it shall be effected. The principle adopted by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund is believed to be equitable and just. Indeed, doubts may well exist whether the obligation to pay is perfect, until a sum shall have been received sufficient to discharge the stock.

By returns which have been received subsequently to the annual Treasury report of the 10th of December last, it is ascertained that the stock which has been received to the 1st of January last amounts to $2,435,216 18, leaving $1,846,934 94 outstanding; and that the receipts in money to the same period amounted to $2,800,408 11; from which the sum of $1,250,000 due to the State of Georgia, and $311,148 91, for the expenses of surveying, being deducted, leaves in the Treasury the sum of $1,239,259 20 applicable to the payment of the outstanding stock, which is equal to sixty-six per cent. thereof.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

HON. PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

At a meeting of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund—present, John Gaillard, President of the Senate pro tem.; John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States; John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State; William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury; William Wirt, Attorney General:

The Secretary of the Treasury reported that the stock issued under the act of the 31st of March, 1814, entitled "An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," amounts to $4,282,451 12; that, of this sum, there has been received at the Treasury and cancelled $2,435,216 18; and that there is now outstanding the sum of $1,846,934 94; that, of the proceeds of the public lands in the States of Mississippi and Alabama, after satisfying the claims of the State of Georgia, and the expenses of surveying said lands, there remains in the Treasury, applicable to the discharge of the said stock, the sum of $1,239,259 20; that this sum is equal to sixty-six per cent. of the stock outstanding: whereupon,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to apply the said sum of money in discharge of the said stock, in the proportion of sixty-six per cent. of each certificate thereof which may be presented at the Treasury upon and after the 15th day of May next.

J. GAILLARD, Pres. Senate pro tem.

J. MARSHALL, Chief Justice U. S.

JNO. Q. ADAMS, Secretary of State.

W. H. CRAWFORD, Sec'y Treas.

FEBRUARY 26, 1820.

NEW YORK, February 10, 1820.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned respectfully sheweth: That they are largely interested in Mississippi stock; that, by the certificates issued under the authority of an act of Congress passed in March, 1814, it is certified "that the amount is payable out of the first moneys in the Treasury of the United States arising from the sales of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, after the money due to the State of Georgia and the expenses of surveying such lands have been satisfied."

Remonstrance against a change in the Revenue System.

That it appears, by the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the amount outstanding of the awards made by the commissioners appointed for indemnifying certain claimants of public lands, which it is understood includes the Mississippi stock, was, on 10th December, 1819, $1,909,576 81; that it appears, by the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, that sales of lands to an amount much exceeding the outstanding balance of Mississippi stock, have been made, but your memorialists are unable to ascertain at what periods enough had been sold to satisfy the claims of the State of Georgia, and to entitle your memorialists to have their certificates paid. Your memorialists respectfully submit, that they consider themselves entitled to interest on the amount of their certificates from the period when sales of the lands pledged for the redemption of this stock have been made sufficient to pay the same, whether the amount was in the Treasury in money, or in obligations bearing interest; inasmuch as it cannot be doubted that such security has been taken as to the wisdom of the Government was deemed sufficient to render the final payment certain, and inasmuch as, on a different construction, the United States would be receiving interest for a delay of payment, manifestly at the expense of your memorialists.

Your memorialists, relying confidently in the justice of Congress, therefore respectfully pray that a law may be passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the Mississippi stock, with interest, from the period when it shall appear from the returns in the proper offices that sales to an amount sufficient to pay off the same have been made.

REMONSTRANCE AGAINST A CHANGE IN THE REVENUE SYSTEM IN RELATION TO CREDIT.

[Communicated to the House, March 11, 1820.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled :

The memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia respectfully sheweth : That your memorialists entertain, and beg leave to submit to your consideration, the following sentiments upon propositions which have been introduced to your notice, for a very important change in the revenue system of the United States.

That the scheme which was adopted at the commencement of our fiscal system, for the collection of duties on foreign imports, was wise, and well adapted to the state of the country, has, perhaps, never been questioned. Its excellence has been tested by nearly thirty years experience; and it may safely be said, that the advantages which were contemplated by the framers of this system have been secured. The Government has received its revenue with punctuality; it has sustained no loss by reason of the credit for duties, which deserves consideration. The collection has been made with the least possible expense; and a widely extended, active, and vigorous commerce has contributed largely to the stock of national wealth and prosperity.

In considering the proposition to abolish a system of credit which experience has thus approved, it becomes proper to inquire what are the evils which are supposed to be connected with the existing system, and what are the advantages which are expected to result from a change?

It is supposed by those who advocated a change, as your memorialists understand, that the credit for duties has furnished capital for an extension of business, and that from this cause have proceeded the embarrassments and difficulties which have been felt throughout the country.

The credit for duties is not intended, nor is it fairly to be considered, as putting the use of a capital into the hands of the merchant, because it does not in reality afford him a capital to trade upon, but simply relieves him from the burden of making an advance beyond his means. Its object is rather to be just than to be generous; and it is as wise and politic in relation to the community at large, as it is just to the importer. The foundation of the credit is the fact that the goods do not produce their price immediately upon importation; and the principle, that it would be unjust that the importer should be in advance to the Government for the duty, and severe upon the consumer that he should bear the heavy consequences of such an advance. It is, therefore, a wise and sound calculation, that, by allowing to the importer, upon good security, time, according to the nature of the commodity, to make his sales, the Government will receive its dues when it ought to receive them; and no one will suffer, as would be the case by an anticipation of the payment of duties on articles which oftentimes are long retained by the importer, and, when sold, are necessarily sold upon a liberal credit.

Your memorialists believe this view of the system to be correct; and, although instances may occur in which this credit is abused, and is made to furnish the means of wild adventure, it is an unsound argument to draw therefrom an inference against the system.

Your memorialists are convinced, upon these grounds, that the opposers of the present system of credit for duties entertain mistaken views in relation to the nature, policy, and operation of the system itself, in supposing that it furnishes a capital to trade upon, and has a connexion with the evils and embarrassments which afflict this country.

Duty on Imported Molasses.

The capital of the country has doubtless increased, and, at particular periods of time, it may be that even more is devoted to commerce than can be profitably employed. Whenever this is found to be the case, there can be no doubt that the surplus will readily find its way into other channels, and seek for employment in more profitable modes.

But it cannot be pretended that there is an excess of capital in the country; and, until that shall be the case, it would seem to be unwise to condemn to a state of inactivity so great a portion as would, by the plan proposed, be continually in deposit in the public stores.

And further, your memorialists are convinced that the reasoning is erroneous which is founded upon the supposition that an extension of capital, or credit equivalent to capital, would be productive of mischief.

It is not alleged, as your memorialists believe, by the advocates of a change, that it would promote the great objects which are ever to be regarded in relation to revenue—security of the debt, punctuality in its payment, and ease and economy in its collection. On the contrary, it must be doubted whether, if a system of deposits of public stores were established, the collection would not be more expensive, and the payment less certain and punctual, than at present. It is well known that, in times past, the calculations of the Treasury upon the receipt of duties have been made without disappointment; and that this portion of the public income is collected without oppression or inconvenience to those who pay, and with little expense to the Government. So far, then, as relates to the great interests of the Treasury, the contemplated change seems to promise no advantage.

If the proposed change should be effected, your memorialists conceive that much mischief would unavoidably ensue.

The men of moderate capital, however deserving of confidence, and however active and skilful in the prosecution of business, would be driven from the field; and it would be occupied alone by men of large capital, who could bear the burden of heavy advances for duties upon unsold goods. Even these would probably be foreign agents, who, by a system of exchange, could comply with the requisites of law, without, in fact, making the same advances as must be made by the American merchant. We should exchange a certain for an uncertain revenue; the expense of collection would be increased; and if the perils of fire, waste, pillage, and sacrifice by sale of unredemmed goods, be regarded, it may be said that the ultimate product would, no doubt, be diminished.

But, above all, your memorialists beg leave to suggest that the present state of the country is adverse to such a measure as that proposed. At a moment of general embarrassment, to call for such advances as this plan requires would make the embarrassment doubly felt, and give a most serious blow to the commerce of the country.

Your memorialists hereupon express the earnest hope that there will be a firm and unyielding adherence to the system of credit, which is founded in justice and a wise policy, and which has been approved by the experience of many years; and that the mere hope of escaping from present evils, by an untried way, opposed to such experience, will not be permitted to influence the Government to an abandonment of this system.

ROBERT RALSTON,
President of the Chamber of Commerce.

DUTY ON MOLASSES.

[Communicated to the Senate, April 13, 1820.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The subscribers, being merchants, distillers, and owners of distilleries, in the town of Boston and its vicinity, beg leave respectfully to represent: That the proposed increase of duty on molasses will, if carried into effect, prove not only injurious to them, but, through them, to the most important interests of our country.

In the first place, the consumption of molasses for the purpose of distilling enables the West India planter to buy the produce of our fisheries, soil, and domestic industry, and to pay for it in an article which, being bulky, furnishes employment and freight for an immense tonnage, and is a raw material, which, in the process of manufacture, gives employment to as great a portion of the active industry of the country as any branch of business whatever. And your memorialists cannot see why a raw material, and principally for the manufacture of rum, should be chargeable with a duty equal to one-half its first cost, when hides, skins, copper, brass, tin, dye-woods, rags, and a variety of other raw materials, are suffered to be imported duty free. Nor can your memorialists understand the policy which should thus paralyze, and perhaps destroy, a very old manufacture, the very buildings and apparatus of which, in the various establishments of this commonwealth, may be estimated at one million of dollars; making, annually, from thirty to forty thousand hogsheads of rum, and furnishing the means of subsistence for thousands of persons; furnishing a most important article of trade, for our coasting business; and creating a demand, for putting up the molasses and rum, of one hundred and sixty thousand casks.

Your memorialists might enter into a great variety of details to show the importance of the distilling business to the public; but it must be obvious to your honorable body, without the necessity of its being forced on your observation, that the active industry of the country, employed in the importation of fifty of sixty thousand hogsheads of molasses into the United States; the wharfage, cartage, cooperage, storage, and labor, consequent on the landing; the vessels employed to bring the molasses; the seamen who navigate them; the labor, wood, carting, and other expenses necessary to convert it into rum; the casks, coop-erage, carting, and tonnage necessary to distribute the rum to its various consumers—that these operations of trade, consequent to, and connected with, the distilling business, being considered, it may safely be affirmed that, with the sole exception of the manufacture of flour, there is hardly another species of manufacture which sets in motion and supports such a large and important portion of the productive industry of the United States as the distillation of rum.

In addition to what your memorialists conceive the injustice of taxing the raw material used for one species of manufacture, when the principal raw materials for other species of manufactures are imported duty free, your memorialists beg leave to state that, in New England, generally, the consumption of molasses by the poor, always great, has increased, and is increasing, since the diminished value of all our own products; the consumers being unable to afford to pay for sugar, as formerly.

Your memorialists may be suffered to remark, with some surprise, that in a tariff of duties, purporting to encourage domestic manufactures, the raw materials for such a manufacture as the distilling of rum from molasses (one of the oldest manufactures in the country, and intimately connected with the lumber, fishing, coasting, and West India trade) should be taxed, as before stated, to about one-half of its first cost.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURES.

[Communicated to the Senate, April 15, 1820.]
To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of the Pennsylvania Society for the encouragement of American manufactures respectfully sheweth: That your memorialists have read, with the deepest regret, two remonstrances presented to your honorable Houses, from agricultural societies in the State of Virginia, deprecating your interposition, in favor of the manufacturing part of the community.

These documents, containing sundry allegations injurious to your memorialists, and resting, as shall be made to appear, on an unsound basis, require a detailed investigation, to which we respectfully request your attention.

We must premise, that we should have hoped that the ruin of so many of the manufacturers, the depressed state of those who have hitherto escaped the situation in which their brethren have been involved, and the distresses of that class whose sole dependence is on their labor, would have prevented this unkind interference, calculated to continue their sufferings; that the generous sympathy which their situation ought to have excited in the breasts of fellow-citizens, embarked in one common cause, would have averted this hostility, even had all the allegations of the remonstrances been irrefragable; whereas, we hope to prove that such as are of any importance are easily susceptible of refutation. The disappointment fills us with surprise and regret, and is ill calculated to foster those kind regards and attachments which ought to subsist among members of the same community, and which we have always cherished towards our agricultural fellow-citizens.

But our appeal and that of our brethren has not been made to the generosity or compassion of our fellow-citizens. We appeal to their honor—to their justice. We ask, at length, after a lapse of thirty years in which the Government has existed, for a share of that protection so bountifully bestowed upon commerce, and which agriculture, as will appear, has abundantly enjoyed.

The allegations of the agricultural societies are principally confined to three points:

1. The extortions said to have been committed by manufacturers during the war.

2. The danger and oppression of monopolies, exclusive privileges, &c.

3. The injustice of affording protection to manufactures, when agriculture disclaims all protection.

There are sundry minor points, which we shall pass over, in order to avoid prolixity.

The charge of extortion is couched in these words:

“We submit respectfully to your wisdom the impolicy of subjecting so large a portion of your fellow-citizens to such unreasonable cupidity; of laying them at the mercy of an association, which, competition being removed, will no longer consider the intrinsic value of an article, or what price would afford a fair profit to the manufacturer, but how much the necessities of the consumer would enable them to extort. Of this spirit we had a sufficient specimen during our late contest with Great Britain.”

This uncharitable accusation we hope to prove wholly destitute of foundation. The article on which it chiefly rests is superfine broadcloth, which was raised from eight or nine dollars, the price before the war, to twelve, thirteen, and fourteen, during the war. The reasoning applicable to this case applies with equal force to all the others.

All doubt of the injustice of this allegation will be laid at rest forever by the simple fact that merino wool, the raw material of that cloth, which, before and shortly after the commencement of the war, was sold at seventy-five cents per pound, was raised during the war to three and four dollars—an advance of three hundred per cent.; so that there was less profit per cent. on the capital employed by the manufacturer at high prices of the cloth, so much the subject of complaint, than at the former moderate price.

We trust that this strong fact, which can be judicially proved at the bar of your Houses, will prevent any man of honor or candor, as he values his reputation, from ever again repeating so unfounded an accusation.

But if we have never retorted this charge against our accusers, if we have forborne recrimination, it has not been for want of materials, but from an unwillingness to cherish an unkind and unfriendly spirit towards our fellow-citizens. And now, notwithstanding the repeated and wanton provocations we have received, we resort to the measure with pain. We should gladly have buried in oblivion all our causes of complaint, and cherished a kind and fraternal spirit, in the hope of exciting a suitable reciprocation. But the style and manner of the accusations against us, their unceasing repetition, the hostile disposition they display, and the ruinous consequences they are calculated to produce on the general welfare of the nation, render it a duty to ourselves, to our country, and to the cause of truth, to prove that our accusers are far from invulnerable in this point, and are under high obligations to us for past forbearance.

In the year 1788 flour was four dollars per barrel in our seaports, which was regarded as a fair and liberal price. In the next year the demand for the supply of France took place, and this article was raised to five and six dollars; from year to year afterwards it rose to ten, twelve, and fourteen dollars; and probably it averaged, during the whole of the French revolution, above ten. We submit to a candid world whether this fact does not more completely establish the charge of "extortion," than the rise of broadcloth from eight or nine to fourteen dollars, or even to thirty, had it taken place, when the raw material rose from seventy-five cents to four dollars per pound; and whether the rise on the wool itself is not incomparably more "extortionate" than that on the broadcloth? The latter was not only justifiable, but imperiously necessary, by the rise which we have stated on the raw material; but, for the rise on wool or flour, no such reason existed. It did not proceed from any advance "in the intrinsic value of the article," to borrow the words of the Petersburg remonstrance, "nor from a consideration of what price would afford a fair profit to the" farmers; "but how much the necessities of the consumers enabled them to extort."

At the same period (1788) butter was ten cents per pound; beef and pork five cents; tobacco three or four; and all other agricultural articles in the same proportion. They have since been raised from one to two hundred per cent. above those prices. Yet we have never alleged against the farmers or planters the odious charge of "extortion," at which they would have revolted. Have they, we ask, a right to raise their prices one or two hundred per cent. at pleasure, when the demand warrants it, without "extortion;" and yet to wound the feelings and injure the characters of their fellow-citizens, by the odious imputation of "extortion," when the advance of the raw material by themselves renders a rise of manufactures necessary? If this be a chartered privilege, we wish to know whence it is derived, and by what tenure it is held. Seriously, we presume this to be the strongest illustration of the parable of the beam and the mote that the variegated history of mankind presents.

Flour is now four dollars and seventy-five cents per barrel on the seaboard. Should war or famine take place in Europe, the price would be immediately raised one, two, three, four, or five dollars per barrel; and in proportion to the intensity of the distress would be the tax levied on the consumers in this country. There are about three millions of white people in the United States not engaged in agriculture, who consume, on an average, two barrels of flour per annum. A rise of three dollars, which might take place immediately, in case of a very extraordinary demand, would amount, on this article, to a gain of eighteen millions of dollars, levied by the farmers on the rest of the community during the ensuing year, exclusive of probably an equal amount on all other agricultural productions, liable to a proportionate advance of price. And this is not a mere hypothesis of what may occur; it is the history of the last thirty years, and of the immense prices (again to borrow the vituperant language of the remonstrance) which "the necessities of the consumers have enabled" the farmers "to extort."

Nothing but the endless, the irritating misrepresentations we have experienced, would induce us to retort this strong language upon our accusers.

The United Agricultural Societies of Virginia prefer a claim to a high degree of superiority over the other classes of the community, which calls for observation. They state that—

"In every nation, with whose internal affairs we are familiarly acquainted, the landed interest has been proverbial for their liberality in comparison with any other class."

It is unfortunate that this assumption of liberality appears in an instrument, the direct object of which is to bar the door to the relief of their fellow-citizens, and to consign them and their families to that wretchedness and ruin which has befallen so many of their brethren! Before this claim to "proverbial liberality" can be admitted, proofs must be adduced different from the document in which it is asserted. The contrast between this strong assumption and the object of the remonstrance, though very striking, is not uncommon. Every day's experience so strongly proves the extreme discrepancy between profession and practice, that no illustration can be necessary.

The societies distinctly hold forth to the world that agriculture neither has been, nor is, secured by "protecting duties." They state—

"We solicit not the fostering care or patronage of the Legislature to alleviate, by bounties, monopolies, or protecting duties, calamities in their nature as inevitable as they are incurable by legislative interposition."

The Fredericksburg Society also state—

"We ask no tax upon manufacturers for our benefit. Neither do we ask any thing of Government, to enable us to cultivate the soil as we could wish."

The high character of the members of those societies forbids the supposition that this was an intentional misstatement. We are, therefore, inexpressibly astonished at the utter unacquaintance with the real state of the case betrayed in these quotations, which evinces how superficially these gentlemen studied the subject on which they undertook to interpose to prevent the success of our applications for relief.

The view they present is so far from fact, that it is the reverse of fact. The average of duties on such agricultural productions as are usually imported into this country has been, from the commencement of the Government, far higher than those on manufactures.

We will state the case at two periods, remote from each other, viz., 1789 and 1820. The intermediate space exhibits the same features.

In the former period, cheese was subject to a duty equal to fifty-seven per cent.; indigo sixteen, snuff ninety, manufactured tobacco one hundred, coals fifteen, hemp and cotton twelve; whereas, seven-eighths of all the manufactures imported, including cottons, woollens, and iron, were subject to only five per cent. This, we presume, is full proof of the inequality of the system of legislation with which the Government commenced, and of the care with which the agriculturists, who formed the great mass of the National Legislature, guarded their own interests.

Hemp, at present, is subject to a duty equivalent to twenty-six per cent.; cotton thirty, cheese ninety, spirits eighty, snuff seventy-five, manufactured tobacco one hundred, coals thirty-eight and a half, sugar thirty-seven and a half, and potatoes fifteen—averaging fifty-eight per cent. Few other articles, the product of the earth, are imported; but they are all, except three or four, subject to fifteen per cent.

Of the manufactures imported in the year 1818, one twenty-fifth part paid a duty of seven and a half per cent., one-third fifteen, one-sixth twenty, two-fifths twenty-five, and one twenty-fifth part thirty per cent.*

On this striking contrast, which affords no proof of "the proverbial liberality" of the landed interest, we offer but a single comment. It adds one to the numerous melancholy instances with which history abounds, that where one particular interest predominates in a legislative body, the others rarely experience impartial justice. We will notice only one article, which places in a strong point of light the different degree of protection experienced by agriculture and manufactures. Cotton, a raw material, is subject to a duty of thirty per cent., and the freight is about the same. The cotton planter has therefore a protection of sixty per cent.; whereas fine muslins and cambrics pay but twenty-seven and a half per cent. duty, and the freight is not more than one or two per cent. Thus, the planter, who disclaims the idea of "protection," has an advantage over his manufacturing fellow-citizens of above thirty per cent., independent of the immense difference between the protection necessary for articles produced by agriculture and those by machinery. It may be assumed, without danger of contradiction, that cotton would be better protected by a duty of twenty per cent. than cambrics or muslins by sixty or seventy. We do not find that the tariff of any other country whatever presents such an extraordinary feature.

Great emphasis is laid, by the agricultural societies, on the danger of "monopolies granted to one class or order at the expense of another."

This forms a fertile theme, on which they descend very freely. They remonstrate against—

"Unequal and partial taxes, awarding exclusive privileges, or sustaining the manufacturers in the enjoyment of oppressive monopolies, which are ultimately to grind us and our children after us to dust and ashes."

"In this way alone can the benefits of good government be equalized among the various orders and classes of society, the prosperity and happiness of which depend not upon immunities, privileges, and monopolies granted to one class or order at the expense of another," &c.

We are constrained to state, that the want of due consideration which prevails throughout the remonstrances is here very conspicuous. Monopoly, according to Johnson, means "the exclusive privilege of selling any thing." And a monopolist, according to the same authority, is "one who, by engrossing or by patent, obtains the sole power or privilege of vending any commodity." There is not, therefore, such a thing or person in this country as a monopoly or monopolist; nor, while our present Constitution exists, can there be a monopoly. For, suppose manufactures of wool, cotton, iron, and leather were altogether prohibited, those branches would be open to the admission, and consequently to the competition, of any part of the community—to farmers as well as others, and even to capitalists from any and every part of Europe, if they judged proper to embark in them. Where, then, is the monopoly?

While the agricultural societies were thus denouncing what they thought proper to brand with the odious term "monopoly," they did not reflect that they were themselves far more liable to the accusation than those against whom they preferred it. The great mass of the manufactured articles purchased by the farmers and planters of the Southern States, and probably one-half of what are purchased by those in the others, are imported. Whereas, the manufacturers of the United States have not consumed of foreign articles of food and drink, since the organization of the General Government, two per cent.

Thus, while there has been an incessant clamor against "the monopoly" of the manufacturers, whose market is open to and engrossed by rivals from half the nations of Europe, it appears that the farmers and planters have what they term "a monopoly;" which, however, is only an exclusive supply of the home market. It may be doubted whether a more extraordinary case is on record.

We shall conclude our observations on those memorials with one further extract.

serves) "against the possibility of misapprehension, we take this occasion to say that we are incapable of feeling any thing like enmity against manufacturers, or any other useful description of citizens, but heartily wish them all the success to which their skill and industry may entitle them, in whatever way applied."

This declaration would have been more acceptable, and claimed our gratitude, had it not accompanied an attempt, on the part of those who make it, to do us all the injury in their power to inflict; to prevent a compliance with our just claims, and to perpetuate our present intolerable sufferings.

Your memorialists regret to find that the same adverse spirit towards them that prevails among these small bodies of their agricultural fellow-citizens has been excited among a portion of the mercantile class. They request your favorable hearing of a few remarks on the memorial of the merchants of Salem on this subject. It "calls the attention of Congress to measures that have recently been proposed, and apparently approved, for the purpose of prohibiting the importation of foreign woollen and cotton goods."

Your memorialists are constrained to state that this view is very uncandid. They never did contemplate "a prohibition of foreign cotton and woollen goods," generally. There is not a sane man in the country who, if he had the power, would enact a total exclusion. A large portion of those goods is not, and for a long time to come cannot be, manufactured in this country, and therefore must be imported. Your memorialists deprecate and solemnly protest against the influence of a system which has been heretofore too successfully pursued; that is, defeating their fair and legitimate objects, by ascribing to them views which they wholly disclaim. Of this unfair system, their dearest interests have been frequently the victims. Were it necessary, they could produce numerous instances of early and recent date.

"If we are not willing to receive foreign manufactures, we cannot reasonably suppose that foreign nations will receive our raw materials."

"We cannot force them to become buyers when they are not sellers, or to consume our cottons when they cannot pay the price in their own fabrics."

"We cannot expect them to carry on a ruinous trade, when the profit is all on our side."

These paragraphs are liable to the exceptions urged against the preceding one. They assume the extraordinary idea, (which insanity alone could harbor,) that importation is expected to be wholly prohibited. All that is necessary for the restoration of the country, and for the prosperity of the manufacturers, is such a modification of the tariff as will reduce our imports within the limits of our exports, and prevent our manufactures and manufacturers from being overwhelmed by the inordinate inundation of foreign fabrics.

"While the manufacturers are left free to engage in their own peculiar pursuits, enjoying, in common with others, a reasonable protection from the Government, the memorialists trust it is no undue claim on their part to plead for the freedom of commerce also, as the natural ally of agriculture and naval greatness."

There is an assumption here of "freedom for the manufacturers," which is not warranted by the fact. When their business is annihilated, and themselves ruined by the immoderate introduction of foreign merchandise, as has occurred to too many of them, can it be said that they "are free to engage in their own peculiar pursuits?" We will render this plain, by applying it to the case of the merchants. The vessels employed in the coasting trade for thirty years have averaged about four hundred thousand tons annually. Were foreign vessels allowed to engage in that trade, to the amount of three hundred thousand tons, would it not be a mockery were the merchants informed, while their ships were rotting at the wharves, and themselves reduced to bankruptcy, that "they were free to engage in their own peculiar pursuits?" And is it not a perfectly analogous case, when the manufacturers are ruined, and their machinery rotting and rusting through the extravagant influx of foreign articles, to be gravely told that they are "free to engage in their own peculiar pursuits?"

"It is a sound political maxim, that the more free trade is, and the more widely it circulates, the more sure will be its prosperity. Every restriction which is not indispensable for the purposes of revenue is a shoal which will impede its progress, and not unfrequently jeopard its security."

The doctrine here advanced, on the broad and unqualified scale on which it is predicated, is unsound and contrary to the practice of the most prosperous States, and to the principles of the wisest statesmen. Can the prosperity of trade be promoted by the free introduction of foreign luxuries, which destroy the industry of our own citizens? Has it been promoted by the immoderate quantities of goods imported into this country, whereby its circulating medium has been exhausted, and an enormous debt contracted for articles which our own citizens could have supplied?

To test this plausible maxim, which has done infinite injury to this country, we will, as in the former case, apply it to the merchants themselves. The use of foreign vessels is almost virtually prohibited in this country by "restrictions not indispensable for the purposes of revenue." Suppose these "restrictions" were removed, and that foreign vessels were entitled to the same privileges as our own, what would be the consequence? They would be employed here in large numbers, to the ruin of the merchants and ship-builders. Would they not, in that case, as zealously contend against the maxim as they now uphold it? And can there be any just reason why the manufacturer, entitled to equal rights with the merchant, should be ruined by foreign rivals, and the merchant secured against this rivalry? In the scales of impartial justice, the rights of each ought to have equal weight.

Although the merchants of Salem invoke Congress in such emphatical terms to support that "freedom of trade" which impoverishes the nation, and, by exposing their manufacturing fellow-citizens to the competition of rivals in every quarter of the world, has ruined so large a portion of them, there is scarcely a session in which the mercantile interest does not memorialize Congress for protection against foreign competition. On this conduct, so partial to themselves, and so excessively unkind to us, we dare not trust ourselves to comment.

It would extend this memorial to an unreasonable length if we particularized one-half of the "restrictions" of foreign commerce in favor of our merchants. We shall confine ourselves to a few prominent cases to prove that this maxim, now so zealously urged, has had no weight when the interests of that class were at stake; and that the "restrictions" on foreign commerce which they succeeded in obtaining, were not only "not indispensable for the purposes of revenue," but in many cases pernicious to it.

When the competition of foreign merchants in the coasting trade was wisely destroyed in the very outset of the Government, by a heavy prohibitory tonnage duty, and afterwards by positive prohibition, was this measure "indispensable for the purposes of revenue?" Was it not, according to the Salem memorial, a "shoal to impede the progress of trade?"

When, in the first session of Congress, foreign merchants were excluded from the China trade by extra duties on teas imported in foreign vessels, averaging one hundred and seven per cent., were they "necessary for the purposes of revenue?" Did they not rather impair the revenue?

When, more recently, an extra tonnage duty of two dollars per ton was imposed on foreign vessels arriving from ports which American vessels were not allowed to enter, was this "necessary for the purposes of revenue?" Where then was the alarm about "shoals to impede the progress of trade?"

Was the act prohibiting the introduction of plaster of Paris in foreign vessels "necessary for the purposes of revenue?" or was it not rather "a shoal to impede the progress of trade?"

Was the act passed in a late session of Congress, of which the object was to coerce the British nation to abandon the chief feature of their navigation act, which they prize so highly, "necessary for the purposes of revenue?" Has it not, on the contrary, injuriously affected revenue and agriculture?

And, in fine, we ask, and hope for a fair and explicit answer, whether the strong "restrictions" now contemplated against both Great Britain and France are "necessary for the purposes of revenue?" Whether they are not, like the former, "shoals to jeopard" agriculture and "revenue?"

The acts above alluded to, and a great variety of others which abound in our statute book, do not require much comment. They speak a language not to be misunderstood. It appears, and cannot fail to astonish your honorable Houses, that while the merchants have, from the commencement of the Government, applied for and been favored with "restrictions" not only "not necessary for the purposes of revenue," but in many cases pernicious to it, a portion of them now use all their energies to defeat the reasonable objects of your memorialists, and consign them to destruction, on the ground that the restrictions contemplated are "not necessary for the purposes of revenue."

"One sacrifice is to be demanded after another; one prohibition heaped upon another until all the sources of foreign commerce are dried up; and domestic manufactures, sustained by enormous bounties, absorb the whole moneyed capital of the nation."

It ill becomes the advocates of a commerce "sustained by enormous bounties," in the shape of tributes to Barbary Powers; foreign intercourse; a most oppressive naval expenditure, amounting for the current year to $3,500,000; a commerce which has entailed on the nation a war debt of nearly $80,000,000, to hold this language respecting manufactures, on which the Government has never expended a single cent in thirty years. And what, we ask, has called forth this emphatical denunciation of manufactures? Merely a request, on the part of the manufacturers, of a duty of forty or fifty per cent. on cottons, wools, iron, and some other articles, in order to enable our citizens to compete with the half-starved and half-clothed workmen of foreign nations. This is the tremendous danger which is "to dry up all the sources of foreign commerce," and "absorb all the moneyed capital of the nation!"

We cannot forbear to state that it is no proof of the intrinsic goodness of a cause, when its advocates are reduced to the necessity of drawing high-colored and extravagant portraits of dangers which have no existence but in their own heated imaginations.

"It is not a little remarkable that these attempts are not only repugnant to those maxims of free trade which the United States have hitherto so forcibly and perseveringly contended for as the sure foundation of national prosperity, but they are pressed upon us at a moment when the statesmen of the Old World, in admiration of the success of our policy, are relaxing the rigor of their own systems, and yielding themselves to the rational doctrine, that national wealth is best promoted by a free interchange of commodities, upon principles of perfect reciprocity."

It is painful to us to state that this entire paragraph rests upon untenable ground. We look in vain for the evidences of "the national prosperity" on which the merchants predicate their reasonings. Where are those evidences to be found? Is it in the decay and destruction of so large a portion of the national industry? If this be a sign of "national prosperity," then is this nation prosperous to a degree unexampled in its annals, except in the interval between the close of the Revolutionary war and the establishment of the present form of government. Is it in the decline of commerce and navigation? Is it in the bankruptcy of so large a portion of the merchants, traders, and manufacturers of the country? Is it in the violent measure which the Legislatures of four or five of the States have adopted, of arresting the course of justice, and suspending the collection of debts? Is it in the augmentation of poor rates, the increase of mendicants and soup houses? Is it in the failure of revenue to the enormous amount of $5,000,000 for the present year? Is it in the exclusion of one of our chief staples from the British markets, and the very great depreciation of the price of the rest? Is it, in a word, in that state of affairs, justly characterized in a recent report, by the Secretary of the Treasury, in these strong terms:

"But few examples have occurred of distress so general, and so severe, as that which has been exhibited in the United States?"

These, alas! are no symptoms of "national prosperity," and of "the success of our policy," which, we are told, and with a grave and sober air, as if the assertion were irrefragable, excites "the admiration of the statesmen of the Old World!"

We look around in vain, we repeat, for this "national prosperity," which sounds so captivately. And we look equally in vain for "the admiration of the statesmen of the Old World," of "the success of our policy," which is brought forward to tickle our national vanity. It would be vain to seek for the "success of a policy," which, after twenty years of a most extensive commerce, in which we received exorbitant prices for all our staples, has, in five years of profound peace, with abundant harvests, and wholly free from any natural calamity, reduced an intelligent, industrious, active population, possessed of almost every possible advantage of soil and climate, with water power unequalled in the world, from a towering state of prosperity to its present lamentable situation—a situation which, notwithstanding "the admiration of the statesmen of the Old World," emphatically warns us to change a policy, which built our prosperity not on the solid basis of national industry, but on the wretched foundation of foreign wars and famines, and has rendered us dependent on foreign nations even for the chief part of the clothes we wear, although possessed of the most valuable raw material in the world, to an extent commensurate with the demand of nearly half the globe.

But if we look in vain for this "national prosperity," for "the success of our policy," and for "the admiration of the statesmen of the Old World," we look equally in vain for "the relaxation of the rigor of their system." When this memorial was draughted, early in January last, and likewise when it was presented to Congress, on the 31st of that month, there was not before the American nation a trace of such relaxation in any part of Europe whatever. The assumption, therefore, on which so much of the argument of the memorial is predicated was unwarranted by the fact.

The countries with which the chief part of our intercourse is carried on are Great Britain and France. In the three last years of our domestic exports, amounting to $192,000,000, there were $141,000,000 exported to these two countries; whereas, to Russia, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Prussia, the Hanse Towns, and all the ports of Germany, we only exported $11,000,000. Of course, we are little interested in the commercial arrangements of those nations.

The signers of the Salem memorial are called upon to produce any symptom in Great Britain or France of this very extraordinary "admiration," or its effects. Our policy is truly a subject of "admiration" for the desolation it has produced, as hurricanes and tornadoes are; but not of imitation to any wise nation. No symptoms of such imitation can be found. On the contrary, the cords are every day drawn tighter. So far as respects France, the Edinburgh Review for July, 1819, informs us that—

"The anti-commercial system of the ex-Emperor, instead of being modified or repealed, has, in fact, been adopted in all its extent, by his legitimate successors, and in their hands has become doubly efficient."

No alteration has taken place since that period. We are therefore warranted to state that the "admiration" and imitation of "the success of our policy," which form so capital an item in the Salem memorial, cannot be substantiated in France. And the rigorous acts recently passed and now contemplated by this Government, to counteract the British restrictive commercial policy, prove that that nation, in like manner, does not fall within the description of the Salem memorial, as excited to "admiration" or imitation of "our policy" by its wonderful "success."

When the Salem merchants laid down the maxim that "national wealth is best promoted by a free interchange of commodities, upon principles of perfect reciprocity," did they mean to convey the idea that the United States enjoy such a "free interchange?" It cannot be. There is no nation in the world which carries on commerce more completely destitute of "perfect reciprocity."

Our ports are open to the manufactures of all the world. Whereas, most of the ports of Europe, and all those of the colonies of that quarter of the globe, are shut against ours. This is a practical commentary on the "perfect reciprocity" which the Salem memorial insinuates we enjoy.

Again: we exchange necessities of life, and raw materials in the most rude state, for manufactures elaborated with the last finish of human industry and skill: thus, in every case, we exchange the labor of two or three, and, in many, that of ten, twenty, and thirty persons for one. Our cotton is returned to us in a manufactured state at an average of fivefold its original cost.

It is this species of one-sided "perfect reciprocity" which has produced "a distress so general and severe" that "few examples" of equal intensity "have occurred," and which has rendered the situation of the United States an object of regret and sympathy for its friends, and of exultation for its enemies. It is full time for the guardians of the nation's rights to secure to it something like "reciprocity," in its intercourse with the rest of the world.

We cannot close this memorial without expressing our astonishment and regret that an idea could ever have prevailed of the existence of hostility between the interests of agriculture and manufactures; whereas, the great mass of the productions of the former derive their chief value from the market afforded by the latter. The hides, the skins, the furs, the wool, a large portion of the cotton, the timber, the coals, the lead, the iron, the pitch, the tar, the turpentine, the tallow, the indigo, the flax of the farmer, find a ready sale among the manufacturers, who likewise consume of provisions one thousand per cent. more than the amount exported to all the world in the most flourishing period of our history.

Your memorialists are gratified to find that the opposition to their just requests has been confined to a small portion of the two great classes of their fellow-citizens.

In submitting these premises to the most serious attention of your honorable Houses, your memorialists hope that you will make such a modification of the tariff as will secure to all persons interested in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, a full and equal share of protection.

PHILADELPHIA, April 3, 1820.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURES.

[Communicated to the House, April 24, 1820.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the American Society of the city of New York for the encouragement of domestic manufactures respectfully represents:

That your memorialists deem it a duty incumbent on them again to address your honorable body on the subjects embraced in their memorial of the 16th December last.

The excessive and continued importation of foreign manufactures, which is encouraged and supported by the existing tariff, the credit given for the duties, and free sales at auction, have destroyed order and safety in business, discouraged enterprise, suspended labor, and excited the most lively apprehensions for the future peace and welfare of the country.

The facts that have transpired in this market recently are too important in their bearing on this subject to pass unnoticed. By statements, carefully made out, it appears that, in this city alone, about twelve thousand packages of foreign manufactures have been sold at auction, from the 1st January last to 15th April instant, the duties on which are estimated at $1,000,000; which sum, by this short process, has now become active capital, loaned by this Government to foreign manufacturers and their agents in this country, in aid of such operations, to crush the enterprise and industry of this nation.

The contrast between the policy of this Government, and that of all the great States of Europe, on this subject, is appalling to every citizen who reflects upon it. We admit a free importation of all the manufactures and products of Europe and India, subject only to a light duty, payable at a distant period. We admit foreign adventurers, immediately on landing, to compete with our citizens, in every profession, at their very doors, free from all taxes, and exonerated from all the legal duties imposed on citizens, while they exclude even our breadstuffs, except when threatened by famine; and it is equally notorious that they are making every effort to exclude also our cotton, tobacco, and other great staples, by encouraging the production of them in their colonies. They impose high import duties, and still higher excise, on all foreign products, which are payable in cash, on delivery of the goods from the ship or public stores, and invariably secure peculiar privileges to their subjects over foreigners.

Your memorialists cannot believe that your honorable body have been duly informed of the deleterious effects arising from the existing system, which is availed of by foreigners, to the utter ruin of all regular business and honest industry. The numerous memorials presented this session for relief, the distresses throughout the country generally, the almost total stagnation of business in all our great cities, speak a language which cannot be misunderstood any longer. The utmost anxiety exists, and is suspended on the deliberations of your honorable body. The nation expects at your hands some efficient measures for relief from present embarrassments, and security for future enterprise.

Your memorialists, therefore, humbly hope that Congress will not adjourn without acting efficiently on the important bills now pending before your honorable body.

REMONSTRANCE AGAINST AN INCREASE OF DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

[Communicated to the Senate, April 28, 1820.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia respectfully sheweth:

That we have seen, with great concern, the project of a bill reported to the House of Representatives by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, calling for a considerable increase of duties on goods imported into the United States. We had hoped that, during the uncommon depression of our commerce and agriculture, no measures would have been taken by our Government to add to the accumulated distress of either. If the mere item of revenue were the only object proposed by the bill, we should think it inexpedient, and as by no means calculated to effect the end proposed; but, considering it as calculated seriously to injure or perhaps destroy our foreign commerce, and to erect on its ruins a manufacturing system, incompatible with our habits and the state of our population, it becomes the duty of those who are to be the victims, respectfully to remonstrate against such manifest injustice.

Remonstrance against an Increase of Duties.

Whatever may be the merits of the system of finance which has existed since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, it is at least entitled to sufficient respect to preserve it from abrogation before a proper substitute be offered. That which is now proposed, so far from increasing the revenue, will in our opinion have a contrary effect, and will at the same time tend to destroy our foreign commerce, and introduce an unfavorable change in our habits and morals. But we beg leave to call your legislative attention especially to that class of society of which we are members, and to reflect upon the consequences that will result, not only to us, but also to the numerous descriptions of tradesmen and artisans who depend on us for their employment and support, from any sudden and radical change in our present condition. Our capitals, to an immense amount, are vested in shipping, warehouses, wharves, and other appendages, belonging to mercantile establishments. We have been prepared by education and habit for the different branches of our calling, and are unfit for any other. Are we then to be required to submit to the destruction of our property, and to renounce the great branch of maritime commerce which is coeval with the settlement of our country? It is in the power of Congress to change our laws, but it is beyond its power to change the force of nature and habit. We have an extensive line of seacoast, indented with fine harbors; we have a bold and enterprising population on that seacoast, to whom the ocean has hitherto furnished subsistence and comfort: they will, therefore, there is too much reason to believe, not be withdrawn from it by any tariff that Congress may think proper to establish. The honorable, conscientious trader, may be compelled to abandon his calling, by reason of the regulations which Congress may impose on it, but the smuggler will take his place, and furnish, on easy terms, every article of foreign luxury on which our legislators may impose prohibitory duties. The warehouses and shipping may be destroyed, and their owners ruined, but they will be replaced by British ships and British warehouses at Montreal, St. Andrew's, and on the English side of the Lakes.

We hope that the class of citizens who are so zealously employed in this great work of change will be called on to show from what source the Government will derive its revenue during the period that must intervene between the overthrow of the present system and the establishment of another; nay, we will even add, after it shall be established. The duties on imports are already so high that the consumption decreases daily; and yet it is proposed to increase the revenue by increasing the imposts: our own experience suggests a very different remedy. Another policy, and we think a better, would have lowered the duties, and sought for greater revenue in increased consumption. Whilst these destructive restrictions are to be resorted to, we hear nothing of internal taxes, when a moderate and wholesome tax on domestic spirits would nearly supply, of itself, the deficiency in the revenue. Whatever may be the object of the tariff proposed, we respectfully believe the end will be such as we have here stated. The revenue will be diminished, and foreign commerce carried on by fraudulent dealers. We would ask the advocates of this innovation for information as to what is to be done with our surplus agricultural productions during the time of this violent restriction on foreign commerce. We know well how it is to be disposed of when our country shall be covered with workshops and manufactories. We are then to consume it ourselves. But, as the interval will certainly be of many years duration, it is necessary to make some previous arrangement for the disposal of this important item. If we tax to prohibition the produce of other countries, those countries will do the same by ours. We have a notable instance in the duties imposed by us on the wines of Portugal and Spain. Of these we destroyed the consumption by excessive duties; Spain and Portugal have destroyed the consumption of our corn and flour by the same means. This fine branch of trade was thus destroyed; and how does the account stand with the parties now? Why, we drink whiskey that pays no duties, and Spain and Portugal get grain from other countries. We imposed high duties on British goods, and a restrictive duty on her tonnage; she defeated our tonnage duty by an equivalent duty on our tonnage, and superadded a bounty to her own. We were glad to compound, by agreeing to remove all discriminative duties and bounties on the shipping of both nations. Had we also agreed to diminish our duties on such of her manufactures as cannot, for a long time, interfere with our own, we should probably not have witnessed the very extraordinary efforts which she has lately made to procure cotton, the great staple of our Southern States, from the East Indies, to the great prejudice of the value of ours. She would gladly take our raw materials, and pay us in such manufactures as we shall be unable to rival, with the aid even of prohibitory duties, for a long series of years. But, if we take measures to lessen the sale of her goods, she will not be backward in retaliating, by lessening, as much as she can, the consumption of our raw materials. Unfortunately, we have no productions of a character so peculiar as to defy competition, like the teas of China, and the wines and brandies of France. All of our productions are to be found in other countries; and we must not be surprised to see her, at no distant day, forego the use of our cotton, as Portugal now does that of our flour. If England is the original from which we propose to copy our restrictive system, we should consider whether her situation was analogous to ours when she adopted hers. We shall find that every acre of her good land was in cultivation, and that her population and capital were redundant. In none of these items is there a conformity with our present situation: our population is very sparse, compared with our immense extent of territory; and both our population and capital are feeble, compared with the exertions that will be called for in this arrangement. But those are not the only difficulties we shall have to contend with. We have just stated to you the effect of the rivalry and counteraction of other nations, as it respects the exports of our surplus productions. We beg leave to call your attention to the actual situation of England, as it respects her exports. Every nation in Europe is at war with her restrictive system, and have, by their counteraction, reduced her manufacturing establishments, and the persons connected with them, to a condition of unparalleled distress. Even this, our proposed measure, is principally levelled at her. The fact is, that as long as we have surplus productions we must export, and, as long as we export, we must import. But, if we determine not to import, and effect this purpose either by prohibition or by excessive duties, we must be prepared to meet a corresponding feeling on the part of other nations, and to suffer the inconveniences that have uniformly attended restricted commerce, both as it respects our revenue and agricultural interests.

It is not only on general principles that we object to the proposed plan of restriction and high duties, but we are also urged by the peculiarity of our own situation to remonstrate against their unequal and unjust operation. During the last two or three years, the aggregate of the commerce of the United States has been productive of great loss to those who have been concerned in foreign trade; so that the merchant, who should only be the organ through which the revenue is conveyed to the Treasury, has in fact been burdened with a very large proportion of the duty which was intended to fall on the consumer. The diminution of capital has been such as to produce many and very heavy failures throughout the maritime ports of the Union. As long therefore as this state of things continued, we, as before observed, had hoped that no additional duties would have been imposed, inasmuch as those now levied have such an unequal, and we may add, unjust bearing. We have waited, without murmuring, in hopes that a change of circumstances might enable us to receive a decent return for the employment of our capital and labor, but we had not imagined that an aggravation of our sufferings would come from a quarter where we look only for relief. If we are asked why, under such great disadvantages, we have continued to import foreign productions, we answer that, during the whole period, there has been a gradual diminution of mercantile establishments throughout the Union; that those whose capital has principally been invested in shipping have cherished a hope that the reaction consequent on the convulsed state of the commercial world during the last twenty-five years would soon cease to operate; and moreover that it cannot be expected that, as long as there are even hopes of improvement, a very numerous description of persons should abandon a calling to which they have been uniformly devoted, and of which only they have any knowledge. But there are not wanting other considerations of a very serious nature which must have escaped the notice of those who propose an increase of duties at this time, even presuming that such increase would improve the revenue. Surely it will be allowed that the measure of taxation should be proportioned to the means of payment. In our country we have no other criterion for fixing the extent of these means than the value of our agricultural productions; and if we are to be influenced by a test of so natural a character, we are bold to affirm that since the adoption of the present Constitution we have, with the exceptions of the periods of war and embargo, at no time been in a condition so illly prepared to face an increase of taxes. We believe that, throughout our whole country, the products of our agriculture are in a state of extreme depression. There may be some few exceptions, one of which we shall have occasion to speak of hereafter; but, as a general observation, we think ourselves correct; at all events, we can speak with confidence as to the article of flour, the great staple of the Middle States. In a note which we transmit herewith, you will find that the average prices of flour, from the year 1789 up to the present period, have uniformly exceeded that which prevails at this time. Now, as the price of provisions regulates the price of every species of labor, we find that the latter has also declined proportionably in its value; and that the means of enjoyment, or even support, are very much contracted in every department of life. How then are we to support the present rate of taxes, so far above the rates of those which prevailed in the early days of our Constitution, when our means are reduced even below the standard of that age? We can only support them by rigid economy, which now pervades every branch of society. And let us here observe, that the very causes which operate so unfavorably to the agricultural and commercial interests have a tendency directly opposite, as it respects those who are concerned in manufacturing establishments. Every cent which is deducted from the price of labor is an additional bounty to them. A cotton factory in the neighborhood of Boston, established on sound principles, as it respects capital and conduct, has given an annual dividend of twelve per cent. for some years. We do not believe that, during the same period, there has been in the Middle States an equal investment in commerce or agriculture that has given equal emolument; and yet it is contemplated to sacrifice these unerring sources of wealth and power merely to promote the views of a small class of citizens; and that, too, without any reasonable expectation of seeing their theories reduced to beneficial practice.

We here beg leave to close, for the present, our general observations as to the expediency of increasing the present rate of duties, and shall proceed to make some few of a more specific character as it respects some of the leading articles in the proposed tariff; and we do this the more cheerfully, as we feel satisfied that it will appear, from the facts we shall present to your view, that the existing rate of duties, so far from being enhanced, should be, in many instances, reduced, if it be intended to apply them to the beneficial purposes of revenue.

Liquors and Groceries.

Wines.—We observe that the duty on this important article is left in blank to be filled up. In the course of these remarks, and also in a mémorial which we lately presented to the Congress, we have shown the destructive effects produced by high duties on wines; and it affords an instructive lesson to us for our future conduct in regard to laying high duties on articles which are considered as luxuries. We promoted the agricultural as well as commercial interests of the Union by exchanging our provisions and lumber for the wines of Spain and Portugal, which, for many years, were a source of considerable revenue. On these we imposed such high duties that we have, in a great measure, destroyed the consumption of them, and we have lost the sale of the provisions which we gave in exchange for them. As it has not pleased the Lord to grant us any vineyards, and as we once found this a profitable article of revenue, when properly managed, we trust it will not offend the most fastidious economist if we respectfully suggest to you the propriety of treading back on our steps, and reducing, by almost one-half, the duties actually paid. Perhaps it may produce a policy on the part of Spain and Portugal to retrace their steps, and to remove the restriction which they have imposed on our productions. We may then again have a chance of calling on the farmers for some part of the surplus grain which, from present appearances, they are likely to have on hand.

Brandy.—We find this article, in the existing as well as in the proposed tariff, classed with spirits of other denominations. We think that brandies (to use a plural term) should be classed, and that French brandy should pay at least fifty per cent. more duty than any other species, not only because the French Government are endeavoring to wrest a part of our carrying trade from us, but because the brandies of France are of a peculiar character as to goodness, and cannot be supplied (of equal quality and request) by any other nation; and are, in fact, of far greater value at the place of their growth than any other. If any difficulty should occur in separating them from other brandies in the tariff, they might, we conceive, be properly admitted into the list of ad valorem articles with the others; and we should then tax them by value, which, in this case, we should consider the true criterion for the measure of duty. The tariff, as it now stands, virtually prohibits the importation of Spanish brandy; but as we do not approve of high duties, except in most special cases, we propose to produce the effect of reducing the duty now paid on Spanish brandy, so as to leave that of France at the proposed advance.

Rum.—We would recommend precisely the same course as to this article, which is now taxed too high, in our opinion. It has been a source of great emolument to our revenue, but, under the present rate of duty, the consumption, as far as we can judge, is very rapidly declining. It recommends itself, moreover, to our favor, by its being one of the principal articles of payment given in the West Indies for our agricultural productions. If we drive it from our market, we must expect these productions will be treated there in the same manner as they have been treated in Spain and Portugal. Even under the existing tariff, we contemplate that this will be its fate ere long; but, under the proposed addition of duty, it will not be imported in a way that will yield any efficient benefit to the revenue. Indeed, we are not without something more than apprehension, that a considerable quantity is now introduced in a clandestine manner; nor need you be surprised that it is so, when every puncheon thus introduced affords a profit of from forty to fifty dollars.

Coffee.—Almost every observation we have made in respect to rum may be applied to this article. We are of opinion that the present duty of five cents per pound is too high, and we are persuaded that a reduction of one per cent. per pound would have a favorable effect on the revenue. We consider it a fair object of revenue, as far as that revenue can be collected, and as far as we can afford to pay it; but we think the present duty sufficiently high to invite to the frequent breach of our revenue laws; and we are satisfied that, in our part of the country, the consumption has very much decreased.

Sugar.—This is a most important article, not only as it respects the revenue, but as forming a leading item in the comforts, we may even say the necessities of life. Without any certain data, we venture to estimate the quantity of this article consumed in the United States at 60,000,000 pounds, producing, at three cents per pound, a revenue of $1,800,000. When the duty was imposed on sugar, it was intended for the purpose of revenue only; and it was not contemplated that, in our country, there existed a climate and soil calculated for its production. But during the last few years a certain portion of Louisiana has been found to possess these advantages; and such has been the rapidity with which they have been improved, that it is estimated that the produce of Louisiana will amount this year to about 40,000 hogsheads, of 900 pounds each, or a total of 36,000,000 pounds. As no duty is paid on this enormous amount, that which is paid on sugar from other countries operates as a protecting duty to it, and gradually loses the character of a revenue duty, and will soon cease to exist as such; because the increased cultivation in Louisiana bids fair to supersede the necessity of importing from other countries. There will then have occurred, for the present year, a deficit, in this single item, of $1,080,000. But, without anticipating the consummation of the deficit, we beg leave to call your attention to that which will, in our opinion, be sustained in the present year. We have stated already, on the best information we can procure, that the last crop amounted to about 36,000,000 pounds. This sugar, being protected by our present high duties, is wholly consumed in the United States; and every hundred weight of sugar imported from foreign countries, admitting it cost the same price, must be sold for three dollars more, in order to indemnify the importer. But inasmuch as the sugars of the West Indies require twice the labor and expense requisite in Louisiana, the price at which they are bought by us cannot be supposed to be less. Thus it evidently appears that the whole duty which is thus subtracted from our revenue, is neither more nor less than a bounty granted to the sugar planters of Louisiana; and that the amount thus granted on 36,000,000 pounds, at three dollars, is $1,080,000. But this is not all. It is generally understood that two hogsheds of sugar yield one hogsherd of molasses, and this latter an equal quantity of rum; so that there will exist the materials for 20,000 hogsheds of rum, which, at the moderate estimate of one hundred dollars each, at a bounty of thirty cents per gallon, will amount to $600,000; if not distilled, it will only receive a bounty of $80,000. But admitting one-half to be used without distillation, and the other to be converted into rum, the mean sum will be - - - $340,000

Which, added to the bounty on sugar, 1,080,000

Then the aggregate bounty will be $1,420,000

We do not pretend to be accurate in this estimate, because we receive the principal data from public report. But we are willing to make large deductions from its amount; and we will suppose that the amount paid as a bounty to Louisiana for the present year will amount only to $1,000,000. As probably the subject has not been considered in this point of view, the result may be matter of surprise; and we shall no longer be at a loss to account for a diminution of our revenue in one of its most important branches. But there is a feature in this protecting duty of so singular a cast that we do not believe it can be paralleled in the history of commercial bounties. It seems that the soil calculated for raising sugar cane in Louisiana is very limited, and that the culture of it is as yet confined to a small number of persons. We do not believe that the number of sugar planters exceeds from one to two hundred. We cannot vouch for the correctness of the estimate; but, presuming it to be correct, and that the number of planters amounts, say to one hundred, then, assuming our reduced estimate of bounty of $1,000,000, it will appear that the United States grant an average sum of ten thousand dollars per annum to each of these hundred planters; or five thousand dollars, if their number be two hundred. If these statements be correct—and the Legislature have better means than we possess for ascertaining their correctness—we presume that no comment is necessary.

Again: we are not to suppose that the evil ends here, and that we are to suffer no other inconvenience than the payment of these splendid sinecures. We have now to present the case to you in a point infinitely more interesting, and such as we trust will excite the most serious attention on the part of Congress. We have supposed that the consumption of sugar in the United States amounts to about sixty millions of pounds; and in the estimate of the crop now delivering at New Orleans we have rated it thirty-six millions of pounds. There is, then, only required an increase of twenty four millions of pounds in the growth of Louisiana sugars to complete the supply for the actual demand of the whole Union. From the rate at which they have increased for some years, the production will soon have attained to this point; and the importation of foreign sugars and rum, as articles of consumption will, of necessity, cease. The consequences of this change will be much more serious than they at first appear.

Our commerce with the West Indies is, in our present situation, of the greatest importance to our agricultural as well as to our maritime interests. Excluded from the ports of Europe by our own bad policy, our provisions and lumber have scarcely any other mart than the West Indies; and the principal returns which they afford are sugar, rum, and molasses. Now, if these are wholly driven from consumption, we must cease to receive them in payment, for we cannot continue to import them with a chance of being indemnified for their cost, by reshipping them to Europe; and if we cannot receive them in payment, our agricultural products will of necessity be rejected, and this other branch of commerce will either expire, or be continued in a very diminished and languishing condition.

There is also another view of this subject, which we consider of importance. We have stated the amount of sugar made in Louisiana this year to be 36,000,000 pounds, which, rated at the moderate price of seven dollars per hundred pounds, will amount to $2,520,000; of which amount we have shown that we now pay as bounty more than $1,000,000, and that when the quantity shall have increased to the measure of our supposed consumption, (60,000,000,) the bounty will be increased to $1,800,000, exclusive of that which which will accrue on the rum and molasses. Thus an enormous and increasing contribution is levied on every individual in the Union, to pamper a few individuals living in the most remote and most favored angle of our country. To add to their excessive gains, we are to destroy the most active and beneficial branch of our commerce, and to dissolve those branches of foreign commerce through which we are to receive our supplies, in the event of being at war with a nation having a maritime force superior to our own. It will be in vain that we shall be told that the commerce which we lose will be replaced by that of Louisiana. The whole of the maritime States furnish scarcely a single article with which she cannot supply herself without our assistance. The value of our exports to New Orleans, in native productions, is so small, and diminishes so rapidly, that Louisiana bids fair, and that very soon, to stand in the same relation to us with China. We must send our specie to purchase her productions, and that, too, when they shall no longer enjoy the bounties now granted by us with such prodigality.

We are sensible that the bounty (for such it is, in effect) granted on the sugar, rum, and molasses, has not been produced by any legislative act formed for the purpose of revenue, and which, by the gradual increase of these articles, has been virtually converted into a bounty, and the measure of their increase is precisely that by which we may estimate the progressive reduction of our revenue, and of our West India trade. In the infancy of the sugar establishments on the Mississippi, it might have been prudent to grant protection, and even positive bounty, if required; but in their present state of prosperity, when it is ascertained that no species of agriculture can compare with this as to emolument, we think it is time to withdraw a portion of the bounty, and apply it to other branches of agriculture, which, in their turn, require support. Our flour, our corn, our tobacco, our rice, our salted fish, and lumber, call for support. But we do not ask for it in the form of restricted duties, but in the removal of such as operate to depress those staple commodities. So far are we from approving of an increase in the duties of rum, sugar, and molasses, that we think it will be both wise and just on the part of our Government to reduce by one-half the amount of those which now exist on those articles. It is a most oppressive tax on the farmer of the seaboard to pay, as a protecting duty on a barrel of New Orleans sugar, seven bushels of wheat, at the prices of the present day; and how much more oppressive is it still, that this enormous bounty, when paid, should operate to destroy the sale of his produce in the marts to which it has been usually exported? Such, however, is the extent of the tax, and such its effect. In asking thus for a diminution of duty on West India produce, we do not apprehend a diminution of the revenue; the existing high duties have contributed principally to the great reduction on the consumption of it. We contemplate very favorable results to the revenue, which the enlarged consumption, under reduced prices, will create; and that soon the most beneficial effects will be felt in the important branches of agriculture and commerce.

Having thus respectfully taken a view of the immediate and prospective operation of the actual duty on sugar, we shall close our protracted observations on this most important item, begging leave to invite the particular attention of the Congress to it, as well from considerations of general policy as from those which attach peculiarly to agriculture and commerce.

Molasses.—Our observations on sugar apply with equal, if not greater, force to molasses. It is the humble and nutritious sweet resorted to by those who cannot afford to buy sugar, and seasons the simple repast of all ages and of all sexes. If we do not ask a reduction of the present duty, we at least deprecate an advance, more especially as that called for by the new tariff will still add to the bounty now granted to the planters of Louisiana.

In respect to all the actual and proposed duties on the important items of cotton and woollen goods, we subjoin a body of notes, showing what is and will be the effect of the proposed changes. The observations which accompany them are made by a practical merchant, and we conceive are highly worthy of consideration. It will be seen that the present duties operate as a very heavy tax on the consumer; that they are abundantly large for the protection of our manufactures, and that the proposed advance will not only tend to diminish our revenue, but to produce the most demoralizing effects in our society. The importers of woollen and cotton goods, whatever may be their opinions as to the present rate of duties, are of opinion that the duties, generally speaking, are fairly paid; but they have no hesitation in declaring that the proposed advance will have the effect of producing a very extensive branch of contraband trade. As far as our own opinion may have weight, we do not hesitate to say that, if the present high duties will not protect our manufactures, it is an evident proof that we are not prepared, under our present circumstances, to engage more extensively in them, and that justice and sound policy require that we should not increase the actual bounties. Nay, we are of opinion that, in some instances, the proposed increase, amounting to prohibition, would injure our manufactures as well as our revenue. In fact, we do not consider either our population or means are such as to invite us to engage in such as may rival the finer productions of the European looms. We respectfully believe, for the present, we ought to be satisfied with the manufactures of coarse goods, and leave to those who take our raw materials the supply of fine goods. The purposes of commerce as well as revenue will thus be promoted. At any rate, the establishment of new branches of manufactures is the work of time; and something more than a desire to establish those of fine goods should be manifested before we proceed to strike a deadly blow at other branches of industry, of the greatest national interest, and on which the prosperity and happiness of our country have hitherto been founded. It would seem well to pause before it be determined by any legislative means to effect any sudden change in the habits and character of our population. It would be well, we respectfully believe, to examine cautiously those which we are to assume in lieu of those which we are called on to renounce. Our institutions have hitherto been such as to render our happiness proverbial. What, on the other hand, is the condition of those whom we are attempting to imitate in this new career? The manufactories and workshops of England are the nurseries of pauperism and discontent. Ought we to wish to rival her in fine muslins or splendid toys? If our poor rates, like hers, are to amount to thirty-six millions of dollars, and if our soldiers and farmers are to be employed in suppressing the insurrections of our manufacturers, let her enjoy the emoluments and miseries of her manufacturing system, and let us avoid it until a crowded population may render it expedient and secure. We have known of many attempts in Europe at the hotbed process of raising manufactures, and we believe that it has almost universally failed.—The truth is, in respect to legislation on this subject, the Congress have done all that they can do, if we are to expect revenue from our imports. They have peopled districts, and have conducted them properly, acknowledge that they are sufficiently protected by our present duties, and they ask no advance. But this is not enough. We must lay the groundwork of a general system of manufacturing, and, as a prelude to it, it is proposed to begin by destroying our whole commercial and agricultural systems at one sweeping blow; for such promises to be the result of the proposed tariff. It would be reasonable to suppose from the summary mode of proceeding contemplated, that the looms and the anvils and the artists were impatiently waiting for the signal from Congress, to supply us with chintzes and muslins, with needles and watches. But so far from this being the case, we do not believe that the advocates of this important change have in contemplation one single branch of the higher class of fabrics; and it will be prudent for them to abstain from engaging in them. Their efforts, supported by legislation, will be unequal to the attainment of the proposed end. As before observed, we may ruin the fair merchant, but we cannot suppress the trade when transferred to the smuggler, who will undersell our own manufacturers.

If the spirit in which these exactions are made is characteristic of the new system which is to be introduced, we confess that we should for this alone deprecate its progress; for, if it is thus in the gristle, what will it be in the bone? It seeks to destroy one great and hitherto beneficial system, before it is prepared to furnish a substitute. It abolishes imposts that are paid with fidelity, and calls for others that we seriously fear will not be paid. The interests that it places in advance of all others are those of only a few, compared with those whose interests it seeks to demolish. What, on the other hand, has been the conduct of the farmer and the merchant? They have borne with cheerfulness, and discharged with punctuality, the taxes which have been imposed on them, whether for the support of Government, or for the promotion of other branches of industry; they have seen their commerce injured in some points, and destroyed in others; they have furnished the means of paying what may be considered as bounties to domestic manufactures, to the fullest extent of good policy; and yet, far from even murmuring, or torturing Congress by their repeated demands, they have either suffered in silence, or restricted themselves to suggesting measures which would promote the public weal as well as their own. Are they, then, after their patience under protracted sufferings, to be called on, in this time of general distress, to sustain new injuries in their agricultural interests, and to have their commercial establishments overthrown, and even the very nature of their being changed, merely to promote the delusive projects of a few interested individuals? They have too much confidence in the wisdom of the National Legislature to suppose that they will encourage these vague and ephemeral schemes, calculated to make a revolution in our condition, and, in the end, to produce effects the very contrary to what they profess.

Your memorialists respectfully remark, that they are opposed not only to the principle of the proposed tariff, but also to the details to which it is applied; and that, so far from adding one cent to the present duties, it is our opinion that an increase of revenue and an improvement in our general condition can only be expected by a diminution in the existing duties, especially on the articles referred to, and more particularly the wasteful bounty on the sugars, rum, and molasses of Louisiana; and, finally, that the actually depressed state of agriculture and commerce calls for such gentle and considerate measures on the part of Congress as may strengthen the confidence in and attachment to the Government of the citizens, and for the rejection of all those which, like the projected tariff, must be likely to have an opposite tendency. There exist already in the Union of these States too many sectional causes of weakness to make it expedient to increase their effect by artificial means. The endeavor should be to retard, and not to hasten, a crisis which all must contemplate with horror. Although it is not our particular view to give an opinion relative to the general finances of the Union, yet, as we are practically connected with the various branches of commerce from which our revenue is derived, the suggestions which we presume to offer may not be wholly useless. We think there is the most satisfactory proof that the consumption of every species of goods imported from Europe and the East and West Indies is in a state of rapid decline, owing to the inability of our population generally to support any other than necessary expenses. The causes of this decline have been touched on in what has been already said, but the effect will most assuredly be a great and increasing deficit in our national revenue.

We are satisfied that this revenue, so far from being increased, will be diminished by any addition to the present duties. We are strongly impressed with the opinion, as already stated, that an opposite course would, as it respects revenue, lead to more favorable results; but we are far from believing that any measure of finance, short of an excise and internal taxation, will efficiently meet the evil. We respectfully concur in the proposition of a loan, or any other temporary resort for the present year, in the contemplation at the next session of recurring to an organized system of internal taxation, which will be less subject to fluctuation than that on which we now rely for revenue.

On behalf of the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia.

ROBERT RALSTON, President.

PHILADELPHIA, April 20, 1820.

Observations as to the operation of the present tariff in giving protection to the manufactures of this country, and in excluding the importation of goods of foreign manufacture similar to those manufactured here.

The cotton goods manufactured in this country to the greatest extent are plaids, stripes, chambrays, and cotton shirting of the coarser qualities, which now cost in England less than 25 cents the square yard, and are, consequently, subject to a very heavy duty; so much so, as nearly to exclude their importation. A yard of plaid stripe, or chambray, would now cost in England 6d., of 24 inches wide, of good quality. For example:

100 yards of plaid stripe, or chambray, 24 inches wide, at 6d., cost £2 10s. sterling. It would contain 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ square yards, which at 25 cents, is \$16 68. The duty, 25 per cent, upon the same, is \$4 17. Thus the 100 yards of plaid stripe, or chambray, which cost £2 10s., or \$13 20, would now pay a duty of \$4 17, which is equal to 32 per cent.

A piece of cotton shirting, 50 yards, would now cost in England £1 7s. sterling, of 30 inches wide, and would contain 44½ square yards, which, at 25 cents, is $11 12. The duty upon the same, 25 per cent., is $2 78. Thus, the piece of shirting, which cost 27s. sterling, or $6, pays a duty of $2 78, or 46 per cent.

A Carlisle gingham, which has heretofore been much used by the poorer people, of 40 inches wide, would now cost 8d. per yard. 100 yards of Carlisle ginghams, 40 inches wide, at 8d., is £3 6s. 8d., sterling, and would contain 111 square yards, which, at 25 cents, is $27 75. The duty upon the same, 25 per cent., is $6 94. Thus 100 yards of ginghams, which cost in England £3 6s. 8d., or $14 82, pay a duty of $6 94, or 46½ per cent.

Printed calicoes, which are not made in this country, but much worn, more particularly by the poor people, and considerably by all classes of females, now cost from 15s. 6d. sterling to 33s. per piece of 28 yards, upon which there is a debenture allowed upon exportation, in England, of 3½d. the square yard; and as they are from 23 to 25 inches wide, the debenture is from 5s. to 5s. 6d. sterling per piece; and all which costs less than 25s. sterling per piece are now subject to additional duties, as the cost is less than 25 cents per square yard.

A very good calico, 23 inches wide, cost, in December last, 18s. 9d. sterling per piece, upon which the debenture was 5s. 3d., making the net cost 13s. 6d. sterling, and contained 18 square yards, which, at 25 cents, is $4 50. The duty, 25 per cent., is $1 12. Thus the piece of calico which cost 13s. 6d. sterling, or $3, pays a duty of $1 12, or 37 per cent.

Cambric muslins 6-4 wide, of 12 yards each, cost from 7s. to 20s. per piece; and all which cost less than 13s. per piece are subject to additional duties, the cost being less than 25 cents the square yard. A piece of cambric muslin, 39 inches wide, cost 7s., would contain 13 square yards, which, at 25 cents, is $3 25. The duty, 25 per cent., is 81 cents. Thus the piece of cambric muslin, which cost 7s., or $1 55, pays a duty of 81 cents or 53 per cent.

The operation is proportionate upon all low priced cambric muslins of other dimensions, as well as low priced fancy muslins, book muslins, and ginghams, and upon every other description of cotton goods of low cost and not enumerated.

Upon woollen goods, under the present tariff, there is no discrimination between coarse and fine in calculating the duties; nor is it considered necessary there should be, even for the protection of our own manufactures; for, at present, there is but a very small quantity of foreign imported of similar descriptions to those we manufacture. The principal part of those now imported are superfine cloths, low priced blue and white plains for negro clothing, flannels, baize backing, baizes, and blankets, most of which are absolutely necessary for the use of the country.

The proposed tariff contemplates a duty of 33 per cent. ad valorem on all cotton or woollen goods, of whatever description, from this side the Cape of Good Hope, which, upon all goods paying an ad valorem duty, will, in reality, amount to 36½ per cent.; and, upon all cotton goods costing less than 25 cents the square yard, 33 per cent. upon the calculated cost of 25 cents the square yard.

Accordingly, the duty upon 100 yards of plaid stripe, or chambray, costing £2 10s. or $13 20, and upon which the duty is, according to the existing tariff, $4 17, or 32 per cent., would be $5 56, or 42 per cent. upon the cost. Upon 100 yards of Carlisle ginghams costing £3 6s. 8d., or $14 82, upon which the duty now is $6 94, or 46½ per cent., would be $9 25, or 62½ per cent.

Upon a piece of cotton shirting costing 27s. or $6, upon which the duty, according to the present tariff, now is $2 78, or 46 per cent., would be $3 71, or 62 per cent.

Upon a piece of calico costing net 13s. 6d. sterling per piece, or $3, upon which the duty now is $1 12, or 37 per cent., would be $1 50, or 50 per cent. Upon a piece of cambric muslin costing 7s., or $1 55, upon which the duty now is 81 cents, or 53 per cent., it would be $1 08, or 70 per cent. upon the cost; and upon all other cotton goods costing less than 25 cents the square yard, the duty would be proportionate, according to the dimensions and cost.

The contemplated tariff proposes that the duty shall be calculated upon the real cost of the article whence imported, "together with the amount of all such bounties, premiums, drawbacks, allowances, or discounts, as may be given, paid, or allowed at the place whence imported." Upon all printed cotton goods exported a debenture is allowed in Great Britain of 3½d. the square yard; and, should the contemplated duty be laid upon that, as well as upon the actual cost, it will amount to a complete prohibition to the importation of most kinds of printed cotton goods, and also upon English manufactured silk goods, upon the exportation of which a bounty of 4s. per pound is allowed. The contemplated tariff proposes a duty of 25 per cent. upon linens of every description, and those costing less than 25 cents the square yard to be calculated as having cost that, and 25 per cent. calculated upon that amount. In addition to which, the duty is to be calculated upon the bounty allowed of 1½d. per yard on all linens costing less than 18d. per yard. The proposed tariff also contemplates a duty of 33 per cent. upon blankets; and stuffs are considered to be included with woollens of every description, and, consequently, subject to 33 per cent. duty. The three last-mentioned articles, viz: blankets, stuffs, and linens, now pay a duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem; and neither (excepting blankets, to a very limited extent) are manufactured in this country, and are all much used; the impolicy of raising the duties upon them can be readily judged of. Two of the articles being used, one from economy, the other from necessity, to a great extent, by the poorer class of people, the consequences of raising the duties to the rates proposed in the contemplated tariff will be to preclude the importation of many articles altogether in a fair way, and to encourage and systematize smuggling upon a scale so extensive, as seriously to affect the revenue of the country, and corrupt the morals of the people.

The facilities which our extensive seaboard and inland frontier give to the introduction of goods in an illicit manner; the temptations which the contemplated tariff offers; the large value of many articles which may be comprised in a small bulk; and the prospect of gain so great, that many individuals, who now would despise the person who would engage in such a trade, will be induced to engage in it themselves—the inducements to the engaging in the introduction of many articles, in an illegal manner, can be readily judged of, when a person smuggling 100 pounds of sewing silk or silk twist would, by avoiding the duty alone, receive a compensation of $150.

Five pieces of superfine cloth would comprise but a small bulk, and the weight would be about 150 pounds, and would contain about 100 yards, and cost about £200. The duty upon the same, according to the contemplated tariff, would be $324.

In many kinds of cambric muslins, fine fancy muslins, and manufactures of silk, the facilities and inducements to smuggling will be equally great.

It must, therefore, be obvious to every person of reflection, that, whether the contemplated tariff have for its object the increase of revenue, or the protection of our own manufactures, an adoption of it will, most assuredly, have a contrary effect.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 27, 1819.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the merchants and traders of the town of Boston, and of other towns within the State of Massachusetts:

The wise framers of our excellent Constitution, foreseeing the necessity, in a maritime community, of laws peculiarly affecting commercial relations, caused, upon due deliberation, the power of establishing "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies" to be among those expressly delegated by the people to their representatives in Congress assembled. Several of our sister States, at the time they became members of the confederated Republic, did not hesitate to declare freedom from imprisonment for debt, except when there might be a violent presumption of fraud, an inherent and Constitutional right; and many others, when the creative power thus vested in the General Government has been suffered to lie dormant, have from time to time expressed, by their numerous insolvent laws or acts of private relief, a strong sense of the propriety of measures mitigating the common execution of the law. But, without enumerating the multifarious declarations of State Legislatures to this effect, it is enough if no one will deny that the greatest possible exemption from personal restraint bears the closest analogy to the common sentiments and habits of Americans, and is highly congenial to that pure and equal spirit of liberty which animates our whole civil and political character.

Notwithstanding its remarkable conformity to our national physiognomy, nearly sixteen years are now elapsed since we have enjoyed the benefit of a bankrupt law. During a great part of this momentous and eventful period, amidst the concussion of foreign arms, and the violence of nation lifted up against nation, the neutral flag of America enjoyed a degree of commercial prosperity unparalleled in the annals of human history. The granaries of the world were open to us alone, and the mighty empires of Europe may be said, in some measure, to have depended upon our supplies. By these remarkable facilities, immense revenues were accumulated in the coffers of our citizens, which were constantly re-embarked in larger and more perilous adventures, till our commercial engagements were stretched to their utmost extent. At this crisis the restrictive system was commenced, and war shortly succeeded—measures which, however necessary in their origin, and however important in their political results, could not fail of being greatly embarrassing to the commercial and trading interests. Those of our merchants who were enabled to struggle through the distresses invariably attendant on these often inevitable evils were induced, on the return of peace, to put forth all their energies, in the hope of reaping unusual harvests, and thus speedily re-establishing their broken fortunes; but, during the suspension of commercial pursuits, foreign relations had been (for them, at least) unfortunately changed; trade in its accustomed channels had been choked, and necessity had opened new ones which were already pouring in their resources to feed the enormous consumption of a most extensive war.

But when the great belligerents of Europe had laid aside their long-cherished hostilities, and pacific arts were everywhere reassuming their legitimate superiority, England was again ready to step forth, in the plenitude of her maritime might, and monopolize the trade of a larger portion of the globe, at the same time that many Powers, who, when occupied in arms, had been entirely dependent upon us as the general carriers and factors of the world, found their advantage in calling to light hidden resources, and establishing a commerce of their own. From such a singular concatenation of events, the most prudent and the most opulent have been obliged to meet peculiar embarrassments and unexampled pressure; so that many who had withstood the perils and losses of the war have been drawn into ruin by the unexpected fatalities of peace.

Struck with this prominent example of the extreme mutability of commercial affairs, subjected as they are to innumerable and inevitable casualties, and aware of the constant regard which the representative Legislature of an enlightened maritime Republic must preserve towards the interests of commerce and the cause of humanity, your memorialists, the merchants and traders of Massachusetts, as well those who have been severely laboring under the evils we have above related as those who are of a more fortunate description, beg leave respectfully to suggest the expediency of establishing throughout the United States a uniform system of bankruptcy, to the end that personal liberty and the equitable discharge of contracts may no longer be subjected to the caprice or dishonesty of individuals, but that over our civil transactions as well as our political rights we may enjoy "a Government of laws, and not of men."

It might appear unnecessary, but for the strong attachment we are apt to bear even to the injurious customs of our ancestors, to set forth the unreasonable hardships towards merchants and traders of that law which gives unlimited satisfaction upon the goods, estates, and body of the debtor. In what respect, it may be asked, is it superior to the much deprecated law of the twelve tables? We do not, indeed, countenance the partition of the unhappy debtor among his enraged creditors, but we do allow his estates and his expectations to be torn in pieces; we do allow him, without mercy or remorse, to be stripped at once of present possessions and future possibilities; to be left without means and without hopes—an outcast and a reproach. If it be against the policy of our code that the unfortunate insolvent and his miserable family should be subjected to domestic servitude or sold to foreign slavery, by how much are we more merciful when we award against him the ignominy of perpetual imprisonment and perpetual poverty? But we are often told, while the debtor suffers justly for his folly or his crime, his innocent dependants not only do not, as in some parts of the world, participate in his punishment, but are, in truth, rescued from want by the more humane provisions of the law. Not to dwell upon the unavoidable insufficiency of provisions for pauperism to supply the accustomed comforts and luxuries of life, your memorialists would humbly submit to your consideration whether there be not something of mistaken humanity in a system which creates the poor for whom it provides? whether it does not argue somewhat of inconsistency if we seem to generate evil for the sake of doing it away? whether that may not be an unreasonable prejudice which prefers to establish a partial remedy by poor laws rather than a very general prevention by bankrupt laws? Neither, perhaps, will it appear, upon investigation, that the commercial debtor commonly or often suffers justly for his folly or his crime. An enlightened Legislature will undoubtedly be well aware that a circulating medium is the life-blood of commerce; that the obtaining of credit, or what in other men than traffickers and traders might justly be called running in debt, is an essential part of the system of exchange; it is the borrowing from one in order to pay to another in some less valuable form which constitutes the gain of the merchant; and it is the foreseeing how to effect this advantageous commutation which constitutes his skill. This is a game of hazard as well as of calculation, and it is sufficiently clear that any unforeseen check between these successive steps—some inevitable loss, some unexpected disappointment, or even some temporary delay—may prevent his meeting his engagements, and thus involve him in irretrievable ruin. Certainly we cannot say much for the justice which views these dispositions of fortune in the light of criminality, and puts their victim on a level with the idle, the extravagant, and the profligate.

Our humane and admirable law seems, indeed, to depart from its own spirit every way in the case of the unfortunate debtor. It not only renders him obnoxious to an unmerited weight of punishment, but it puts out of its own hands all discretionary right of measuring or apportioning that punishment, and vests an unlimited power in the interested and the irritated. To no purpose are we told that the true interest of the creditor would be to release his prisoner, to put him in a way of honest industry, and to restore him to his credit with the world; for here we find men blinded by avarice rather than guided by interest; and particularly as each creditor reflects that the mercy which he would willingly extend, his neighbor will certainly reject. Thus is the merciless remunerated, while he who indulges the common feelings of humanity loses, or at least hazards, the debt without benefiting the debtor. Where there are many claimants, there will always be some unfeeling or unjust; and we cannot refuse to recollect how much it is in the power of a single individual, for how insignificant a sum, after other means of satisfaction are exhausted, to produce all the evil we have in part attempted to describe. That this unyielding hardness on the part of the creditor is by no means so unfrequent as we could wish to believe, does but too plainly appear when we call up the condition of the English jails, at a former period, during more than a century and a half. From the moment that imprisonment for debt was first granted by law, to the time when the benevolent system of bankruptcy was fully and effectually introduced, we find them crowded and overflowing with the miserable victims of insolvency to an almost incredible degree; and we much fear that the great cities and commercial marts of our own country, even in this enlightened and philanthropic age, will afford ample evidence of a strong disposition in creditors to enforce the right of imprisonment in its severest extent.

Hitherto we have considered this important subject principally on the side of mercy. Your memorialists would likewise represent it on the side of justice. The law, as it now stands, appears to leave a wide opening, and to create a powerful temptation to fraud. The debtor, who has nothing to expect from compassion, and nothing to fear from detection, has little inducement to an honest disclosure of effects, which, if utterly surrendered, would probably but ill satisfy the rapacity of the vultures who surround him. To what but the hopeless severity of our law can we attribute the frequent instances of fraudulent conveyances in trust; of fictitious transfers of property; of the security of endorers before any liability has attached, or who have perhaps generated a spurious credit by the accommodation of their names, with an understanding that no liability ever should attach; of the collusive preference of one or more creditors to the total exclusion of the rest; and the whole complicated tissue of deceit which may be observed in daily operation to sustain the credit of a tottering house, or raise it from its fall? The system of palpable fraud and oppression which has thus grown out of the abuses and imperfections of the law must obviously occasion vast impediment to commercial enterprise and skill. By it credit is greatly affected both at home and abroad. General insecurity begets mutual distrust. We know not who may be honest till he has been tempted, and we have no certain hold on dishonesty in the law. If, then, it should seem that our State insolvent acts, so far as they may tend to impair the obligation of contracts, are unconstitutional and void, your memorialists would suggest to your impartial inquiry whether the practical obligation of contracts is not, in point of fact, as seriously and more frequently impaired by the existence of the evils we have thus briefly enumerated.

There is one other remaining ground upon which your memorialists beg leave to suggest the expediency of amendment in the present law of satisfaction for debt. Its effects upon society are believed to be pernicious in an alarming degree; and your memorialists do not doubt that moral and political results are the chief and peculiar solicitude of enlightened legislation. Its moral effects are believed by your memorialists to be pernicious in an alarming degree, when it is seen that in cases of insolvency no distinction is made between the unfortunate and the profuse; that innocence and guilt are alike tenants of the common jail; that the compassionate are plundered, and justice is cheated of its right; that the honest insolvent is strongly tempted to sacrifice his integrity, and often overpowered; in short, that only the fraudulent debtor, by the secretion of property no longer his, escapes the chief penalties of the law, and only the hard-hearted creditor, by rigorously persisting in his claim, obtains its full benefit. Its political effects may be thought not less alarmingly pernicious when a large number of respectable and industrious citizens are reduced to idleness and indigence; when they are maintained at the charge of others in utter uselessness and sloth, as a rotten excrescence that is draining the resources of the community; when they may have been driven by long continuance of unmerited punishment to absolute despair; and when the infamy of interminable poverty may have rendered them disaffected and factious.

These abuses and dangers your memorialists humbly conceive may be obviated by the establishment of a uniform and permanent bankrupt law; a law which shall at once satisfy justice and humanity; which shall empower the creditor to check his debtor's ruinous career before it has wholly divested him of means; which shall compel the insolvent, under heavy penalties, to a full disclosure of his effects and of his credits; which shall destroy all collusive intercourse with fraudulent creditors, and remove all probability of secret or fictitious conveyance; which shall enforce an absolute cession and an equal distribution of the bankrupt's property in satisfaction of all lawful claims—a law which, while it shall threaten fraudulent bankrupts with its severest visitation, shall, on the other hand, discharge the person of the fair and honorable debtor from an odious and unreasonable confinement; which shall rescue his future acquisitions from a retrospective liability; and which shall establish some pecuniary emolument as a reward for prudence and good faith, that he may be enabled to renew his blighted hopes, and by the strength of honest industry reattain to usefulness and honor.

Your memorialists can perceive no evil resulting from a system of bankruptcy sufficient to counterbalance these many and great benefits; and they would particularly represent that, in their opinion, the agricultural interest can never suffer from a law by which they do not see that agriculturists are in any way affected, excepting as they may acquire an additional hold upon the merchant for the recovery of their just debts.

Your memorialists have thus far trespassed on the attention of the Legislature from a deep conviction of the importance and interest of the subject which they urge, as well as a firm belief that their suggestions, at the present juncture, when commerce, in an especial manner, demands the fostering hand of Government to protect and assist it, and when the Supreme Court of the United States have recently declared that all State insolvent acts which affect the discharge of the contract are unconstitutional and void, will be noticed with that indulgence which their necessities may seem to require, and that the United States of America will no longer be, as we believe it now is, the only commercial nation in the civilized world utterly destitute of any general provision in the nature of a bankrupt law.

These considerations the undersigned, merchants and traders of Boston, and of other towns within the State of Massachusetts, humbly submit, with the hope that such measures may be adopted for the relief of a numerous and unfortunate class of citizens as Congress in its wisdom may think adequate to that desirable end.

VACCINATION.

[Communicated to the House, January 5, 1820.]
To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America :

The memorial of the undersigned respectfully represents: That, at a late meeting of a number of gentlemen friendly to vaccination, held in this city, in pursuance of a public notice given for that purpose, your memorialists were chosen a board of managers, in conjunction with Dr. James Smith, the agent appointed by the President under authority of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to encourage vaccination; to organize a national vaccine institution for the United States of America, agreeably to a plan which had been previously proposed by him, and for the support of which considerable sums have been subscribed." It has, therefore, become the duty of your memorialists to solicit your serious attention to this important subject, and if the views of our association fully meet with your approbation, we most respectfully petition and pray that you will grant us an act of incorporation to enable us with more certainty to carry into effect the plan which has been adopted by the society we represent, "to secure the preservation and distribution of the true vaccine matter, for the use and benefit of the citizens of the United States."

Your memorialists do not deem it necessary to enter into any detail of facts to prove to you the necessity which exists of your giving greater encouragement to vaccination; nor yet to demonstrate the many advantages which the public may reasonably expect to derive from the institution now proposed to be established for this purpose. But in an undertaking which appears to us to be so intimately connected with the convenience, health, and general welfare of our fellow-citizens in every part of the United States, it becomes us to submit for your consideration some of the most prominent reasons which have induced us to engage in it.

1st. The small pox, which is a contagious disease, and one of the most fatal and destructive plagues that ever affected the human race, yet exists in our country, and annually destroys the lives of many of our fellow-citizens. The rich and the poor, the old and the young, are alike liable to take this disease. It is not confined to any particular place, but pervades alike our cities and villages; and, searching every where for its victims, penetrates within our inmost and most solitary settlements. Neither are the untutored natives of our land secure from this plague; it is frequently carried into their camps and villages, and produces among them the utmost consternation and despair.

2d. It is now proven, in a manner so fully and clearly as to admit of no doubt whatever, that the true kine pox is a certain preventive of small pox, as well as of all the calamities which are naturally attendant on it. This remedy is never attended with any danger, and may be safely applied by any intelligent person who is furnished with the matter, due care being taken to follow the simple and easy directions which are now given with it for its proper management.

3d. The matter of the true kine pox (and no other can have any effect to prevent the small pox) is of foreign origin, and is not known, as has been asserted by some, to be indigenous in our country. The peculiarly delicate nature of this matter likewise renders it so extremely liable to perish, that, even when we have it in our possession, we cannot keep it active in our hands, except for very short periods of time, (depending much upon the state of the weather,) without renewing it from one subject to another, with the greatest regularity, care, and attention. From these unalterable circumstances, and peculiar qualities in the nature of the vaccine fluid, there are but few persons who can ever pay such constant and unremitting attention to its preservation as would enable them to furnish it with any degree of certainty when it might be most wanted. The act of Congress to encourage vaccination has been attended with many good effects. The agent appointed under this law has been successful in his endeavors to preserve the genuine virus; and from him the surgeons of the army and navy, as well as the citizens of the United States in every section of our country, have obtained, without interruption, a supply of this remedy as often as they have found it necessary to apply to him for it.

In England, where the vaccine remedy was first discovered, a solicitude proportionate to the difficulty of preserving it has been uniformly manifested; and various institutions have been established there for this purpose, under the direction of the most respectable characters. Of these establishments, the London Vaccine Institution is, perhaps, the most celebrated in the world. In many other parts of enlightened Europe, the most zealous philanthropists have taken an active part in disseminating the kine pox, and in protecting their fellow-men from destruction by small pox.

4th. The use of spurious and other kinds of improper infection, taken in mistake for the real kine pox matter, has often occasioned fatal accidents, and checked the progress of vaccination in places where otherwise it would have been cherished and esteemed. This was particularly the case when the kine pox was first attempted to be introduced into New York, Marblehead, Norfolk, and some other places in this country. Citizens who have been disappointed in this way, or who take the small pox after being assured that they have had the true kine pox, are very apt to be led to doubt the efficacy of vaccination, and to turn a deaf ear forever thereafter to every proof or fact which can be adduced in support of the Jennerian discovery. There is no point, indeed, in which the friends of vaccination are so liable to be assailed, or in which they are so often found vulnerable, as in their liability to use spurious instead of the genuine virus. The most skilful physicians have not been always exempt from making mistakes in this particular. The illustrious Jenner, when he at first promulgated his discovery to the world, had more difficulties to contend with on this score than on any other. He then informed us of the "extreme delicacy of the nature of the vaccine fluid," and showed us how easily it could be "disorganized." He also informed us that, with all his care and attention, "an unnatural deviation in this virus from its perfect state frequently occurred to him." Dr. Waterhouse, of Boston, likewise informs us that, "about the latter end of the Autumn, or beginning of the Winter of 1800, the vaccine disease had deviated, in his opinion, from its original character, and assumed a face with which he was not acquainted." In a discovery which has been so recently made known to the world, and which is yet so imperfectly understood by any of us, all these difficulties may be reasonably expected; and whenever they do occur to any practitioner, it is indispensably requisite that he should desist at once from operating, and not attempt to vaccinate any one until furnished with fresh matter, taken from some true and genuine source. The application of the vaccine matter is in itself a very simple business, and has been often intrusted to operators of very little skill; but it requires some considerable knowledge of this matter to enable any practitioner to select the best for his use, or to discriminate, with accuracy, between the true vaccine and the many counterfeit affections which are liable to be mistaken for it. We, therefore, deem it to be of essential importance that some central and responsible institution should be established wherein an uninterrupted supply of genuine matter should be maintained, and from which it ought to be regularly dispensed, on the most free and liberal terms possible, to all who want it. To relieve the public from all doubt or uncertainty in a matter of so much importance to them, the purity and efficacy of this virus should be occasionally tested, and the result of these necessary precautions should be faithfully communicated to the public from time to time.

5th. Another and a very important advantage of such an institution as has been proposed, must arise from its great convenience to the whole community. The public authorities, as well as private citizens, are all alike interested in this establishment. The surgeons of the army and navy require a constant supply of the vaccine matter, and they cannot procure it with certainty on any terms except through the medium of some institution of this kind. An honorable committee of the House of Representatives, in a report on this subject, dated February 3, 1818, gave it as their opinion, and the Government of our country has adopted it as a just and proper precaution, that "the vaccination of those persons belonging to the army and navy, who had never had the small pox, was dictated by duty as well as interest." But the preservation of the vaccine matter, as has been already intimated, is altogether incompatible with the duties which the surgeons in service are bound to perform; it, therefore, becomes necessary for us to supply them with this remedy as often as they may have occasion to use it. But, independent of these facilities which the public authorities will derive from this institution, our fellow-citizens of every description will be most happily accommodated, (when necessity, perhaps, may compel them to resort to it,) by knowing how and where they can obtain with certainty a proper supply of this matter. There are but few among us who regard as we ought any danger which is at a distance, or out of our immediate view; and there are many who, under these circumstances, cannot be persuaded to make any provision whatever against it. Many families who, when the best opportunity was offered, could not be prevailed upon to use the kine pox, have afterwards, when they became accidentally exposed to the contagion of small pox, searched with avidity for this remedy, and risked their lives upon the first portion of matter they could procure from any source. Many persons, in the moment of danger to a whole neighborhood, have sent messenger after messenger, and one express after another, to very distant places, in the greatest precipitation, and sometimes without being able to procure any matter upon which they could place their dependence. The fatal consequences which are liable to flow from proceedings of this kind, point out to us, in the plainest and most forcible manner, the necessity of preserving this invaluable matter with the greatest care in some convenient and well known place, from whence it may be obtained at a moment's notice, and distributed free of every impediment, and to any extent it may be demanded.

6th. There is at this present time a very large majority of the citizens of the United States liable to take the variolous disease; and, of those who are liable to be affected by it, there is not one-half of them who are willing to submit to be vaccinated, unless they are urged to it by their immediate exposure to the contagion of small pox. This universal carelessness or unwillingness in most people to give themselves any trouble, or to incur any expense on this account, unless impelled by some immediate danger, cannot be too harshly condemned; it is discouraging in the extreme, and seems to forbode to our country, at some future period of time, a more serious calamity by small pox than we have ever experienced from it. We should, therefore, take heed in time, and endeavor, by our constant care and unremitting attention, to preserve the kine pox in its purity and excellence. The more universal its use, the more effectual and certain will be our future protection and safety from small pox.

In the years 1815 and 1816 the cities of New York and Philadelphia became much infected with the small pox, and from them it was soon carried into many other towns and seaports within the United States; from these, again, it was communicated to others, and carried into the interior of our country, where it has existed ever since. Between the months of February, 1815, and April, 1816, their records inform us that one thousand one hundred persons had been diseased of small pox in the city of New York alone, and that of these two hundred and ninety-three had died. In Philadelphia, from January 2, 1807, to January 1, 1817, (omitting three years, from which no account was received,) six hundred and twenty-five persons died of small pox! We have thus indubitable proof that upwards of nine hundred of our fellow-citizens have fallen a sacrifice within a few years past to this plague in these two cities alone. But if it were possible for us to bring into one view the sum total of all the mortality and consequent injury which has been sustained in different parts of the United States by small pox within even a few years past, the exposition could not fail to excite a corresponding feeling in yours, as well as in the mind of every person who is capable of comprehending its extent or magnitude. If this destruction of our fellow-creatures were unavoidable, it would certainly be most proper for us to be silent, and to submit to it with due humility of heart, as is our duty under every dispensation of Providence. But the evils here complained of are not unavoidable; they might with greater propriety be said to be of our own creating, for most certainly they are the natural effects of our neglecting an acknowledged duty. In corroboration of this opinion, we can state to you, on authority which cannot be controverted, that during the same period of time above mentioned, when the small pox committed such ravages in New York and Philadelphia, it was likewise introduced into the city of Baltimore, but it was soon extinguished again with very little difficulty; and we are well convinced, from experience, that, if proper care were always taken to vaccinate immediately when the small pox first appears in any place, we could soon subdue and eradicate this plague entirely from our country. If that disheartening apathy, however, which pervades the community in regard to the danger of small pox when out of view cannot be roused into action by any means within our power, the small pox must continue to exist among us, and we must occasionally suffer severely for our neglect of the extraordinary remedy which a merciful and kind Providence has furnished us to prevent it.

Every citizen, therefore, of a discerning mind, who has the prosperity of his country and the welfare of the human family sincerely at his heart, will, we hope, give the proposed plan of a "National Vaccine Institution" his zealous support, and endeavor to bring as many individuals as he can under the healing influence of vaccination. Every child properly vaccinated will afford to the rest of the community one additional security, at least, against the future prevalence of small pox; and in the same proportion as we can increase these securities, so also we will raise up numerous impregnable barriers to the introduction and spreading of the variolous contagion among us.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 10, 1820.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York respectfully sheweth:

That, when the framers of the Constitution of the United States gave Congress power to establish uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, they must have foreseen that the commercial intercourse among the several States might at some future period become so extensive and important as to render it advisable, if not necessary, for Congress to exercise the power thus given to them. Your memorialists beg leave most respectfully to suggest for the consideration of Congress whether the period has not arrived which the Convention foresaw, when the interests of the country require that the power vested in Congress upon this subject should be exercised.

Among other things which bind the people of the United States together as one nation, our commercial intercourse with each other must be considered by every enlightened statesman as a band of no insignificant importance; the regulation of it was, therefore, wisely intrusted by the Constitution to Congress. To an extensive and flourishing internal and foreign commerce, it seems to your memorialists that a general system of bankruptcy throughout the United States is essential. In cases where misfortune overtakes and ruins a merchant in any part of the United States, (and what merchant is there whom misfortune may not overtake and ruin?) it is certainly important that some plan should be adopted by which his creditors in every part of the United States should stand upon an equal footing, have an equal chance of receiving a dividend of his estate, and equal means of knowing in what manner his property is to be disposed of.

Your memorialists believe that no other plan than a uniform bankrupt law can be adopted to effect these desirable ends; without it, in cases where a merchant fails, his creditors do not all stand upon the same footing. In some of the States, in case of a debtor absconding, a difference is made by law between the remedies against him afforded to persons residing within the State and those residing in other States. In the State of New York, if a merchant fails and absconds from the State, leaving property within it, a citizen of New York may sue out an attachment against the property which he has left behind him, but a citizen of another State cannot. It is true, indeed, that the property when attached is for the benefit of all his creditors; but it is equally true that if, before he absconds, the debtor has foresight enough to pay his creditors in New York, he may leave his property in the State with perfect safety, and his creditors in other States cannot touch it.

Without a general bankrupt law, all the creditors of a merchant who fails have not an equal chance of receiving a dividend from his estate. When a merchant's affairs become embarrassed in any of our commercial cities, (the practice is so uniform that it has become a perfect system,) he assigns all his property in the first place to pay his confidential friends, who have lent him their names and their money, and thus given him a false credit, which has been the means of his imposing upon others; or he has already assigned, as security for usurious loans procured from some of the harpies who infest all our cities, every thing that he has of any value; his honest business creditors get nothing. The truth of this has been felt and will be acknowledged by almost every commercial man in the United States.

Without a general bankrupt law, it is manifest that all the creditors of an unfortunate or dishonest merchant have not equal means of knowing how and in what manner his property is to be disposed of, unless they can be presumed to be intimately acquainted with the laws of every State in which they may have a debtor residing.

Your memorialists cannot but express their strong conviction, founded upon experience, that a general bankrupt law is essential to secure any thing like a just and equal distribution of property among the creditors of unfortunate merchants. Your memorialists, however, beg leave most respectfully to suggest that, although the security of creditors is the first and great object of a bankrupt law, yet the relief of unfortunate debtors, who have honestly given up their property for the benefit of their creditors, is another object of it.

Your memorialists forbear to urge those arguments which are calculated to operate upon the heart, by approaching it through the feelings of compassion in favor of the unfortunate, for reasons which will readily suggest themselves; but they beg leave to state that the situation of the United States seems in their opinion to require, as a mere matter of State policy, that merchants who have become unfortunate should not from that moment be considered as drones in the political hive, unable in any way to contribute to the general welfare. Misfortune is apt enough to drive mankind to desperation, to palsy all manly exertion, and to make the stoutest man a mere infant. The laws of the country should encourage the unfortunate to future exertion, and not sink them deeper in despair; they should hold out, as objects worthy of his future industry, the support of his family, who by his exertions may yet become respectable, and the re-establishment of his own reputation, which, although sullied by misfortune, may yet, through honest industry and exertion, become brighter than ever. By doing so, the State is certainly benefitted, because it is its interest to encourage industry, and to excite as much as possible the exertions of all its citizens in some honest pursuit. The Supreme Court of the United States having decided that the State Legislatures have no authority to discharge insolvent debtors from their debts, unless Congress in their wisdom shall think proper to interfere and pass a general bankrupt law, a merchant who becomes unfortunate in the United States must be content for the residue of his life to become a charge upon his friends or his country. The consequences of such a state of things upon the commercial prosperity of the United States your memorialists leave to those to determine upon whom the duty of regulating and protecting our commerce is intrusted by the Constitution.

Your memorialists most respectfully pray that Congress will pass a law establishing a general system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, which they believe is called for by the best interests of the country.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

PROHIBITION OF SLAVERY IN MISSOURI.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 12, 1820.]

NEWPORT, December 22, 1819.

At a late and numerous meeting held at the State House, pursuant to notice, for the purpose of taking into consideration the expediency of presenting a petition to Congress to prohibit the introduction of slavery into any State or Territory that may hereafter be admitted into the Union, Thomas G. Pitman, Esq., was called to the chair. After reading the circular letter from the New York committee on this very interesting subject, and likewise their address to the American people, which was followed by considerable debate and many applicable remarks, the following resolutions were almost unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That Dutee J. Pearce, Caleb Green, John Slocum, Thomas Peckham, and Edward W. Lawton, be a committee to draught a memorial to Congress, praying them to prohibit the further extension of slavery into any Territory that may be admitted into the union of the States.

Resolved, That David Buffum, David Buffum, junior, Benjamin Hadwen, John Slocum, Stephen Gould, Clarke Rodman, Job Sherman, Thos. H. Mumford, and Edward W. Lawton, be a committee to obtain signatures to the said memorial, and forward the same to Congress as soon as may be.

Agreeably to the first recited resolution, the undersigned, having prepared the annexed memorial, respectfully submit the same to the citizens of the town of Newport and its vicinity for their approbation and signatures.

THOMAS PECKHAM,
DUTEE J. PEARCE,
CALEB GREEN,
JOHN SLOCUM,
EDW. W. LAWTON.

To the Honorable Senate of the United States:

The memorial of the inhabitants of the town of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, with reference to the bill now pending before your honorable body, authorizing the people of the Territory of Missouri to form a State Government, and for other purposes, respectfully sheweth:

That slavery, as it now exists in the United States, in the opinion of your memorialists, can never be made a matter of reproach to the existing Government or the present generation. It was an evil introduced into the colonies by the parent State, and acquiesced in to a great degree by the colonies themselves, in an age when the traffic in slaves was pursued by all nations without a suspicion of its enormity.

The Northern colonies participated in it equally with the Southern, and the navigation of the New England ports, and particularly of this town, was employed continually on the African coast, in the transportation of slaves to the different American markets, and by means of American capital. There can be no reproach, therefore, cast upon our Southern brethren for the introduction of this evil, which as your memorialists conceive, will not equally attach itself to ourselves and to the English nation. We were all equally disposed to embark in the traffic, and to avail ourselves of its proceeds, and the guilt, if any there be, must be shared in an equal degree by the parties concerned. The Constitution of the United States, as is well known to your honorable body, after giving Congress an unlimited power to regulate commerce, with certain reservations as to the intercourse between the respective States, provides "that the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight; but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person."

As the reservation here mentioned related merely to the direct trade, an act was passed as early as A. D. 1794 making it unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or alien residing therein, to transport in American bottoms the inhabitants of any kingdom, place, or country, to any other foreign kingdom, place, or country, to be sold and disposed of as slaves, or from the United States to any foreign kingdom, place, or country; and, by a subsequent act, it was made penal to hold property in any vessel whatever so employed, or to serve on board such vessel, whether American or foreign. The direct trade, as is known to your honorable body, had become limited to one or two States, by the enlightened views that prevailed in the South, even before Congress had the authority to interpose for itself. And when the Constitutional period to which the limitation on their power extended was about to expire by the prospective act of March 2d, A. D. 1807, it was declared unlawful to import or bring into the United States any negro, mulatto, or person of color, with the intent to hold, sell, or dispose of such negro, mulatto, or person of color, as a slave, after the 1st day of January, 1808. This law, as is well known to your honorable body, has since been modified by another act, principally with respect to its penalties; and, finally, enforced by a law of the last session of Congress, authorizing the President to employ the armed vessels of the United States on the American and African coasts, to appoint agents to reside in Africa, and to offer bounties for the slaves released. Thus, the United States have the honor of being the first to advocate and the first to adopt those humane and enlightened measures which, after twenty years' earnest and eloquent exhortation, have become the pride and the glory of the States of Europe.

If the people of this country, as is the opinion of your memorialists, were responsible for the continuance of the slave trade after the government of the States and the Union had passed into their own hands, it is equally incumbent on your memorialists, and all others who enjoy the protection of our mild and equal laws, to confine the existence of slavery within the narrowest limits possible. To say nothing of its utter inconsistency with the genius of our republican institutions, and of its fatal effects on the principles and morals of men, the simple circumstance that the Government of the United States has entirely prohibited the importation of slaves, directly or indirectly, as your memorialists have set forth, is sufficient of itself to enforce on us the duty. But it will be in vain that Congress shall prohibit the traffic in slaves under the severest penalties, or that the President be disposed to exert himself to the utmost to enforce these provisions, if an immense market is to be opened in the territories of the West for the unhappy victims of this traffic. The inevitable result of such a course of proceedings must be, as your memorialists apprehend, to increase the temptations to introduce them illegally, already too great, and fatal to the morals and industry of your constituents. It cannot, then, escape the notice of your honorable body that the outlet of the Mississippi and its tributary waters, and generally of the streams that flow into the Gulf of Mexico, is placed by nature in a region beyond almost any other in the Union, open to an illicit trade—a low alluvial country, abounding in inlets, remote from any dense population, in the vicinity of Cuba, a great depot and slave mart—and affording temptations innumerable to a traffic in slaves from the education and habits of the people of Louisiana. The experience of the Government has exactly corresponded to what your memorialists would have presumed to be the case. We refer your honorable body to the explicit testimony of the collector of the customs at New Orleans, (Mr. Beverly Chew,) in his letters to the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the piratical establishment at Galveston; and to the statement made at the last session of Congress, and never contradicted, that above 14,000 slaves were introduced into the United States in that year, and principally through these outlets. We would ask, then, with all deference to your honorable body, what can be more feasible to the unprincipled men engaged in this business than, after the Louisiana market is glutted, to introduce slavery to any extent, and with perfect impunity to themselves, into the Missouri State, if Congress should unhappily countenance its existence? Your memorialists cannot doubt for a moment that this would really be the case, and they are persuaded that it has already taken place, to an alarming extent, under the territorial laws.

But admitting, for the sake of the argument, as your memorialists are willing to admit, that the number of slaves introduced into the Union from foreign countries, and in violation of your laws, must ever be inconsiderable, your memorialists are still of opinion that it would be unwise in Congress to permit the extension of slavery in the new States. The slaves which might then be introduced into Missouri, from the Union at large, would multiply, as your memorialists conceive, to a degree hitherto unknown in this country, not only from the increased facilities of subsistence, but the comparative mildness of her climate. Whilst these causes were operating to perpetuate the evil in the West, the slave population in the Atlantic States must of necessity rise with the demand for labor and the means of life; and the event would be, as your memorialists can confidently predict, that the number of persons of this unhappy description in the United States would be a thousandfold greater than if the slaves were confined, as your memorialists would advise, to the States now holding them.

We would ask, with all deference to your honorable body, when and where is this evil to cease? If it be permitted to the people of Missouri, there is no reason that your memorialists can conceive why it may not be allowed to the inhabitants of every part of Louisiana within the treaty of limits. And, without pretending to any uncommon sagacity on this subject, it is easy for your memorialists to foresee that this will certainly be the case, without the interposition of the General Government. If the United States had no experience whatever of the effects of slavery, and it were still a problem how far it might be beneficial to a State to tolerate its existence in the mildest form, it would appear more credible to your memorialists that citizens of the United States might be found who would be willing to make the untried experiment in our new territory.

But with the convictions which our colonial history and every day's experience are forcing on the minds of your constituents; with the acknowledged fact that slavery was introduced among us in an unenlightened and fanatical age, and that, for nearly two centuries, it has been progressively fruitful of the most unhappy results in this country; and knowing, as we well do, its effects on the state of agriculture, the manufacturing and mechanic arts, and generally on the industrious and profitable habits of a people, and their domestic peace—to think of introducing such a state of things, and of choice, too, in a new country, is to your memorialists perfectly inconceivable.

Your memorialists are well aware that it may be a very obvious reply to the statement of your memorialists, that, admitting the reasonableness of what your memorialists have set forth, it is still incumbent on them to show that Congress have a right to prescribe this condition to a sovereign State. Your memorialists might be content, on this occasion, to refer to the uniform practice of the Government, and to the well known fact that this very condition, and many others, besides, have been made in almost every instance the bases of their admission into the Union whenever new States have been formed out of our old domain. There is nothing, as your memorialists can perceive, in the Treaty of Paris, by which Louisiana was ceded to this country, that makes it necessary for the United States to depart from the practice.

It simply requires of this Government that the Territory in question shall be admitted into the Union as soon as possible, and upon the principles of the Federal Constitution—that is, as your memorialists understand it, precisely in the same manner as other States have been admitted. And, in point of fact, when the southern section of this Territory, under the name of Louisiana, was about to be formed into a State, it was required of it to conform, not to the condition we have mentioned, indeed, (for the situation of the Territory entirely forbade it,) but other conditions were made preliminary to this favor and implying an equal degree of power in the party prescribing them.

It is well known to your honorable body that it was made a positive condition with Louisiana, not only that the lands of the United States within her jurisdiction should never be taxed, and that all purchasers of said lands should enjoy the same immunity for five years after their purchases, but, what is equally remarkable, it is provided that the trial by jury shall be secure to her citizens in all criminal cases, and that the laws which such State shall pass shall be promulgated, and its records, of every description, shall be preserved, and its judicial and legislative written proceedings conducted in the language in which the laws and the judicial and legislative written proceedings of the United States are now published and conducted. Your honorable body is doubtless well informed that, in the Spanish and French colonies established on this continent, the civil law, which never recognised our institution of juries, was introduced at a very early period. And in the province of Louisiana, though it had often changed masters, and had been at times the property of France and Spain, the French language was principally in use. These were circumstances, as your memorialists conceive, of no small import to the people of Louisiana, considering the nature of their education and descent, and, to the apprehension of your memorialists, quite as much a matter of internal regulation as the holding of persons to involuntary servitude. And yet your honorable predecessors of the twelfth Congress, in the exercise, as your memorialists conceive, of their rightful constitutional power to make the admission of a State into the Union conditional, and of the duty incumbent on Congress to guaranty to each State a republican form of government, did prescribe to Louisiana as your memorialists have set forth.

But your memorialists are persuaded that, if no such precedents were to be found in the laws of the Union, and the Constitutional history of this Government were not full of examples to confirm their theory, it would still be very manifest that Congress has ample power to impose this condition, particularly from an examination of the Constitution, in the third and fourth sections of its fourth article, and that the objections drawn from the nature of the State sovereignties are altogether unfounded.

But your memorialists forbear to pursue a discussion to which your honorable body must be far more competent than they can pretend to be. They will merely observe to the Senate that, to their apprehension, a question of greater magnitude, and involving considerations of higher moment to the interests and happiness of the American people, has never been submitted to the decision of Congress. They believe that your honorable body must be ambitious of remembrance, and of grateful remembrance, in after-times; and they cannot conceive of a more enviable distinction than that it shall be the happy result of your beneficent measures that in the wildest and most fruitful region of this great continent, and at no remote day, not one human being is denied his natural and inalienable rights. And your memorialists humbly pray that a provision may be inserted in the bill now pending before your honorable body authorizing the people of the Territory of Missouri to form a State government, and for other purposes, forbidding the extension of slavery in said State.

PROHIBITION OF SLAVERY IN MISSOURI.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 18, 1820.]

At a meeting of the citizens of Hartford and its vicinity, held at the State House, on Friday, the 3d day of December, 1819, pursuant to public notice, for the purpose of taking into consideration the subject of permitting slavery in such States as may hereafter be admitted into the Union, John T. Peters was appointed chairman, and J. W. Edwards, secretary.

The following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the existence of slavery in this Republic is an evil deeply to be lamented, and utterly repugnant to the principles of a Republican Government.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this meeting, the peculiar phraseology of the preamble to the Declaration of Independence, declaring that "all men are created equal," &c., shows conclusively that the illustrious authors of that document never contemplated the further extension of slavery in these United States.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this meeting, Congress possesses the clear and indisputable right to prescribe the terms upon which any territory may be admitted into the Union as an independent State; and that a contrary doctrine would not only tend to destroy that order and harmony so indispensable to the happiness and union of these States, but would prostrate the powers confided to the General Government by the Constitution.

Resolved, That it is a duty the American people owe to their Republican character, and the honor and glory of their country, to endeavor by all honorable and lawful means, to prevent the further extension of slavery, which we consider to be contrary to the spirit of our free and excellent Constitution, and injurious to the highest interests of the nation.

Resolved, That, while we lament the efforts which the Representatives in the last Congress from the slaveholding States made to extend an evil which all unite in deploring, the thanks of this meeting are eminently due to those members who so ably and zealously opposed the admission of slavery into the proposed State of Missouri.

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State be requested to use every honorable and Constitutional exertion to prevent the admission of slavery into any new State which may be formed.

Resolved, That the Hon. Thomas S. Williams, Rev. Thomas H. Gallaudet, Hon. Sylvester Wells, and Hon. John T. Peters be a committee to draught a memorial to Congress upon this subject, which shall comport with the spirit of these resolutions.

Resolved, That the Chairman of this meeting be, and he is hereby, requested to forward a copy of these resolutions and memorial to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

Resolved, That Michael Bull, Nathaniel Goodwin, Charles Babcock, Oliver E. Williams, Chas. L. Porter, Thomas Huntington, Joseph B. Gilbert, E. Bolles, Samuel Huntington, Elihu Olmsted, Azor Hatch, and Roderick Terry be a committee to solicit signatures to the said memorial; and that the several printers of newspapers in this State be requested to publish the proceedings of this meeting.

JOHN T. PETERS, Chairman.

JONA. W. EDWARDS, Secretary.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned, inhabitants of the city of Hartford and its vicinity, in the State of Connecticut, respectfully represents: That, as your present session will probably furnish the occasion of deciding a question which deeply involves the character and prosperity of the vast Republic over whose interests you are called by Providence to preside; the welfare of that countless posterity who are to inherit from us that can render human life a blessing or a curse; and the fate of thousands of our fellow-men, whose dearest rights have been so long sacrificed to the plea of necessity or of interest, we deem it a sacred duty which we owe to ourselves, to our country, and our God, to make use of that invaluable privilege which our excellent Constitution affords us, of attempting to influence the Councils of the nation, by every consideration and motive which justice, honor, and a sound policy will sanction, ere the final step be taken, which, if a wrong one, will shroud the prospects of our country's happiness and glory in shades of the deepest gloom.

In doing this, we avow that no influence actuates us but the purest patriotism. We would rise superior to that ignoble jealousy which weighs all political questions in the petty scale of mere State interest, and measures every proceeding of the National Legislature by the contracted standard of advantage to the Northern or Southern, the Eastern or Western sections of our common country. We would feel as Americans, and present to your respectable body only such considerations as are worthy of the regard of those who, in their least important as well as most momentous decisions, should fix a single eye upon the general happineness of millions who are to constitute, under the auspices of prudent and magnanimous councils, a great and happy people.

We are inspired with a lively hope that what we may venture to suggest will be weighed with carefulness and candor when we call to mind the honorable and energetic measures which Congress has of late adopted to check the future progress of slavery in the United States—measures which, we trust, will yet derive resistless efficacy from the co-operation of the whole Christian world, from a vigilant enforcement by those officers whose province it is to carry them into effect, and from the repeated adoption of such future auxiliary provisions as the elusive cunning of the traffickers in human blood may yet render necessary to wipe from the character of man one of its foulest stains. Most unhappy will be the result if the accession of new States to the Union, by granting them the privilege of holding a portion of their fellow-men in bondage, should prove to be the discomfiture of those generous efforts which are made to prevent our vast portion of this western hemisphere from being any longer the disgraceful prison-house of the unfortunate sons of Africa.

That the Constitution invests Congress with ample power to impose a restriction with regard to slavery upon such States as may from time to time be admitted into the Union, the territory of which lies out of the original limits of the United States, we think there can be no doubt. The Union is indeed a compact of independent and sovereign States; but it is a compact whose base rests on the principles which all the States avowed in their combined struggle for freedom; on the principles of relative justice, of mutual sacrifices of interest for the general welfare, and of a surrender of individual rights to promote the strength and prosperity of one common Republic.

These principles, which, under Providence, gave vigor to the resistance of the colonies against the usurpation of the mother country, and a happy result to that resistance, did not cease to have a binding force upon the States when the conflict for liberty was over, and when, assuming again for a little while their original sovereignty, they deliberated in their individual capacity upon the adoption of such a form of government as would best secure to them and their posterity the blessings for which they had been contending. They were unshackled, it is true, by the restrictions of any written instrument, but they were still bound to each other by the ties of honor and justice. When we find them proclaiming to the world as one of the principles—nay, as the fundamental principle under which they had acted in concert—“that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness,” can we cast such a reproach upon the worthies who conducted their councils as to suppose that they meant entirely to abandon this principle, or not to feel its force? Its application, indeed, was waived with reference to those States whose policy led them to make it a condition of their adoption of the Federal Constitution that they should retain the privilege of holding slaves, and that these slaves should go to increase the mass of their population who should be entitled to a voice in our National Councils. But this was done in the spirit of compromise; and the original principle which was avowed in the Declaration of Independence revives, in all its primitive force, with reference to any new States which may be admitted into the Union, and which lie out of the limits of those States who made the compromise; so that no argument in favor of the absolute and entire sovereignty of new States is more fallacious than that drawn from a supposed analogy between their relation to the Union and that which existed between the States who originally formed this Union.

There has never been a period in our history since the time of our first resistance to Great Britain that a greater or less surrender of the rights of State sovereignty has not been made for the general good; and if, for the same object, such a surrender is now demanded of any portion of our country that wishes to enjoy the privilege of becoming a State, it has no right to complain of partial treatment; and unfounded indeed is such a complaint, when the surrender required, or the restriction imposed, is sanctioned by one of the fundamental principles of the great charter of our liberties; a departure from which, for reasons that no new State can now urge, was once reluctantly made in order to secure the unanimous adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Surely, if the States who were the original parties to the compact had a right to stipulate with each other with regard to the surrender which each should make of some portion of its sovereignty for the common weal, they have now the right, through Congress, as their organ, to make similar stipulations for the same object with those who are to become new parties to the compact. The only question, then, that remains is, has the Constitution empowered Congress to act as this organ? The third section of the fourth article of that instrument says: “New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new States shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.” The fair construction of this language is, that Congress is to judge of the expediency of admitting new States into the Union, and also of the terms of their admission; and, lest this power vested in Congress should seem to encroach upon the sovereignty of the States who were actually parties to the compact, their consent is made necessary in case new States are formed out of them, or by their junction; which evidently proves that, in all other cases, the power of Congress was to be complete and unrestricted. As the Constitution nowhere gives any portion of territory, or any mass of population, the right to force itself into the Union; and as it nowhere describes the precise conditions upon which new States may be admitted, but refers the whole subject in the most general terms to Congress, it seems to result from the very necessity of the case, as well as from the fair interpretation of the Constitution, that Congress must judge of the expediency and of the conditions of all such admissions. This power Congress has more than once exercised; nor have the various restrictions which it has imposed upon several of the new States, as the terms of their admission into the Union, been heretofore considered any infringement of the Constitution, or undue encroachment upon State sovereignty. Good faith, therefore, will be strictly kept with those who have become subject to the Government of the United States by the treaty of the cession of Louisiana, if, upon their wishing to be made a new State, they are required, as a condition of this, to pledge themselves to interdict slavery within their limits; for, although the treaty stipulates that they shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, yet, all this is to be done, as the same treaty stipulates, "according to the principles of the Federal Constitution." Like every other citizen of the United States, a citizen of the contemplated new State will have the privilege of holding slaves in those States where slavery is permitted; and, like other citizens, be debarred this privilege in States where slavery is not permitted. Nor does it at all affect the merits of the case that his own happens to be one of these States. Without going into any detail of argument, the same reasoning applies, mutatis mutandis, with conclusive force to the objection which is raised to the proposed restriction against the existence of slavery in any new State, from that article in the Constitution which provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

So far from injustice being done to the slaveholding States by the proposed restriction, which it is contended by many would be the case, we feel it a duty we owe to ourselves, as citizens of a State in which slavery is forbidden, to urge upon the consideration of your respectable body, the constituted guardian of our political rights and liberties, that the permission of slavery in the new States will be an unwarrantable departure from the principles of that compromise which it is confessed led to the formation of that part of the Constitution which gives to the slaveholding States such an influence in the councils of the nation from a great mass of the population who are not recognised or treated as freemen. This was, in fact, a bargain made between distinct and independent contracting parties, and, in good faith, this bargain ought not to be stretched in its application to any new parties, without the consent of all those who originally made it.

But these considerations are merged in the more important ones of national policy and interest. The evils which are already felt, and the more dreadful ones which are to be feared, from the existence of slavery in our country, will, in the opinion of your memorialists, be greatly enhanced by the extension to new States of the privilege of holding their fellow-men in bondage. With all due regard to the best interests of those of our fellow-citizens who are at present immediately exposed to those evils, we do sincerely believe that their safety, as well as that of the Union, depends upon keeping the slave population of our country within the narrowest possible limits. If coercion be necessary, it can be most easily, promptly, and successfully applied. If dangers are to be apprehended, they will most quickly be perceived. If plans of gradual emancipation are to be adopted, they will be more efficaciously carried into effect. Philanthropy has, indeed, pleaded in behalf of those who are in bondage, that their condition will be meliorated by scattering them over a greater extent of territory. Admitting that this might in some instances be the case, yet the prospect of a final deliverance from this miserable captivity would be diminished, if not destroyed; and that cupidity, which now is cunning enough to elude the watchful eye of civil authority, would have new temptations presented to excite its more insatiable desires; new markets would be opened for its cruel enterprises; and the places of those who might be carried to spread the contagion of this terrible moral disease into regions which are yet unsullied by its contamination would soon be supplied by a succession of fresh victims. Besides, we deprecate the diffusion of the slaveholding spirit, so incompatible with the noble and ingenuous character of freemen; so unhappy in the association which it forms in the minds of the rising generation, who are the hope and stay of our country; so inconsistent with the manly attitude which we have taken among the nations of the earth as the asserters of human freedom; so destructive of the physical strength of a State, by impressing on the brow of honest labor the mark of servitude and disgrace; so discouraging to the gradual progress, through a vast and growing territory, of a bold and hardy yeomanry, tillers of their own soil, and its most able defenders; so hostile to the temper of that religion which is at once the brightest ornament and surest strength of a people; and so ungrateful in its exercise towards that Being to whose justice we appealed for protection when we ourselves felt the pressure of that very yoke of bondage which now bears with a more galling and cruel weight on thousands of our fellow-men. He delivered us from the yoke, and he has crowned that deliverance with a profusion of the choicest blessings. What do we not owe to his goodness!

In making such appeals, we boast of no moral superiority over our Southern brethren. We well know that this dreadful curse was entailed upon them, and that too many of our own citizens have contributed to its continuance. We sympathize with them in any evils from this source which they feel, or dangers which they may fear. We rejoice with them, too, in any prospects which a kind Providence may be opening for the gradual and complete deliverance of our common country from this stain upon its reputation and canker of its prosperity; we hail, with them, the dawning of a happier day, when the combined efforts of our own and the other nations of the earth shall generously redress the wrongs of injured Africa, and, if possible, repay her sufferings, by raising her from her present state of moral and political degradation to the enjoyment of all those privileges for the possession of which she is now stretching forth her supplicating hands.

It is to give our own favored nation the best opportunity to take such a part as wisdom and prudence may suggest in this noble work of benevolence; to shield it against the imputation under which it has too long labored, that it can wield with one arm the weapons of war against its oppressors, while it rivets with the other the chains of bondage upon its unhappy victims; and, in the mean time, to furnish it with the best safeguard against the evils which may result from its misfortune or its crime, that we have united with others of our fellow-citizens in the object of this memorial, which we lay before your respectable body, with the assurance that, as it rests upon the immutable basis of truth and justice, its influence will not be lost.

ATTORNEY GENERAL.

[Communicated to the Senate, March 29, 1820.]

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE.

SIR: I beg leave to call your attention to the state of this office, and to some material defects which, I think, exist in the laws in relation to it, with the view that the subject, if you shall think it of sufficient importance to merit this course, may be presented, through your committee, to the consideration of Congress before they rise.

The commission of the Attorney General "authorizes and empowers him to execute and fulfil the duties of that office according to law." The only law which points out those duties is the act of Congress of the 24th of September, 1789, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," the thirty-fifth section of which act creates the office, and designates its duties in the following words: "And there shall be appointed a meet person, learned in the law, to act as Attorney General for the United States, who shall be sworn or affirmed to the faithful execution of his office; whose duty it shall be to prosecute and conduct all suits in the Supreme Court in which the United States shall be concerned, and to give his advice and opinion upon questions of law, when requested by the President of the United States, or when requested by the Heads of any of the Departments, touching any matters that may concern their Departments." It is to be observed that there is no duty which the President or any Head of Department performs which does not involve some principle of law under the head either of the national or conventional law of nations, Constitutional law, or municipal law; consequently, there is no duty which belongs to either of those officers on which he has not the right to require the opinion of the Attorney General, and on which it is not continually required; and, in relation at least to questions on municipal law, (which are incessantly occurring,) it is understood that the Heads of Departments consider the advice of the law officer conclusive.

In the operations of an office whose sphere of action is so wide, and whose decisions are of such extensive and unremitting practical effect, it would seem to be of consequence to the nation that some degree of consistency and uniformity should prevail; but it is obvious that these can be attained in no other way than by putting the incumbent for the time being in full possession of all the official opinions and acts of his predecessors.

Under this impression, when I had the honor of receiving the appointment, my first inquiry was for the books containing the acts of advice and opinions of my predecessors. I was told there were none such. I asked for the documents belonging to the office, presuming that at least the statements of cases which had been submitted for the opinion of the law officer had been filed, and that I should find endorsed on them some note of their advice in each case; but my inquiries resulted in the discovery that there was not to be found, in connexion with this office, any trace of a pen indicating, in the slightest manner, any one act of advice or opinion which had been given by any one of my predecessors, from the first foundation of the Federal Government to the moment of my inquiry. Thus, the gentlemen who have held this office in succession, having no guide as to the past, have been in constant danger of being involved themselves, and involving the Departments which depended on their counsel, in perpetual collisions and inconsistencies, and exposing the Government to that kind of degradation which never fails to attend an unsteady and contradictory course.

In noticing the omission to keep these records, and preserve the statements and documents, I am very far from intending any censure on my predecessors, for no law had enjoined it on them as a duty; and from the multitude and variety of questions which are unavoidable pressing upon this office throughout the year, it is very apparent that the plan which I suggest could not have been executed without an expense in clerk hire here, fuel, stationery, &c., for which there is no provision by law.

After this explanation, I submit it to you, sir, with great deference, whether it would not be expedient that some provision be made, by law, for keeping a record of the opinions and official correspondence of the Attorney General in his office, and for preserving in his office the documents submitted for his advice.

Again: the subjects on which the Attorney General is occasionally consulted, and those on which he has to act in the Supreme Court, turn not unfrequently on the local laws of the several States; but these have not been furnished to his office, and the omission is a serious practical evil. Would it not be well that the office of the Attorney General should be supplied with these laws?

Another defect seems to me to exist in the law

as it now stands. You will observe that the only law which prescribes the duty of the Attorney General, and which I have already quoted, limits the obligation upon him, and consequently limits his rights to give official advice and opinions to cases in which he shall be called upon by the President, or by any of the Departments, touching any matters which may concern their Departments. But I am told (and, in my short experience, I have already found it true, in part) that the advice and opinion of the Attorney General, in his official character, are called for by the committees of Congress, standing and special, by all the district attorneys, collectors of customs, collectors of the public taxes, and marshals throughout the United States, by courts-martial, military and naval, wheresoever they may sit, &c. If it be advisable to open the office of the Attorney General to applications of this kind, I submit it to you, sir, whether it would not be expedient to have it provided for by law. 1st. That the several officers and public bodies which have been mentioned, instead of resting on the personal courtesy of the Attorney General, may be authorized to call for his opinion as a matter of right; and 2dly, (which strikes me as being of equal if not superior importance,) that the Attorney General himself may be justified in giving an official opinion in these cases; for, in a Government of laws like ours, it seems to me of importance that the influence of every office should be confined within the strict limits prescribed for it by law. It cannot be questioned, from the connexion of the Attorney General with the Executive branch of the Government, that his advice and opinions, given as Attorney General, will have an official influence beyond and independent of whatever intrinsic professional merit they may possess; and whether it be sound policy to permit this officer, or any other under the Government, even on the application of others, to extend the influence of his office beyond the pale of the law, and to cause it to be felt where the laws have not contemplated that it should be felt, is the point which I beg leave to submit to your consideration.

There is, however, a strong objection to any new provision which should go to open the office of the Attorney General, as now organized, to applications beyond the provision of the act of 1789. It is this: I am convinced that no single, unassisted individual, whatever may be his strength, his habits of industry, or the system and celerity of his movements, could discharge, in a manner satisfactory to himself or the nation, the vast load of duties which would be thus thrown upon him, without devoting himself to them solely and exclusively. The very frequent calls which are regularly and properly made upon his office under the act of 1789, and the careful and elaborate examination which it is often necessary to bestow upon these subjects, are found to be sufficient, in connexion with the Attorney General's duties in the Supreme Court, to give the office, at present, almost constant occupation; and if, in addition to these duties, he shall be placed under a legal obligation to answer all the other calls which have been mentioned, he must unavoidably abandon entirely the individual pursuits of his profession, and rest for the support of his family on the salary attached to the office. Even under the duties as they now exist, very little time is left to the Attorney General to aid the salary of his office by individual engagements—a fact which may explain, in part, the frequent resignations of this office which have heretofore occurred.

I would not have troubled you with these suggestions at this time, but that the subject strikes me as being of so much practical importance to the nation as to merit consideration, and that it relates to an office, the defective organization of which, however grievous to the incumbent, or injurious to the public, would not be apt to force itself on the notice of others.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. WIRT.

HON. HUGH NELSON,
Chairman Judiciary Com. H. R.

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1820.

DEAR SIR: I understand that the appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, is now before the Senate; and, not having observed who is the chairman of the committee to whom the subject will belong, I beg leave to call your attention to a change which has been made in the appropriation relative to the office of Attorney General.

In the year 1818, I addressed a letter to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, relative to the state in which I had found the office of the Attorney General, and the causes that had produced it. Mr. Strother, of the House of Representatives, has now a copy of that letter, which you will please receive from him. This representation made it manifest that the public good required the appointment of a clerk to record those official opinions of the law officer of the Government by which the movements of the several Departments were regulated, in order to preserve consistency and harmony in the operations of the Government in execution of our laws, under every change of the public officers. A clerk was accordingly appointed, at a salary of $1,000 per annum; but as it was idle to appoint a clerk, and allow rooms for an office, without allowing also stationery, fuel, and a boy to attend to the menial duties of the office, a small contingent fund of $500 was allowed to procure these articles, the whole of which were strictly for the public good.

I understand that the House of Representatives have stricken off $200 from the salary of the clerk, and have stricken out also the whole of the $500 for contingencies; thus leaving a clerk, indeed, at a reduced salary, but not leaving the means to employ him, to wit, stationery, fuel, &c. The manifest injustice of requiring me to furnish these articles for public use will, I doubt not, produce a reinstatement of the allowance of the contingent fund, which, indeed, is scarcely adequate to its object; since, out of this allowance of $500, there are to be supplied fuel, stationery, a boy to attend to the menial duties of the office, carrying messages, &c., and the printer's bills for all the statements required for the United States cases in the Supreme Court. You will learn, on inquiry, that the whole $500 will scarcely pay a messenger in any other office.

If you think the case worthy of attention, I would thank you to represent it to the chairman of the committee who have the subject under consideration, and to the Senate, if necessary.

Your friend and servant,

WILLIAM WIRT.

The Hon. NINIAN EDWARDS.

ADJUSTMENT OF BOUNDARY BETWEEN KENTUCKY AND TENNESSEE.

[Communicated to the House, April 14, 1820.]

The States of Kentucky and Tennessee, desirous of terminating the controversy which has so long subsisted between said States in relation to their common boundary, and of restoring the most perfect good understanding and harmony between them, have for that purpose appointed their respective commissioners, that is to say: the State of Kentucky, on her part, has appointed John J. Crittenden and Robert Trimble; and the State of Tennessee, on her part, has appointed Felix Grundy and William L. Brown, who, after a reciprocal communication of their respective powers, have agreed upon the following articles and stipulations.

ARTICLE 1. The line of boundary and separation between the States of Kentucky and Tennessee shall be as follows, to wit: The line run by the Virginia commissioners in the years 1779 and 1780, commonly called Walker's line, as the same is reputed, understood, and acted upon by the said States, their respective officers and citizens, from the southeastern corner of Kentucky to the Tennessee river; thence with and up said river to the point where the line of Alexander and Munsell, (run by them in the last year, under the authority of an act of the Legislature of Kentucky, entitled "An act to run the boundary line between this State and the State of Tennessee, west of the Tennessee river, approved February 8, 1819,") would cross said river; and thence, with the said line of Alexander and Munsell, to the termination thereof on the Mississippi river, below New Madrid.

ART. 2. It is agreed and understood that, from the point where Walker's line strikes the Tennessee river to the point where the line of Alexander and Munsell would cross the same, the said Tennessee river shall be the common boundary of said States, and subject to their common use and concurrent jurisdiction. Any island or islands in that part of the river Tennessee which forms the common boundary between the two States shall be within the exclusive jurisdiction of Kentucky; but any appropriations thereof by individuals, heretofore made under the laws of North Carolina or Tennessee, shall be valid.

ART. 3. Whenever the Governor of either State shall deem it expedient to have the boundary between the two States which is east of the Tennessee river, or any part thereof, run and plainly marked, he shall cause a notification thereof to be communicated to the Governor of the other State, and thereupon, with all convenient despatch, two surveyors shall be appointed for that purpose, one by the Governor of each State; and the surveyors so appointed shall have power to employ a competent number of chain-carriers and assistants, and they shall ascertain, survey, and mark said line plainly and durably, having due respect to the provisions of the first article hereof; and it shall be the duty of said surveyors to make out and sign duplicate plats and reports of their surveys and proceedings, to be communicated by each surveyor to the Governor of his respective State, to be deposited and preserved in the office of the Secretary of State, for a testimony and memorial of the boundary between said States; and all cost and expense that may be incurred under the provisions of this article, and in surveying and marking said boundary line, shall be paid by said States jointly and equally.

ART. 4. The claims to lands lying west of the Tennessee river, and north of Alexander and Munsell's line, and derived from North Carolina or Tennessee, shall be considered null and void; and claims to lands lying south of said line and west of Tennessee river, derived from Virginia or Kentucky, shall in like manner be considered null and void.

ART. 5. All lands now vacant and unappropriated by any person or persons claiming to hold under the State of North Carolina or Tennessee, east of the Tennessee river, and north of the parallel of latitude thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north, shall be the property and subject to the disposition of the State of Kentucky; which State may make all laws necessary and proper for disposing of and granting said lands, or any part thereof, and may, by herself or officers, do any acts necessary and proper for carrying the foregoing provisions of this article into effect; and any grant or grants she may make therefor, or any part thereof, shall be received in evidence in all the courts of law and equity in the State of Tennessee, and be available to the party deriving title under the same; and the land referred to in this article shall not be subject to taxation by the State of Tennessee for five years, except so far as the same may, in the mean time, be appropriated by individuals.

ART. 6. Claims to lands east of the Tennessee river, between Walker's line and the latitude of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north, derived from the State of Virginia in consideration of military services, shall not be prejudiced in any respect by the establishment of Walker's line; but such claims shall be considered as rightfully entered or granted, and the claimants may enter upon said lands, or assert their rights in the courts of justice, without prejudice by lapse of time, or from any statute of limitations for any period prior to the settlement of the boundary between the two States, saving, however, to the holders and occupants of conflicting claims (if any there be) the right of showing such entries or grants to be invalid and of no effect, or that they have paramount or superior titles to the land covered by such Virginia claims.

ART. 7. All private rights and interests of lands between Walker's line, from the Cumberland river, near the mouth of Oby's river, to the southeastern corner of Kentucky, at the point where the boundary line between Virginia and Kentucky intersects Walker's line on the Cumberland mountain, and the parallel of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, heretofore derived from Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, or Tennessee, shall be considered as rightfully emanating from either of those States; and the States of Kentucky and Tennessee reserve to themselves, respectively, the power of carrying into grant claims not yet perfected; and in case of conflicting claims (if any there be) the validity of each claim shall be tested by the laws of the State from which it emanated, and the contest shall be decided as if each State, respectively, had possessed the jurisdiction and soil, and full power and right to authorize the location, survey, or grant, according to her own rules and regulations.

ART. 8. It is agreed that the foregoing articles shall receive the most liberal construction for effecting the objects contemplated; and should any disagreement arise as to the interpretation, or in the execution thereof, two citizens of the United States, but residents of neither Kentucky nor Tennessee, shall be selected, one by the Executive of each State, with power to choose an umpire in case of disagreement, whose decision shall be final on all points to them submitted.

ART. 9. Should any further legislative acts be requisite to effectuate the foregoing articles and stipulations, the faith of the two States is hereby pledged that they will unite in making such provisions, and respectively pass such laws as may be necessary to carry the same into full and complete effect.

ART. 10. The foregoing articles and stipulations, if ratified by the Legislature of Kentucky during their present session, shall forever be obligatory and binding on both States, and take effect from this day.

In faith whereof, we, the respective commissioners, have signed these articles, and have hereunto affixed our seals. Done in duplicate, at Frankfort, the 2d day of February, 1820.

ROADS CONTEMPLATED BY THE TREATY OF BROWNSTOWN.

[Communicated to the House, May 12, 1820.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what further provision may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of the treaty made at Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan, reported:

That the treaty referred to was concluded on the 25th day of November, 1808, and that its exclusive object appears to have been to obtain the establishment of a practicable and convenient road from the interior settlements of the United States to those of the Territory of Michigan.

Many of the tribes of Indians with whom that treaty was concluded were, in virtue of previous treaties, entitled to receive within that Territory large annuities; there never had been any artificial road leading to it, except through the province of Upper Canada; delays had consequently occurred in the transmission of those annuities, and reiterated complaints were made because they were not received; or, if received, frequently damaged. To obviate such difficulties, and in the expectation that many important advantages would result to them from a measure which promised to bring them more immediately under the observation and protection of the Government, the Indians, parties to the treaty, without any further remuneration than such incidental benefits as they anticipated from the establishment of the proposed road, voluntarily ceded to the United States a tract of land of one hundred and twenty feet in width, extending from the "foot of the rapids of the Miami of the Lake" to the western line of the "Connecticut Western Reserve," and all the land within one mile of said tract on each side of it; and, also, another tract of land of one hundred and twenty feet in width, extending from Lower Sandusky, southerly, to the boundary line established by the Treaty of Greenville. This treaty is, in the body of it, declared to be reciprocally binding; but it is observable that no new obligation, of any nature, seems to have been imposed by it upon the United States, unless it may be fairly inferrible, from its context, its avowed object, and the circumstances attending its conclusion, that this Government became bound to establish and maintain the contemplated road.

The intention of the parties to the treaty your committee believe to be obvious; the history of the transaction, the repeated declarations of the Indian chiefs who were parties to it, and the sentiments of Mr. Jefferson, then President of the United States, and who directed the negotiation, as they are disclosed in his Message to this House of the date of January 30, 1808, which accompanied a copy of the Treaty of Detroit, combined with the evidence furnished by the context of the treaty, indicate, conclusively, the establishment of a safe and convenient road as the sole object of the negotiation.

No measures, however, seem to have been adopted with a view to the attainment of that object until, by an act of Congress of the date of December 12, 1811, the President of the United States was authorized to appoint three commissioners to explore, survey, and mark the most eligible course for the proposed roads; and the sum of $6,000 was appropriated to defray the expenses of executing the law.

Before any progress, however, could be made in giving effect to the views of Congress, war existed between this nation and Great Britain; and, of that war, the first fruits were the temporary loss of that entire province, to open an avenue to which was the object of the law referred to. The lamentable consequences which resulted from so humiliating an occurrence it is quite unnecessary to detail; it is sufficient to ask the attention of the House to the fact, that the barrier interposed by the northwestern posts having been broken down, the congregated force of the northern Indians was immediately felt along the whole interior and incurved frontier of Ohio and Indiana. Such a state of things was not favorable to the purpose of exploring the country and establishing roads. The money which was appropriated for the purpose of giving effect to the Treaty of Brownstown was soon lost in the immense aggregate of disbursements rendered necessary to enable the northwestern army under the command of General Harrison to advance: the greater part of the sum was expended in opening a road—of the first importance, certainly, for without it the northwestern army could have made no progress; but quite useless as it regards the permanent and paramount object contemplated by the Treaty of Brownstown—that of obtaining a good road over the Black Swamp. Not a solitary traveller now finds his way along that avenue; it is principally indicated by the broken remnants of baggage-wagons and gun-carriages, the scattered remains of flour barrels, and mouldering skeletons of horses and oxen, remaining, as they were left, just visible above the surface of the mud and wet which destroyed them. The road being found thus entirely useless, the President was authorized by an act of Congress of April 16, 1816, to alter its location. It is believed that some progress has been made, through the War Department, in the selection of a better site for a road, but no progress has been made in opening it; and it seems to your committee quite impossible, by the aid only of a small and diminished military force of the Government at Detroit, to effect at any time so desirable a work.

Such had been the proceedings in reference to the Treaty of Brownstown, and such the small progress made towards the accomplishment of its purpose, when, in September, 1817, the Treaty of the Rapids of the Miami was concluded; by the subsequent ratification of which, the Indian title to the whole country within which the contemplated roads were to be located became vested in this Government.

It has not escaped the observation of your committee that this treaty may be considered to affect materially the relation in which the General Government previously stood in reference to the Treaty of Brownstown; yet they have supposed that if the obligation imposed upon this Government by the last-mentioned treaty were an absolute one, if no election were given to the United States originally to make the roads contemplated and accept the cession, or, at their pleasure, to dissent from the grant and refuse to make and continue the roads, then the obligatory force of the Treaty of Brownstown cannot justly be deemed to have ceased in consequence of the treaty of the 29th September, 1817; but that, in good faith, this Government is still bound to fulfil all its requisitions. Without endeavoring, however, to arrive with technical precision at the only true construction of which these treaties may now be susceptible, your committee remain entirely satisfied that other considerations, founded in motives of the truest economy and the soundest policy, imperiously require the positive accomplishment of the views disclosed by the parties to the Treaty of Brownstown.

The Black Swamp, so celebrated in the annals of our recent history, is an extensive morass, which winds round the southeastern border of Michigan; it terminates on the north at the border of Lake Erie, comprehending a width of about thirty miles; it extends so far southerly and southwesterly as to interrupt all communication by land between the settlements in Michigan and those of the interior of the United States. It consists of an elevated basin of impervious clay, upon which rests a thick stratum of fertile black loam; there is so little inclination in its general surface that, though numerous streams pass through it, there is little opportunity for the water with which it is sometimes almost entirely covered to escape from it, except by the slow process of evaporation; while, at the same time, there exist unequivocal indications that its surface is elevated so far above the level of the water-courses and of the lake as that, by artificial drains, it may be made subservient to all the purposes of profitable agriculture.

No reliance, however, can be placed upon the individual industry of that country to construct a road over such a morass. The construction of a road must precede the establishment there of any considerable population.

The State of Ohio, within whose limits this morass is principally situated, if she possessed more ample funds than she does possess, could find no sufficient inducement to such an undertaking, for she has, comparatively, no inhabitants beyond it to protect; it forms the boundary of her population in that direction. Such a road must, therefore, be a national work. And, in addition to all those political considerations which so obviously and so powerfully dictate the construction throughout the Union of artificial roads and canals, there are others of local application, which, in the opinion of your committee, do imperiously call for the attention of the General Government to this particular section of the Union.

Such a road as is proposed would pass through a vast country of uncultivated land, the whole of which yet remains the exclusive property of the Government. Public lands are here considered a legitimate source of public revenue. To carry into effect the provisions of the Treaty of Brownstown would not only bring into market the beautiful country which is beyond the Miami, with the certain prospect of better and more accelerated sales, but would induce the settlement of that country, now so repulsive in its aspect, which lies between the Sandusky and the Miami, over which the road would go; it would soon be reclaimed; the construction of the road itself would uncover a considerable portion of the adjacent land, and fit it, with little additional expense, for immediate cultivation.

Roads contemplated by the Treaty of Brownstown.

Your committee feel that they hazard nothing in the proposition that, in a pecuniary point of view alone, this nation would soon find itself more than remunerated for the expense which might be incurred in the construction of the road, by the increased value of the public lands, and the accelerated sales it would induce.

There remains another and a distinct view of this subject, which your committee feel it a duty briefly to present. In examining the topic referred to them, your committee could not fail to consider it in regard to the military defences of the country.

The situation of the Territory of Michigan, in relation to the province of Upper Canada, renders that frontier, more than any other perhaps, peculiarly exposed; its settlements, rarely penetrating into the interior, in no place presenting a very dense population, extend along the meandering shores of the lakes and straits from Lake Erie to Lake Huron, and approach the very verge of the national boundary; they lie at the foot of that vast avenue which leads through Lakes Huron and Superior into the immense country of the northwest, and down which, with surprising facility, a formidable Indian force may at any time be brought upon them. In its rear, and intervening between it and the interior settlements of Ohio and Indiana, there still continues a numerous and powerful Indian population of many thousands, while its southeastern termination rests upon that formidable morass which so entirely separates that Territory from the strength and the power of this nation. So circumstanced, this prolonged line of settlement is opposed in front by the most thriving population of Upper Canada—a population increasing with a rapidity unprecedented in the annals of Canadian history, and which, whether its moral or physical character be considered, will hereafter be found more formidable, it is believed, than that of any other portion of either Canada.

Opposed by difficulties on all sides, and completely isolated, it would be unreasonable to suppose that the people of the Territory of Michigan, though influenced by the most devoted patriotism, could alone successfully resist so complicated a pressure as, in the event of a future war with Great Britain, may be brought to bear upon them. But, how much soever it concerns the honor of this nation to sustain its authority and to protect its people in every part of the empire, yet any consideration founded alone in the exposed condition of the inhabitants of Michigan becomes of diminished importance when the situation of that territory is adverted to, as it has relation to the interior frontier of Ohio, Indiana, and even Illinois. It is on the peninsula of Michigan alone that the exposed parts of that frontier can be cheaply and securely defended against Indian or English hostile incursions. The military positions of Detroit, Fort Gratiot, and Michilimackinac, and their intervening and neighboring settlements, are, in relation to that greatly extended interior frontier, a perfectly effectual redoubt. No enemy can approach it, except the citizens of that remote country, and the authority of this nation there, be first prostrated in the dust.

Your committee do not deem it important to fortify the proposition which on this point they advance by any train of deductions; they only beg leave to advert to two distinct periods in the history of that country, feeling entirely satisfied that an illusion to them, in connexion with the subject of this report, will be found to justify any practicable measures which may tend to increase the effective strength of the territory, or render more safe and practicable its communication with the interior of the Union.

In all that period which intervened between the treaty of peace of 1798 and the surrender to this Government of the northwestern posts, and while the Territory of Michigan was in the possession of a Power either hostile or indifferent to the peace of this country, it is matter of history that the western settlements were in a state of continued warfare; from the heights of the Alleghany to Natchez, its whole line of frontier was marked by blood and fire. But when the authority of this Government was established there, Indian hostility was neutralized; and, under the cover of profound peace, the Western country grew rapidly. Held in check by the barrier which the possession of the settled parts of Michigan enabled this nation to interpose against the English and the Indians of the northwest, the Indians of the peninsula of Michigan and of the northern part of Ohio were deterred, during the early part of the late war, from acts of hostility; but when the authority of this nation was prostrated there, distress and dismay pervaded the whole defenceless line of the most advanced settlements, from Cleveland, on Lake Erie, through Ohio and Indiana. But when again, before the conclusion of the war, this Government had, at an almost infinite expense of money, and by a sacrifice of blood which was above price, re-occupied these positions from which it had been driven, the scene of war was again removed, and the battles of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, were fought on the borders of Michigan.

The inference your committee would deduce from the historical facts alluded to is, they flatter themselves, manifest. It consists, unquestionably, with the true policy of this Government to throw into the peninsula of Michigan, by every practicable means, a dense population; and it is more especially their true policy to construct over the Black Swamp a permanent, safe, and convenient public road. Such a measure is dictated by good faith; for there can be no doubt but that the measure was contemplated by the parties to the Treaty of Brownstown. It is dictated by a wise regard to national economy; for the contemplated road would open an avenue to a fertile and beautiful country—the peninsula of Michigan—a country the soil within which is almost exclusively the property of the nation. It would conduce greatly, too, to the settlement of the immediate country, which is also the exclusive property of the nation, and the settlement of which must, almost of necessity, be preceded by some extraordinary effort of the National Government. But such a measure is not less imperiously called for as an almost indispensable measure of defence. The prodigious sums of money which were expended in the efforts which the nation made to reoccupy that territory would have constructed many such roads—efforts which could never have been called for; for if, in the spirit of the Treaty of Brownstown, good roads had, previously to the war, been constructed, if a convenient and practicable communication between Ohio and Michigan had existed, this nation would have been spared the humiliation of witnessing a disgraceful capitulation, and that devoted people would have been saved from the indescribable horrors of Indian devastation.

Every view which your committee have been able to take of the subject referred to them having confirmed them in the very decided opinion to which they have arrived, that a public road ought to be constructed from the Miami to the western line of the Connecticut Western Reserve, it remains for them respectfully to submit their opinion as to the best means by which that desirable object may be effected. They have not been regardless of the diminished amount of the public revenues; they are aware of the strong desire entertained by the House to limit the public expenditures to the smallest practicable sum; and it is with much satisfaction, therefore, that they feel themselves justified in recommending an expedient which they think will be adequate to the exigency, without any specific appropriation of money.

On reference to the stipulations contained in the Treaty of Brownstown, it is observable that a mile in width on each side of the contemplated road from the Miami to the Western Reserve is granted, as well as the site for the road itself, to the United States. It seems probable that the framers of that treaty had in view, at the time of the negotiation, the application of the whole of the ceded land, specifically, to the purpose of defraying the expense of making the road. From the best information which your committee have been able to obtain, they entertain the belief that this tract would furnish a fund more than adequate to the exigency, and that no more appropriate application could be made of the land in question.

They, therefore, respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to bring in a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract with any person or persons to construct a permanent and suitable road, to extend from the foot of the rapids of the Miami of the Lake to the western line of the Connecticut Western Reserve, according to the plan contemplated by the Treaty of Brownstown, and on such route, passing through the reserve (so called) at Lower Sandusky, as the President may direct, in consideration of the whole of the tracts on each side of the contemplated road which were granted by the Treaty of Brownstown, or so much thereof as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, may be adequate to the object; and in which bill shall also be inserted, among other things, a provision or provisions that the person or persons so contracted with do complete the said road within a reasonable time, in said bill to be limited; that such person or persons do stipulate to keep said road in good repair for and during a number of years, to be in said bill defined; and also that the person or persons so contracted with do also give bond, with sufficient sureties, for the faithful performance of his or their contract; and also a provision defining a time and manner in which the title to said lands may be conveyed.

All which, together with the documents Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, which accompany this report, and which they pray may be taken as part of it, is respectfully submitted.

No. 1.

Whereas a grant of land was made by certain tribes of Indians, at a treaty held at Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan, on the 25th of November, 1808, for locating a road from the foot of the rapids of the Miami of the Lake to the western line of the Connecticut Reserve; and a road to run southwardly from the Lower Sandusky to the boundary line established by the Treaty of Greenville: and whereas the sum of six thousand dollars was appropriated by an act of Congress passed December 12, 1811, for the purposes of defraying the expenses of exploring, surveying, and opening the same, which has not been expended agreeably to the provisions of the said act, but from some cause has been turned over to some other appropriation, or yet remains unexpended in the Treasury of the United States: therefore—

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their influence to have the sum aforesaid laid out on one or both of the before-mentioned roads, as they think will be most advantageous to the interests of the State, and consistent with the original appropriation.

Resolved, That the Governor of this State be requested to forward one copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and one copy to the Delegate from the Territory of Michigan.

No. 2.

WASHINGTON CITY, March 31, 1820.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries relating to the application of certain moneys appropriated to lay out and make certain roads contemplated by the Treaty of Brownstown, I have to make the following statement:

On the 27th of August, 1812, Mr. Secretary Gal-

Roads contemplated by the Treaty of Brownstown.

latin wrote me (then Governor of Ohio) on the subject of that road. A copy of his letter is herewith enclosed, to which I replied, stating to him the only course I could pursue in making the road preparatory to the march of the northwestern army under General Harrison. As it was a state of war, and the road to Sandusky altogether through the Indian country, no contract could be made for opening the road. I ordered out a company of frontier militia, who opened the road, thus coupling the defence of the frontiers with the making of the road. This was done in the autumn of 1812. In January, I received from the Treasury of the United States $5,500, of which I expended on the road $4,922 14, before the march of the army alluded to. Having many occasions for disbursing moneys on account of war operations, the residue of the $5,500 was applied to various services, and for which I am accountable to the United States. I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

R. J. MEIGS, Jr.

No. 3.

Extract of a letter from Governor Lewis Cass and General Duncan McArthur to the Secretary of War, dated

MIAMI RAPIDS, November 29, 1817.

It is well known that along the southern margin of this part of Lake Erie is a tract of wet land which always presents serious difficulties to the traveller, and frequently insurmountable obstacles.

From Fort Meigs, for many miles towards Urbana, and nearly the whole distance to Lower Sandusky, it becomes a morass known by the name of the Black Swamp. To reach the Territory of Michigan from any part of the settlements of the State of Ohio, by land, this swamp must be crossed.

No description can convey to a person who is unacquainted with it an adequate idea of the difficulties to be surmounted before a tolerable road can be formed through this country. Little is hazarded in saying that individual enterprise, or the operation of ordinary causes, will not accomplish it for a period which the rapid improvement of the United States, generally, would leave without a parallel. But the country from the extremities of this swamp, northward to Detroit, and southward and eastward to the settlements in Ohio, is level and wet, and a good road through it, to be made at all, must be made at the national expense.

The events of the late war with Great Britain upon this frontier must have satisfied every reflecting person that a good road, at the commencement of that war, passing from the interior of Ohio to Detroit, would have saved to the nation the expenditure of immense sums of money, and would have rendered the reduction of that place at any time easy, and its tenure secure. The supplies of provisions and the munitions of war necessary to the operations of the army upon this frontier were transported at an enormous expense of time and treasure, and the principal obstacles opposed to those operations resulted from the nature of the country, and from its difficulty of access. This tract of country, in its present situation, renders the Territory of Michigan an insulated point upon the map of the nation. Its approach by water is uncertain, temporary, and, for many important purposes, inconvenient. By land it is difficult, tedious, and expensive. In any future war, its means of defence must be derived from the same States which were called upon to furnish them during the past. It is desirable, therefore, that the difficulties which were then experienced should be removed, and that the possession of a good road should enable the General Government at any time to throw into the country a force which would render it safe and secure; such a road would remove the barriers which nature has interposed, and would, in effect, approximate this country to the western portion of the Union, and, connected with the natural advantages it possesses, would insure it a speedy settlement, and an active and enterprising population.

But a road from the interior of Ohio to the lake only, would not answer this important purpose. Lake Erie may once more become the theatre of desperate exertion and skill; enterprise and courage may not again be rewarded with victory. But were our naval superiority upon this lake beyond the reach of accident, it should be still recollected that its navigation is more hazardous than that of the ocean, and for a considerable portion of the year closed or impeded by the ice.

It is precisely at this season, with the exception of a short time in the middle of the Winter, that the communication by land is most difficult; and the obstacles which are then interposed to traversing the country in any direction are serious and dangerous.

Should circumstances destroy our naval superiority upon the Upper Lakes, our communication with Detroit and its dependent settlements could be preserved by land only, and our possession of the country would in a great degree depend upon the facilities which the roads might offer to the march of troops, and to the transportation of their munitions of war, baggage and provisions. It is to be hoped that such an occurrence is remote; but the possibility of its happening, and its disastrous consequences, should we be found unprepared, furnish powerful motives to provide, as far as human wisdom can do, for the event.

By completing a road from Sandusky to Detroit, considerable progress would be made towards opening a great national communication from the capital to one of the extremities of the Union. The western turnpike from Cumberland to the Ohio, terminating at Wheeling, would leave only the portion of road between that place and Sandusky to be made. Future enterprise and industry, either individual or national, might complete the work, and it would equally promote the varied intercourse of peace and the important operations of war.

This view is prospective; but the time cannot be remote when the policy of connecting the different parts of this vast Republic by great permanent roads will be felt and acknowledged—when such a policy shall banish local jealousies and discordant interests; shall furnish new and increased facilities for private industry; and shall add strength and wealth to the resources of the nation.

Fort and military positions along a remote and exposed frontier will furnish little protection, unless the communication to it is rendered easy and expeditious. A great leading road, such as the nature of this country requires, and the public good demands, would add more to its permanent security than any other defensive measure which could be adopted.

But there are considerations connected with the necessity of such a road in consequence of the nature of the country, of its importance to the nation for the preservation of a weak and important frontier, and of the improbability that such a road will ever be made unless some portion of the general resources are directed to this object. But, viewed exclusively as a subject affecting the revenue, there can be no doubt but its operation would be favorable.

From the settlements in Ohio to Detroit, nearly the whole country is the property of the United States. Every consideration, either of a fiscal or political nature, demands the immediate sale and settlement of this land, and every measure is important which will facilitate the acquisition of either object. Among these measures the most obvious in itself, and most certain in its result, is the opening of a leading road. In any country this would be important; in this country it is absolutely necessary. Sales will only be made with a view to settlements, and settlement will be aided and encouraged by making roads where the population of the country will long be unable to make them.

There is little difficulty in proposing a plan which would accomplish this object, and in all probability increase the actual receipts at the Treasury, after the expenditures which may be necessary in effecting it.

Previous to the sale of the public lands, were the site of a permanent well-made road located from the line of the tract recently purchased of the Indians to Detroit, and were the national faith pledged for its completion within a reasonable period, the competition excited among the purchasers to procure the land in the vicinity of this road would add greatly to its value. Any estimate upon this subject must be loose and conjectural; but when it is considered that this road would pass through lands the property of the United States for at least one hundred and fifty miles, a great part of which is fertile and susceptible of compact settlements, and much of which is equal to any land in Ohio, it cannot be doubted but it will enter the market with every prospect of obtaining a price far exceeding that fixed by law. It would not be necessary, in order to secure the desired object, that the work should be actually commenced; every purpose would be answered by determining the site of the road, and delaying its completion till sufficient funds for that purpose were received from the sale of the land.

We have travelled out of the proper object of our mission in bringing this subject to the attention of the Government, but we trust our excuse will be found in its vital importance to this section of our country, and in the consideration that, if the present opportunity passes away without producing any favorable result, we may consider as hopeless every effort to attain it.

Considered as the means of increasing the national strength, and of securing the possession of an important frontier, we are aware that it has no exclusive claim to the attention of the General Government; every section of the Union has an equal right to urge its claims. But there is probably none in which the expenditure of an equal amount would be productive of more important consequences; and certainly there is none which is weaker in itself, or more difficult, from its position, to be defended.

But when it is recollected that this whole road, from the line of the purchase, was made upon the frontier settlement of the Ohio to the Detroit river, and will pass through a country the property of the United States, except one Indian reservation, and a few tracts which have been sold or granted at Lower Sandusky, Fort Meigs, and the river Raisin, the effect of such a road upon the sale of the land is a fair object of inquiry; and, if it is believed that the receipts from the sales will be increased by it, or even if such a result is doubtful, the importance and necessity of the measure, connected with other considerations, may fairly justify its adoption.

No. 4.

Extract of a letter addressed to the President, in the Winter of 1818-'19, by the Secretary of Michigan.

The alleged intention of the Government to diminish the force at the military post at Detroit, would seem to imply that the importance of that position is not justly appreciated.

If it be a correct proposition that, in respect to all permanent military arrangements, foreign people are to be considered in the character of belligerents, then I consider that position, in point of importance, inferior to very few.

It juts far into the enemy's country, commanding the roads which, running parallel with the Thames, or the shore of Lake Erie, little diverging, pass through the rapidly increasing settlements of that part of the province of Upper Canada which extends from the head of Lake Ontario, and subjects the greater part of those settlements to the control of a large force at Detroit. The topography of that country, while it furnishes great facilities for the rapid advance of an American force through it, protects remarkably its retreat.

As a position opposed to an enemy's acting offensively, Detroit, in relation to the country opposite, is a tête du pont. All the principal roads of the British country, above the lower extremity of Lake Erie, lead to, and terminate at or near the settlement of Sandwich; the position at Detroit commands them.

A large force here, also, will always keep in check the Indian tribes which inhabit the peninsula of Michigan, and, combined with other means, if it do not make them allies, will at least neutralize their hostility.

Payment for Property destroyed by the British.

On this peninsula there must be full one thousand and Indian warriors. Mr. Crooks, Dr. Turner, and other gentlemen, estimate them to be more numerous.

The routes by which these Indians ordinarily, and almost necessarily, communicate with the British, are up the river St. Joseph of Lake Michigan, and down the Huron to the mouth of the Detroit; and, from the northern extremity of it, past the south extreme of Saginaw bay, to the heads of river Rouge, and over to the Huron, coming in at the same point, opposite Malden; a large military force here, consequently, cuts off this communication.

This position, combined with that of Fort Gratiot, commands the straits of St. Clair and Detroit, and not only secures the upper country against the influence of a British naval superiority on Lake Erie, but secures, also, the safety of that avenue through which supplies to the upper post must, of necessity, pass; for it is firmly believed that, without almost infinite hazard and expense, they cannot pass up the waters of the Mississippi. From Indiana to Chicago they cannot go, for, through the intervening wilderness and swamps, not even an Indian foot path has been explored; nor, without imminent danger, can they be passed from Fort Wayne, for Detroit in possession of the enemy, the whole peninsula, being a wilderness, would be an enemy's country.

As a point from which to invade the upper province of Canada, Detroit is then of importance; but as a shield of defence for the uncovered frontier of Ohio and Indiana, as the only pledge of security for the upper posts, and as a security against Indian hostility, its importance must be manifest.

Yet, without a strong military force, this important barrier may, at any time, be taken by a coup de main. Its inhabitants, as yet not probably exceeding about eight thousand, are located in one extended and incurvated line from Lake Huron to Lake Erie, not presenting at any point a very compact settlement. They have in their rear the Indians of the peninsula; on the one flank a dreary extent of lake and wilderness; on the other, an impervious morass, cutting them off from the population of Ohio; while, in front, good and practicable roads lead to them, up which the concentrating force of the enemy may at any time be brought to bear upon them. How inadequate, therefore, is the country to the object of its own protection! If the Government had not heretofore closed the doors of the country against a greater influx of inhabitants, its situation would be less precarious. Since 1807 the Indian title over a very considerable portion of the country has been extinguished, but, until about the close of 1818, none of it has been brought into market.

To the advantages indicated by this view of the subject, of locating a considerable military force near Detroit, is to be superadded the important one of protecting emigrants now coming in, and for the first time penetrating into the back country, from the individual acts of hostility of wandering Indians. Such occasional acts of hostility are to be expected; they will be excited by interruptions upon their hunting grounds. And still further is to be added the advantage of giving effect to the project of making a road through the Black Swamp. This is a work which, without the national aid, will hardly be effected in very many years. The country between Fort Meigs and Sandusky cannot be settled until the swamp be drained; consequently, individual labor upon the road cannot be relied upon. The State of Ohio can hardly be expected to accomplish it; for, beyond that point, she has no citizens to protect; it forms her boundary in that direction. It must, therefore, be a national work—a work which, had it been effected before the late war, would have saved not only the degradation of a capitulated army, but also many millions of money.

It is very certain that a perfectly good military road may be made over this morass; it is equally certain that the greater part of it may be made capable of producing abundant crops. The very act of making a durable road over it will fit a considerable part of it for cultivation. The deep ditches which should be on each side of the road, leading into the many streams which would intersect that road, would drain a very considerable part of the land bordering it. This swamp is in general sufficiently elevated, consisting of a basin of hard clay, upon which is bedded a thick stratum of the most fertile black loam. The currents of the frequent streams which pass through it are rapid, and the height of their banks indicates that the general surface is not much depressed.

If the object of securing, by means of such a road, to the post of Detroit its military supplies, could be combined with that of inducing the settlement of the intermediate country, the advantage is surely worthy of notice, as it regards either the military or the fiscal concerns of the nation.

PAYMENT FOR PROPERTY DESTROYED BY THE BRITISH.

[Communicated to the House, January 12, 1820.]

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Jan. 11, 1820.

SIR: In conformity with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d ultimo, directing the Secretary of War to lay before that House the rules and regulations established by the Commissioner, and adopted by the War Department, in relation to the execution of the "act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," passed the 9th of April, 1816, particularly in relation to horses lost, I have the honor to transmit, herewith, the rules and regulations required.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Hon. H. CLAY, Speaker House of Reps.

Payment for Property destroyed by the British.Regulations for the government of the Commissioner of Claims, dated July, 1816.

The act of the 9th April, 1816, authorizing the appointment of a commissioner for the liquidation and payment of claims for property lost, captured, or destroyed in the service of the United States, and for other purposes, having subjected the commissioner appointed under that act to such rules as the President shall prescribe for the government of his conduct, the President, upon due consideration, has been pleased to direct that all cases comprehended in the fifth class of claims under the said act shall be referred to the additional accountant of the War Department before any decision shall be made thereon, in order to ascertain whether the same shall not have been previously satisfied.

Approved: JAMES MONROE.

Supplementary regulations.

The evidence of officers of the late army, and the certificates of those now in service, taken under the original regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Claims, must state whether any certificate or voucher in relation to such claim has been heretofore given, within the knowledge of the witness, or of the officer whose certificate is required. The claimant must also state, on oath, whether he has received any voucher, and account for its non-production where any has been obtained. In all cases, the name of the officer by whom the voucher was given, and its date, as nearly as can be ascertained, must be disclosed.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Sept. 7, 1816.

SIR: The President has been pleased to direct that the occupation of houses and buildings by the military force of the United States is embraced by the ninth section of the act "to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," and that compensation shall be allowed for damages sustained in consequence of such occupancy, in the same manner as if such houses and buildings had been occupied as a military deposite under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States. I have the honor, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

R. B. LEE, Esq., Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Sept. 19, 1816.

SIR: In looking over some of the cases referred by you to the accountant, it has occurred to me that the public interest requires that some additional regulations should be made to guard the Government against imposition.

In some cases, the evidence discloses the name of the officer by whose authority the impressment of the property for which compensation is claimed has been made; in others, there is no such disclosure. In the first case, where the original certificate of the officer, or his evidence, is not produced, it is but a reasonable precaution, to guard the public against imposition, that his testimony should be obtained. In the second, the evidence appears to me to be too loose to justify an award in favor of the claimant. The name of the officer by whose authority the property has been taken, with convenient certainty as to the time and place, should be disclosed, to enable the Government to obtain the benefit of his testimony. In some of the cases which I have looked into, the loss appears to have been sustained by the unauthorized depredations of the soldiers, and does not come within the provisions of the law.

The case of charges for attending to sick soldiers appears to me to be liable to the same objection. The witnesses in some cases swear generally to the fact of impressment, where it is difficult, if not impossible, to conceive how impressment could have existed.

Under all these circumstances, I have conceived it to be my duty to submit to the consideration of the President the propriety of directing that, in all cases of property impressed coming within the provisions of the law, the name and rank of the officer by whose authority it has been made shall be disclosed in the evidence, and that the testimony of such officer shall be obtained by the Commissioner, where it is practicable, before any decision shall be made in favor of such claimant; that the case of charges for attending sick soldiers, and the loss or destruction of property by the unauthorized acts of the soldiery, are not within the provisions of the law. In making this communication, I feel it my duty to observe that, in the execution of an act giving such extensive jurisdiction, under rules formed without experience, it would have been extraordinary if every difficulty had been foreseen and provided for in the regulations thus digested. In this, as in every theoretical essay, defects will necessarily be discovered in practice, which experience alone will be able to remove. I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

R. B. LEE, Esq., Commissioner.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Oct. 21, 1816.

SIR: Pursuant to the eleventh section of the "act making provision for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," the President has been pleased to direct—

That the first and second sections of the said act do not embrace the case of officers of the regular army; and that the property which a regular officer may have taken with him in the service, or which he may have been required by law to keep, is not comprehended by the terms "impressed or by contract," used in the third section.

That the provisions of the third section extend only to losses resulting from the acts of the enemy, or from the failure of the Government to supply the necessary forage.

Payment for Property destroyed by the British.

That the ninth section of the act extends only to cases of destruction of property by the enemy which are justifiable by the laws of civilized warfare. That the occupation of houses or buildings as places of military deposite, or by an armed force, must be continued up to the time of destruction. That the occupation of houses or buildings by an armed force for a night, upon a march, is not within the meaning of the said section, unless in the immediate presence of an enemy. That no compensation, by way of interest, rent, or damages, can be allowed under the act for the time which elapses between the destruction of the property and the decision of the Commissioner. That the act does not extend to the case of consequential injury resulting from the destruction of houses or buildings under the ninth section. No compensation can, therefore, be allowed for the destruction of houses or buildings not occupied as a military deposite, or by a military force. That, in all cases of doubt, or of great importance, the Commissioner shall submit the evidence to the Executive before any decision is made.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

R. B. LEE, Esq., Commissioner.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Oct. 30, 1816.

SIR: Your communications, dated the 25th and 28th of this month, have been submitted to the President, who has instructed me to say that the third section of the act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, &c., will not justify the payment of claims for partial injuries to oxen or horses. I am also instructed by the President to request that you will suspend all decisions under the ninth section of the above-mentioned act until further advised.

I have the honor, &c.,

GEORGE GRAHAM.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Sept. 27, 1816.

SIR: Pursuant to the ninth section of the act of April, 1816, for compensating claims for property lost, captured, &c., during the late war, the President has been pleased further to direct that, in cases of property alleged to have been impressed or taken by public authority for the use or subsistence of the Army, the name and rank of the officer by whom or by whose order such impressment shall have been made shall be disclosed in the evidence of the claimant, and no decision shall be made in his favor until the evidence of such officer shall be obtained in the case, unless it shall appear that such evidence cannot be obtained by the Commissioner. The President has also directed that the said act does not extend to cases of property destroyed by the irregular conduct of the soldiery, nor to expenses incurred by individuals in attending to sick or disabled soldiers.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

R. B. LEE, Esq., Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Dec. 16, 1816.

SIR: I am directed by the President to inform you that, under existing circumstances, it is thought proper that no final decision be made in any case now depending, or that may be exhibited, under the act, &c. You will, however, proceed to prepare and arrange all such cases for decision when it shall be deemed proper.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Jan. 1, 1817.

SIR: I am instructed by the President to inform you that it is not deemed expedient to deduct from the amount which you may allow to any individual for the loss, capture, or destruction of his horse, such sum as may have been paid him for the use and risk of such horse. I have the honor, &c.

OFFICE OF CLAIMS &c.,

Washington, March 26, 1817.

By the act passed on the 9th day of April last, entitled "An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," all claims provided for by the said act must be presented at this office on or before the 9th day of April, in the year 1818; as, if not presented within that period, they cannot be received, examined, and decided on at this office.

First class of cases.

The claims provided for by the said act are, 1st. "Any volunteer or draughted militiaman, whether of cavalry, mounted riflemen, or infantry, who, in the late war between the United States and Great Britain, has sustained damage by the loss of any horse which was killed in battle, or which has died in consequence of a wound therein received, or in consequence of failure, on the part of the United States, to furnish such horse with sufficient forage while in the service of the United States, shall be allowed and paid the value of such horse." This provision comprehends three descriptions of cases:

1st. A horse killed in battle.

2d. A horse dying in consequence of a wound received in battle.

3d. A horse dying in consequence of not being furnished with sufficient forage by the United States.

To substantiate a claim of either description:

1. The order of the Government authorizing the employment of the corps to which the original claimant belonged, or the subsequent acceptance of such corps, or approbation of its employment, must be produced.

2d. The certificate of the officer or surviving officer commanding the claimant at the time of the accident on which the claim is founded, which certificate, if not given while the officer was in the service of the United States, must be sworn to;

Payment for Property destroyed by the British.

and, in every case, it must, if practicable, state the then value of the horse so killed or dying. Before any other evidence will be received, the claimant must make oath that it is not in his power to procure that which is above specified, and that the evidence which he shall produce in lieu thereof is the best which he is able to obtain. In every case, the evidence must be on oath, and the value of the horse so killed or dying ascertained. All evidence offered must be taken and authenticated in the manner hereinafter directed, and in all these cases, the claimant must declare, on oath, that he has not received another horse from any officer or agent of Government in lieu of the one lost.

Second class of cases.

"Any person, whether of cavalry, or mounted riflemen, or volunteers, who, in the late war aforesaid, has sustained damage by the loss of a horse, in consequence of the owner thereof being dismounted, or separated and detached from the same by order of the commanding officer, or in consequence of the rider being killed or wounded in battle, shall be allowed and paid the value of such horse at the time he was received into the public service." This class comprehends two descriptions of cases:

1st. When the owner has been dismounted, or separated and detached from such horse by order of the commanding officer.

2d. When the rider has been killed or wounded in battle, and the horse lost in consequence thereof.

The same evidence, in all respects, which is required in the first class of cases, will be required in this.

Third class of cases.

"Any person who, in the late war aforesaid, has sustained damage by the loss, capture, or destruction, by an enemy, of any horse, mule, or ox, wagon, cart, boat, sleigh, or harness, while such property was employed in the military service of the United States, either by impressment or by contract, except in cases where the risk to which the property would be exposed was agreed to be incurred by the owner, if it shall appear that such loss, capture, or destruction was without any fault or negligence of the owner; and any person, during the time aforesaid, who has sustained damage by the death of such horse, mule, or ox, in consequence of failure on the part of the United States to furnish sufficient forage while in the service aforesaid, shall be allowed and paid the value thereof." This class comprehends two cases:

1st. The loss or destruction of property by an enemy, taken by impressment or engaged by contract in the military service of the United States, being either a horse, a mule, an ox, wagon, cart, boat, sleigh, or harness, excepting articles for which the owners had agreed to run all risks, or which were lost or destroyed by fault or negligence of the owners.

2d. When a horse, mule, or ox, so taken or employed, has died from the failure of the United States to furnish sufficient forage.

In the first of these cases, the claimant must produce the certificate of the officer or agent of the United States who impressed or contracted for the property above mentioned, and of the officer or surviving officer under whose immediate command it was taken or destroyed by an enemy. Such certificates, if such officers or agents at the time of giving them be not in the military service of the United States, must be sworn to, and must positively state that the property was not lost or destroyed through the fault or negligence of the owner, and that the owner did not agree to run all risks. Furthermore, the usual rate of hire of the articles so impressed or contracted for in the country in which they were employed must be stated.

In the second case, the certificate of the officer or agent of the United States, under whose command such horse, mule, or ox was employed at the time of his death, must be produced.

Before any other evidence will be received, the claimant must make oath that it is not in his power to produce that which is above specified; and, further, that the evidence which he offers in lieu thereof is the best which he is able to obtain. In every case, the evidence must state distinctly the time, place, and manner of the loss, and the value thereof.

Fourth class of cases.

"Any person who, during the late war, has acted in the military service of the United States as a volunteer or draughted militiaman, and who has furnished himself with arms or accoutrements, and has sustained loss by the capture or destruction of them, without any fault or negligence on his part, shall be allowed and paid the value thereof." This class comprehends two cases:

1st. The loss of such arms or accoutrements by the enemy.

2d. The loss of the same articles in any other way, without the fault or negligence of the owner.

This provision does not include the clothing of soldiers, or the clothing and arms of officers, who, in all services, furnish at their own risk their own. The same evidence in all respects is required in this as in the first class; and, moreover, that the loss did not happen from the fault or negligence of the owner.

Fifth class of cases.

"When any property has been impressed or taken by public authority for the use or subsistence of the army during the late war, and the same shall have been destroyed, lost, or consumed, the owner of such property shall be paid the value thereof, deducting therefrom the amount which has been paid, or may be claimed, for the use and risk of the same while in the service aforesaid."

This provision relates to every species of property taken or impressed for the use and subsistence of the army not comprehended in any of the preceding classes, and which shall have been in any manner destroyed, lost, or consumed by the army, including in its scope all kinds of provisions, forage, fuel, articles for clothing, blankets, arms, and ammunition—in fact, every thing for the use and equipment of an army. In all these cases, the certificates of the officers or agents of the United States taking or impressing any of the aforesaid articles, authenticated by the officer commanding the corps for whose use they were taken or impressed, and, furthermore, of the officers and agents under whose command the same were destroyed, lost, or consumed, specifying the value of the articles so taken or impressed, and destroyed, lost, or consumed, and if any payment has been made for the use of the same, and the amount of such payment, [must be furnished ;] and, if no payment has been made, the certificate must state that none has been made.

Before any other evidence will be received, the claimant must name the person taking or impressing such property, and show that it is impracticable to procure that which is above specified; and, further, that the evidence which he offers in lieu thereof is the best which he is able to obtain.

Under this provision, no claim can be admitted for any article which has not been taken by the orders of the commandant of the corps for whose use it may be stated to have been taken. For any taking not so authorized, the party's redress is against the person committing it.

Sixth (and last) class of cases.

"When any person, during the late war, has sustained damage by the destruction of his house or building by the enemy, while the same was occupied as a military deposite under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, he shall be allowed or paid the amount of such damage, provided it shall appear that such occupation was the cause of its destruction."

In this case the certificate of the officer or agent of the United States, under whose authority any such house or building was occupied, must be furnished. Before any other evidence as to this fact will be received, the claimant must name the person under whose authority such house or building was occupied, and show that it is impracticable to procure such certificate, and that the evidence which he shall offer in lieu thereof is the best which he is able to obtain.

Furthermore, in all cases submitted to this office, every claim must be accompanied by a statement, on oath, by every claimant, of all sums which he may have received on account of such claim, from any officer, agent, or department of the Government of the United States; and where he has received nothing, that fact must also be stated on oath by him.

It will be particularly noted by claimants that the preceding rules of evidence generally and more especially apply to claims which shall not exceed in amount two hundred dollars; and that in all cases in which the claims in amount shall exceed two hundred dollars, a special commissioner will be employed to take testimony, but in these cases, as far as it shall be practicable, the same rules of evidence will be observed.

In all cases in which the officers or agents of the United States shall have taken or impressed property for the military service of the United States, which property so taken or impressed shall have been paid for by them out of their private funds, or the value thereof recovered from them in due course of law, such officers or agents are entitled to the same remuneration to which the original owners of such property would be entitled if such payment or recovery had not been made, and can settle their claims at this office, producing authentic vouchers for such payment or recovery. Nor will any original claimants be paid through this office, till they release all claims against such officers or agents of the United States on account of such taking or impressment.

In every case no claim will be paid but to the person originally entitled to receive the same, or, in case of his death, to his legal representative, or, in either event, attorney duly appointed. When attorneys shall be employed, it is recommended to the parties interested to have their powers executed in due form.

All evidence offered must be sworn to (except the certificates of officers who, at the time of giving them, shall be in the military service of the United States) before some judge of the United States, or of the States or Territories of the United States, or mayor or chief magistrate of any city, town, or borough within the same, notary public, or a justice of the peace of any State or Territory of the United States, duly authorized to administer oaths, of which authority proof must be furnished, either by a certificate under the seal of any State or Territory, or the clerk or prothonotary of any court within the same. But the seal of any city, town, or borough, or the attestation of any judge of the United States, will require no further authentication.

By the law of the 3d of March, 1817, the various articles described in the third class of cases are to be paid for, not only on the contingency of their being "taken and destroyed" by the enemy, and, in the case of horses, mules, and oxen, on the contingency of their dying "in consequence of failure on the part of the United States to furnish sufficient forage," but whenever the loss shall happen from any other cause while the property was in the military service of the United States, "without any fault or negligence on the part of the owner," except in cases where the risk to which the property would be exposed was agreed to be incurred by the owner.

By the first section of the last-mentioned law, it is also provided that the ninth section of the first-mentioned act, of the 9th of April, 1816, comprehending the sixth class of cases, "shall be construed to extend only to houses or other buildings occupied by the order of an officer or agent of the United States as a place of deposite for military or naval stores, or as barracks for the military forces of the United States." In all the cases arising under the ninth section, thus modified and explained, the facts established by the evidence in each case are to be reported "to Congress as soon as may be, that such provision may be made for the relief the respective claimants as shall be deemed just and proper."

It is earnestly recommended to claimants of every description to conform strictly to the directions contained in this paper. In all cases com-prehended in the fifth class of cases especially, the testimony of the officer impressing or taking the property cannot be dispensed with, unless it be proved to be impracticable to obtain it. In every case he must be named. It is also recommended to claimants to estimate their damages at the most reasonable valuation, as extravagant valuations create distrust, and in such instances, will compel the commissioner to resort to further investigation, and consequently will induce delay.

All persons who have business with this office are requested to address their letters to the subscriber as commissioner, which will be transmitted free of postage.

RICHARD BLAND LEE,
Commissioner of Claims, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 23, 1817.

SIR: Your communications of the 31st of March and of the 19th instant having been submitted to the President, I am instructed to inform you that the decision of the Attorney General in the case of Joseph Anderson, which excludes "houses and buildings" from the operation of the fifth section of the "act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," and which limits the terms used in that section to personal or moveable property as distinct from real estate, is not considered as extending to growing crops of grain, grass, vegetables, or growing timber, which may have been taken by public authority for the use or subsistence of the army—the act of taking in such cases implying a severance from the ground, and a consequent change in the nature of the property. The mere occupation of private buildings by troops for temporary accommodation, on a march for example, is not thought by the President to be such an occupation as would bring them within the meaning of the terms used in the first section of the amendatory act passed the 3d of March last, as a continued possession for some time would do; but as the cases arising under that section are all to be submitted to Congress, and not to this Department, for final decision, the President sees no objection to your acting on the construction which you have given to the words "as barrack" used in that section, because, Congress being in possession of the facts, each particular case will determine how far the temporary occupation of a building may make it a barrack. I have the honor, &c.,

GEORGE GRAHAM.

LOSSES SUSTAINED DURING THE INVASION OF LOUISIANA BY THE BRITISH IN 1814-1815.

[Communicated to the House, March 22, 1820.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of Francis B. Longville," reported:

That the bill is intended to provide payment for property said to have been destroyed in the neighborhood of New Orleans during the invasion by the enemy in 1814-1815, and while in the occupancy of the troops of the United States.

In support of the claim is the affidavit of Richard Relf, Benjamin Morgan, and Peter Foucher, who state that, "after the retreat of the enemy, they were appointed by the quartermaster general, under an order from General Jackson, to ascertain the nature and amount of the damages caused to several persons;" that "they repaired to the country seat of Francis B. Longville, where, after a careful and minute examination of the premises, they have found and estimated the damages done to his real estate as follows:

Damages done to the dwelling-house, occupied as quarters by General Carroll	$300 00
Damages to the store-house	25 00
The following buildings entirely destroyed:
A corn-house	300 00
An out-house 27 by 25 feet	300 00
A kitchen and small house adjoining	150 00
A bake-house	350 00
A stable	50 00
15 acres of standing fence	385 00
32 acres post-and-rail fence	390 00
Total	$2,250 00

General Carroll, in a letter to General Jackson, of the 4th of March, 1815, says:

"The owner of the plantation and house occupied by me as quarters during our stay at the camp below New Orleans has called upon me to certify the damages he sustained. I have barely to remark, that a fine garden, his out-houses, or a part of them, and all his fences were completely destroyed; his dwelling-house was much injured by seven or eight 18-pound balls passing through it."

There is no doubt but the injury sustained by the claimant has been very considerable, and, if entitled to relief, it may reasonably be doubted whether it is practicable to obtain more correct data from which to ascertain the amount than those which he has furnished.

This being one of a large class of cases, and of great apparent hardship, and which, in the opinion of the committee, do not come within any rule settled by Congress which would authorize an allowance; and the other branch of the Legislature having come to a decision in which the committee have not felt it their duty to concur, they have deemed it proper to present to the House somewhat in detail the views which they have taken of the question, and to which they have been led by the nature of their inquiries, connected with the events of the late war.

During the prosecution of that war, losses have been sustained by the citizens, of all the variety of character, and from as various causes and incidents as the most fruitful imagination could suggest; and, as they could be traced directly or indirectly to the events of a war declared and prosecuted by the Government, an opinion seems to have been entertained that payment may rightfully be demanded from the Treasury to their full amount, whatever be their description, or from whatever cause produced.

That war having been the first which has occurred under the present Government, the effects of which have been felt to a very considerable extent, there is no settled rule of the country that can be referred to as a guide in adjusting the claims to which it has given rise; and, consequently, the rule which shall be applied to those claims will be regarded as the law of the country applicable to like cases in all future wars, and from which the Government cannot depart, to the prejudice of claimants, without furnishing just cause of complaint; for nothing can be more reasonable than that he who should have contributed to the relief of his neighbor should, in his turn, be relieved. And hence the necessity that, in deciding upon the claims incident to the late war, great care be taken that, while remuneration for individual losses shall be awarded to the full extent which a regard to the best interests of the country will justify, those interests shall not be essentially impaired by a desire to relieve from partial suffering.

It is believed that the interests of the people collectively would be best promoted should the Government limit its demands upon them to the sums necessary to meet the current expenses, provide for the common defence, and advance such other great national objects as are within its proper sphere of jurisdiction, and leave it to them to exercise their own discretion in selecting their situations and employments, without the hope of deriving any thing from the Treasury, except a just reward for services rendered, and a fair equivalent for their property directly applied to public purposes.

In the same proportion as the citizens are taught to look to the Treasury for support, they will relax in their exertions to acquire it by prudent care and industry; and, should it become the settled policy of the Government to remunerate for losses merely incident to a state of war, it would operate as an inducement to the citizens to seek for a ready market and a high price for their effects in losses of that description, rather than afford to them the best protection in their power; and, having secured such a market, a high price would follow of course—a circumstance which the Government having necessarily to decide upon, ex parte testimony can never guard against. Hence it is believed that it would not be expedient to remunerate for losses which shall have been incidental, and resulted from causes over which the Government has no control.

Were it practicable for Government, through the operations of the Treasury, to equalize the burdens of the people arising from a state of war, or other national calamity, much might be said in its favor; but such a result can never be effected. In the first place, human wisdom is totally incompetent to the adoption of any plan by which the true amount of such losses could be ascertained; and, secondly, the taxes on which the Government must rely to furnish itself with the means to satisfy the claims can never be made to fall equally upon those who pay them; so that, after the most of which the Government is capable shall have been done, but little advance will be made towards an equality in the public burdens of this character.

Losses and sufferings resulting accidentally from a state of war will, at a given period, fall heavier upon one section of the country than another, and always unequally upon the citizens of any. But it may fairly be presumed that different large districts, taking a series of years together, will be subjected to nearly the same suffering; and it is believed it would be much better to leave it to the citizens to equalize their burdens among themselves, as their sense of propriety shall dictate, than for the Government to encourage them to look to the Treasury for relief, and thus subject the country to the unavoidable loss of time resulting from such a policy, with which there will always be associated a lamentable source of speculation and fraud.

If the views which the committee have taken of the subject be correct, it undeniably follows that the greater the extent to which the Government shall endeavor to equalize the burdens of the people resulting incidentally from a state of war, the more will the nation be impoverished; and hence it is believed that the permanent interest of the country will be best promoted by a policy which shall confine the allowances of Government within narrow, known, and well-defined limits.

The sudden invasion by the enemy at an unexpected point near New Orleans produced a retreat of the inhabitants, and the concentration of a large military force, mostly militia, equally sudden, and without any previous preparation; and hence resulted a general prostration of private property in the neighborhood, partly by the American troops, and partly by the enemy, and there can be no doubt but much of it was an unnecessary, useless waste, resulting not from the will of the Government or its agents, but from a state of things over which they had no control.

It is believed by the committee that a rule which would authorize an allowance in this case would produce to the country much more of evil than benefit; and, as the testimony does not satisfactorily show that the property for which the petitioner prays to be compensated was taken and used for the public service, they recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The exports are here given according to the official statements of the Treasury. The imports here stated for certain years are given according to unofficial estimates of their value.

The exports and imports of the United States for each year since the commencement of the present Government, in 1789, have been stated by the Treasury. The official statements are annually communicated to Congress, and are laid before the public. These statements set forth various matters concerning the exports and imports as facts. They have been accordingly regarded as the authentic source from which accurate information concerning our exports and imports may be derived, and as an official exposition of the state of our commerce with foreign countries. Every part of the statements bears the same stamp of authority, all parts of them are equally official, and all are given as equally authentic.

Are these statements accurate in the points which they represent as facts; and do they exhibit all the facts which should appear in statistical accounts of the foreign commerce of the United States?

All the matters set forth in the statements of exports and imports are furnished to the Treasury by the collectors of the customs. The materials received from the collectors are, at the Treasury, compiled into the statements which are annually laid before Congress and published. The statements of exports and those of imports are rendered distinctly from each other.

The master of every vessel bound to a foreign place is required to deliver to the collector of the port from which the vessel is about to depart a manifest of all the cargo on board of the vessel, to state the value of the cargo and the destination of the vessel, and to verify the manifest and statements by his own oath. The collector thus obtains an account of the cargo, the kinds, quantities, and values of the articles of which it consists, and the destination of the vessel. The kinds and quantities of the exports are stated by the collectors, in most cases, as they are received from the masters of vessels; and by the Treasury, in all cases, as they are received from the collectors. Those values are, in some cases, the sums furnished by the masters of vessels; but, in most cases, they are valuations made by the collectors themselves.

The quantities of the exports are furnished by the master of the vessel; and they are sometimes given with considerable inaccuracy, either because the quantities are not accurately known by the master, or from want of care. But as there is, in general, no motive to misrepresent these facts, such errors may be on the side either of excess or deficiency; and they may not much vary the total quantities stated. Where the articles are foreign products which are exported with drawback of duties, the exporter himself enters them for exportation. But this entry does not state the quantities of articles which pay ad valorem duties as imports. Where the articles pay specific duties as imports, their quantities are ascertained with entire accuracy by the entry of the exporter, and by reference to the importation. In all cases, except those of articles of foreign origin which are exported with drawback of duties, the quantities of the exports, as they are stated by the Treasury, are derived solely from the masters of vessels.

Where the exports are products of the United States, the species and quantities of the several articles are given in the statements; where the exports are products of other countries which paid specific duties upon importation, their kinds and quantities are stated.

Where the exports consist of merchandise of foreign production which paid ad valorem duties upon importation, no specification of the kinds, quantities, or values of particular articles is given in the returns of the collectors or in the statements of the Treasury. These articles are arranged under different heads, according to the rates of duty which they respectively paid as imports. All articles which pay the same rate of duty are placed in one class; and the total value of all the articles composing each class is given; but the kind, quantity, or value of any particular article is not stated.

Our exports of articles of foreign production have, generally, been great. In the three years preceding the 1st of October, 1799, and in the three years preceding the 1st of October, 1807, the exports of articles of foreign production considerably exceeded the exports of our domestic products. In other years, the exports of foreign merchandise have been more than one-third, and, in others, more than one-fourth of all our exports. At present, the exports of foreign merchandise are more than one-fourth of the whole exports. Of these exports of foreign merchandise, about one-third has generally consisted of articles which paid ad valorem duties as imports, have amounted, upon an average of the last twenty-three years, to more than nine millions of dollars for each year. From the present statements we know not what these exports paying ad valorem duties as imports really are. The exports of this particular class are important, not only from their amount, but also as including those foreign manufactures which enter into competition with our own manufactures in our own markets. It will be useful that we should know the kinds, quantities, and values of the principal articles of these exports with more distinctness than at present appears; and it will not be difficult to select from these exports those of the principal kinds, which are considerable in amount, and to state such parts of them separately, by their kinds, quantities, and values.

Where the exports consist of foreign goods which were free from duty as imports, the total value of all these exports is stated in one sum, without a specification of the kind, quantity, or value of any particular article. The exports of some of these articles are considerable, and the kinds of the articles are not numerous. It will be easy to state either the whole of these exports, or those of them which are of considerable amount, by the kinds, quantities, and values of particular articles.

In determining the values of the exports, the collectors reject the valuation furnished by the master of the vessel whenever they think proper to do so, and make their own valuation, which they return to the Treasury. There is some diversity in the practice of different collectors in respect to the cases in which they substitute their own valuation for that of the master, and also in respect to the principles upon which the valuations of the collectors are made. The course pursued at some of the principal ports will be stated, and will show, in general, the methods by which the exports have been valued.

Where the exports are products of the United States, or products of foreign countries which pay specific duties upon importation, the valuation is generally made by the collector in the following manner: The valuation furnished by the master of the vessel is entirely disregarded. The current prices of each article at the port of exportation, during the whole quarter of the year in which the goods are exported, are collected from such information as the collector may possess or procure; and from all the different prices a mean value of the article is deduced, which is the same through the whole quarter. The average value of each article thus derived from the several market prices of the quarter, is the value assigned to the article by the collector during that quarter.

Where the exports are articles of foreign origin which pay ad valorem duties as imports, and are afterwards exported with drawback of duties, the value assigned to them as exports is the foreign cost of the articles, with an addition to that cost of twenty per centum if the goods came from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and ten per centum if they came from any other place. This is the manner of valuing these exports at some of the principal ports. At some other ports, it appears that the valuation of these exports furnished by the master of the vessel is received, and returned to the Treasury without alteration.

Where the exports are articles of foreign origin which were free from duty upon importation, or were subject to ad valorem duties as imports, and are subsequently exported without drawback of duties, the valuation given by the master of the vessel is generally adopted by the collector, and returned to the Treasury.

Thus, the valuations of the exports which appear in the statements of the Treasury are made partly and principally by the collectors, and partly by the masters of vessels.

The principle established for the valuation of the exports by the ninety-third section of the act of March 2, 1799, is, that each article shall be stated according to its actual value at the port and time of exportation. As the cargo is generally purchased at the port of exportation, and its value there may always be known, it seems to have been supposed that the true cost or actual value of the cargo would be always known to the master of the vessel, and that he would state the cost or value accurately to the collector. Hence, the only provision of law for obtaining valuations of the exports is that which requires a statement of the value of the cargo from the master of the vessel. But it is found in practice that the statements of values by the master are generally loose and uncertain, and often very incorrect. As the master is seldom the owner of the cargo, he is in general ignorant of the price paid for it, or its real value. The owner of the cargo, or the agent who purchases it, is not required to furnish any account of it, or to make any statement of its value. The master alone is required to state the value. He therefore states the value by conjecture, or according to such information as he may receive from the shipper; and the shipper is at liberty to give any information, or no information, upon that point. The oath, which is the only security for a true statement of the value, is required from the master, and not from the owner or exporter of the articles valued.

The collectors, in most cases, reject the valuations of the master, and make their own valuations. This practice, though a deviation from law, has probably tended to furnish valuations more correct than those of the masters of vessels, in all the cases in which the collectors have founded their valuations upon real market prices. But in the case of exports of goods of foreign origin, where the collector states the value of the exports at the foreign cost of the articles, with additions of ten and twenty per centum, a strange anomaly takes place. The collector rejects the master's valuation, not in order to adopt the market value of the articles, but in order to substitute a prior foreign price of the articles, with uniform additions of ten and twenty per centum. This mode of valuation is entirely artificial. It must, in general, represent these exports as worth considerably less than their real value here, since they are, in general, worth much more in our markets than the foreign cost, with the additions of ten and twenty per centum. The master's valuation, erroneous as it often is, would give the value of these exports more accurately than such valuations of the collector.

There are sufficient reasons to believe that the general tendency of the present methods of valuation has been, in some degree, to overrate the exports, and to state them somewhat higher than their real values at the ports of exportation. The degree of this exaggeration cannot be determined. It is, however, believed to be not very considerable. With some abatement for this excess, the valuations of the exports may be considered as nearly correct.

The statements of exports appear to show the foreign countries to which the exports are sent, the several countries are specified, and the amount exported to each is stated. This part of the statements is generally regarded as showing the respective amounts of our exports received by different foreign countries. But the statements do not show, with certainty, the amounts of our exports received by particular countries; they exhibit merely the reported destinations of the vessels in which the exports depart.

The destination of the vessel and cargo is treated at the custom-house as a matter of no moment, further than to obtain the name of some foreign place to be inserted in the manifest and clearance. The master of a vessel bound from this country states at the custom-house any foreign place which he pleases to name as the destination of the vessel, and his declaration is received without further inquiry. The destinations, thus reported, are returned to the Treasury, and are there given in the statements of exports as the countries to which the goods are exported. But the true destination is sometimes concealed, to prevent competition in the commerce really intended; and when there is an apprehension of capture, a false destination may be announced, in order that it may appear in the clearance, if that document should fall into the hands of captors. When a true destination is given, it is frequently the first foreign port at which the vessel is intended to touch for advice and refreshments, while the real destination of the cargo is for some other country; or the ultimate destination may be contingently, for one of several countries, according to the state of the markets, or other circumstances. The destination may be changed after the clearance is obtained, or at any time after the vessel leaves the port of departure. It is not uncommon to declare the destination, and take a clearance for the West Indies generally. A clearance is sometimes taken for Europe, Asia, or Africa. In all such cases, the particular country to which the cargo is really destined is left uncertain; but it is principally in our commerce with Europe that the reported destinations do not truly show the countries which first receive our exports. Clearances for great quantities of our exports are taken for England, or for England and a market, and for Cowes and a market. Some of these exports are landed in England; but a great portion of them is carried to the countries on the European continent, and first landed there. England is a great mart, and is, in some respects, the centre of the commerce of Europe. In England information of the state of markets upon the continent of Europe may always be obtained. Our own commerce and mercantile connexions with England are great. The balance of our trade with England is uniformly and largely against us; and this balance is discharged principally by our exports to the European continent. The great capitals of the British merchants, and their mercantile connexions with every country in Europe, enable them to make advances or payments for our exports to any part of Europe, when those exports are placed under their control. These, and other causes, make England the channel through which we receive payment for a great part of our exports to the continent of Europe. In this course of things, very considerable quantities of our exports which are carried to the continent of Europe, and first landed there, depart nominally for England, and are now stated as exported to England. Considerable quantities of our exports are also cleared for Gibraltar, and are stated as exports to Gibraltar. Nearly all these articles go into the Mediterranean, and are first landed in the different countries adjacent to that sea. Hence, our exports to England and Gibraltar have been swelled far beyond their real amount in the statements of exports. The true amount of these exaggerations cannot be known, but they are undoubtedly very considerable. In some other branches of our foreign commerce, in which it is known that the voyage is in general really that which is announced, we may rely upon the reported destination as sufficiently showing the foreign country which receives the exports. Without such a knowledge of the actual course of trade, we cannot rely upon any part of the present statements as exhibiting accurately the amount of our exports to any foreign country. The destinations are now reported by the master alone, with so much looseness and inaccuracy that this part of the subject is left in much uncertainty.

It is proposed that the exporter shall join with the master of the vessel in furnishing the account of the exports, and in stating their value and their true destination. This provision will probably prove sufficient to obtain accurate statements of the kinds, quantities, and values of the exports, and of their true destinations.

The statements of imports consist of certain materials which are brought into the Treasury by the laws imposing duties on goods imported into the United States, and regulating the collection of those duties. They present the facts which are ascertained for the purpose of levying those duties, and nothing more.

All the imports are either free from duty, or subject to duty; and those articles which are subject to duty are charged either with duty on the quantity, or with duty on the value. Goods free from duty have never been comprised in the statements of imports in any manner whatever. Such merchandise is entered at the custom-house, and landed, under permission, like goods subject to duty, but no return or account of it is given to the Treasury. There is, accordingly, a total omission of all goods free from duty in all the official statements of imports.

The statements of the Treasury present only the imports subject to duty. These imports are presented under the two general heads of "goods subject to specific duty," and "goods subject to ad valorem duty."

The kinds and the quantities of the imports subject to specific duties are ascertained by the officers of the customs. The statements of the Treasury accordingly present all the articles subject to specific duties with accuracy in respect to their kinds and quantities.

But the official statements present no valuation whatever of any of the articles subject to specific duties. These articles are not valued at the custom houses, or at the Treasury.

The imports subject to ad valorem duties are presented in a very different form. All articles which pay the same duty are consolidated into one mass, and the total value of that mass is given in the official statements. There is no specification of any particular article by name or description—no statement of the quantity or value of any single article; and it does not appear what particular articles, belonging to the class of those paying the same rate of duty, have really been imported or not. As many columns are stated as there are rates of ad valorem duties, and under each column the aggregate value of all the imports paying the same rate of duty, and nothing else, is stated.

The imports subject to ad valorem duties are valued at the custom houses. The foreign cost of the articles in the countries from which they come is first ascertained; an addition is then made to that cost of twenty per centum, when the merchandise is imported from any place beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and ten per centum when it is imported from any other place. These total sums, so composed, are returned to the Treasury as the values of these imports, and the same values are assigned to them in the statements of the Treasury. It thus appears—

1. That the imports free from duty are included in the statements.

2. That no account whatever is given of the value of the imports subject to specific duties.

3. That goods subject to ad valorem duties are not distinguished in their kinds, so as to afford any useful information; that their quantities are not given at all; and that their values are blended into certain gross sums, without showing the value of any single article.

4. That the valuations given to the imports subject to ad valorem duties, are made upon an erroneous principle.

But these points demand a more particular consideration.

The omission of all the imports free from duty is an obvious defect. A chasm of unknown extent is here left in the statements of our imports. The importance of this omission may be at once conceived by adverting to the catalogue of articles free from duty, and to the large importations of many of them which are known to take place. Copper, brass, tin, furs, hides, plaster of Paris, and the dying woods, without specifying other articles free from duty, form a very large amount of our imports. The true amount of the imports free from duty cannot be estimated with much accuracy, but a probable opinion of their amount may be formed. The amount of the exports of these articles is known, for, singular as it may be, the exports of these articles are given, though we have no account of the same articles as imports. The exports of articles which had been previously imported, and were free from duty as imports, are stated by the Treasury to have amounted in value to the following sums in the following years:

Total amount of the fourteen years	-	$15 280,340

These exports thus appear to have exceeded $1,000,000 annually, upon an average of the last fourteen years. From the best means of judging which are possessed, it is estimated that the imports free from duty which have been consumed in the United States for the last fifteen years have amounted at least to $4,000,000 annually. Our present consumption of these articles probably exceeds that sum. Assuming this estimate, and supposing that the annual exports of these articles amount to $1,000,000, we must conclude that the total annual amount of our imports of articles free from duty is at least $5,000,000. These articles, whatever may be their true amount, have never entered into the public statements of imports. Surely they are of sufficient importance to be known. They should have their place in the statistical accounts of our imports. They are not only as important as any other articles of equal amount; but, if any class of imports can be justly considered more important than another, it must be that which we invite to our country, by exempting it from burdens imposed upon the introduction of all other merchandise.

More than one-third of all the merchandise imported into the United States consists of articles subject to specific duties. The whole of this great mass of imports is presented without any statement of its value. The thirty-sixth section of the act of the 2d of March, 1799, regulating the collection of duties, requires valuations of imports subject to specific duties as well as of others; but, in practice, no valuation of these articles is made. As valuations of these articles are not necessary for any purpose of revenue, the object of the Legislature, in this provision, must have been to procure authentic valuations of these imports for the general purposes for which statistical accounts of imports are useful. The statements of these imports, as they are now furnished, are in a great degree useless, for want of valuations.

More than one-half of all our imports are articles subject to duty on their value. These articles are stated in such a manner as, in effect, to give no information of the kind, quantity, or value, of any one article imported. Thus, we find in the statements, that the goods paying ad valorem duties at the rate of fifteen per centum, which were imported during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1817, amounted in value to $14,082,903; and this is all we learn concerning those goods. If we inquire what those goods were, the statements afford no answer. We know, indeed, that the imports, which are subject to a duty of fifteen per centum on the value, are all articles which are not free, and not subject to any other rate of duty. We can, therefore, determine what those goods were not; that is to say, that they were not any of the articles which are either free from duty, or are charged with some rate of duty different from fifteen per centum. It is impossible to discover, from the statements, what those goods amounting to $14,082,903 really were. If we desire to learn how much, either in quantity or value, of woollen cloth, or of any other article paying the same rate of duty with woollen cloth, has been imported, we search these statements in vain for that purpose. We know the rate of duty to which woollen cloth is subject, and we find the aggregate value of all the imports subject to that rate of duty amounted to a certain sum; but whether woollen cloth was or was not one of the articles imported and comprehended in this total value, does not appear. The aggregate value given in the statements may result from all, from one, or from any part of all the articles charged with the same rate of duty. The articles which belong to one class, as paying the same rate of duty, are very numerous, and the importations of the particular articles of each class are very different in amount at different times. The only conclusion concerning any particular article which can be derived from the statements is, that, if that article had been imported at all, its value is comprised in the aggregate value of all the articles which pay the same duty. It does not appear whether any particular article has been imported or not.

Among the imports subject to ad valorem duties are those which enter into competition with our own manufactures of the like articles; as, for example, the various fabrics of wool, cotton, and iron. Yet we are without any authentic information of the quantities or values of all these various manufactures which we receive from other countries. We know, in general, that the importations of these manufactures are great; and a deplorable proof that they are very great, is found in the ruin which they have brought upon many of our citizens who have engaged in similar manufactures. But this general knowledge, even when combined with all the particulars which they who are best informed upon this subject can communicate, affords no accurate account of facts. Do you ask how much, either in quantity or value, of manufactures of iron, of wool, or of cotton, is now imported into the United States, or has been imported within any of the last thirty years? Your question is, indeed, interesting; but it cannot be answered by any official or authentic statement of our imports. It is peculiarly desirable that we should possess accurate information of the amount of imported manufactures in those cases in which our own consumption is supplied partly by the industry of our own citizens, and partly from foreign countries. The imports of this character involve a great question of national policy. As they are augmented or diminished, our own manufactures are depressed or relieved. It is now evident that some of the most important of our own manufactures require the aid of the Government to support them against the pressure of foreign competition.

Correct information of the kinds and amounts of these imports may be easily obtained. When goods subject to ad valorem duties are imported, the kind of each article is ascertained, in order to ascertain the rate of duty to which it is subject; and its value is ascertained, in order to ascertain the amount of the duty. The quantity of the article also appears from the invoice of the importer. The custom-house thus obtains an account of the kind, quality, and value of every import subject to ad valorem duty. But these facts are not given in the accounts returned to the Treasury. In those accounts, the kinds, quantities, and values of particular articles are not stated. All articles which pay the same rate of duty are placed in one class, and the aggregate value of the whole class is given. In the present practice of the custom-houses, no account of the quantities or value of particular articles is preserved. The invoice of the importer is returned to him after the amount of the duty is ascertained. But an account of the denomination of the article, its quantity, and its value, may be kept, and returned to the Treasury.

It is not proposed that a distinct account should be kept at the custom-houses, or given in the statements of imports, of the kind, quantity, and value of every article subject to ad valorem duty. This would be an extreme of minuteness, without utility. The articles subject to ad valorem duties comprehend the finer manufactures; and those manufactures are now so numerous, and so various in their denominations, that an account of the imports of each one of them by its peculiar denomination would be far too prolix. It is proposed to select from these imports such of them as are great in amount, and such of them as come into competition here with like articles manufactured in any considerable degree in the United States; and to state such imports separately from all others, and from each other, by their kinds, qualities, and values. Thus, manufactures of cotton, woollen manufactures, and manufactures of iron, are three great classes of imports which should be stated distinctly. Manufactures of flax, and those of silk, may also be stated separately. Some of these general heads may be susceptible of subdivisions, which would be useful; other particular imports, of sufficient importance to be distinctly known, should be separately stated. But it does not seem expedient to define the cases in which special statements of particular articles should be given, otherwise than by the general principles which have been mentioned. The application of those principles, and the selection of particular cases for statements, will most properly be left to the officers who compile the statements. Under a general direction, they will be able to determine the cases in which special statements will be useful, and to reach the judicious medium between too much uncertainty on the one side, and unnecessary minuteness on the other. When all the cases which are worthy of distinct statements shall have been selected, the residue of these imports may be stated in such aggregates or classes as may be convenient.

The imports subject to ad valorem duties are stated as being of the value of their foreign cost, with additions of ten or twenty per centum to that cost. These additions to the foreign cost are altogether artificial. They are prescribed by the acts concerning the duties; perhaps, in order to adapt the duties to the foreign cost of the articles, so as to levy the same revenue upon like articles, whether imported from Europe or from India. The same effect to the revenue would, however, be produced if the duty were ten per centum higher, and the European article were valued at its foreign cost merely, and the like article from India were valued at its foreign cost, with an addition of ten per centum. The same effect to the revenue would also result if the European article and the article from India were each, respectively, valued at their foreign cost merely, if the duty on the European article were at the same time ten per centum higher, and the duty on the article from India twenty per centum higher than they now are. The real and sole effect of raising the valuation is to augment the duty. It cannot be said that the foreign cost, when augmented by one-tenth or one-fifth of that cost, is the true value of the imports in this country. The true value of a thing can never be assessed and declared by law. It is always a fact depending upon the utility of the thing for the time being; or, in other words, upon the supply of the articles, and the wants of mankind. Whether, therefore, the legislator declares a permanent value of imports, as in England, or a variable value, with fixed and uniform additions, as here, he never determines the true value of any article. Such relations of value may, perhaps, be convenient as fiscal rules, because they may tend to render the duties equal, in effect, upon different importers; or they may serve to produce the amount of revenue intended to be levied; but they do not represent facts as they are. Nor can it be supposed that the imports from the countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, when increased by one-fifth, and other imports, when increased by one-tenth of their foreign value, afford an average of their value here; or that these gross sums are a just equation of the values of these imports in this country. The fact is not so. The imports from beyond the Cape of Good Hope must be considered as, in general, worth here at least seventy per centum more than their foreign cost, and the imports from Europe may be estimated to be, in general, at least thirty-five per centum more valuable here than in the countries from which they come. The duties alone upon a great part of these imports are more than ten and twenty per centum of their foreign cost. If the duties on these imports were added to the foreign cost, the sum obtained in that manner would approach far more nearly to the value of the imports here than the amount obtained by the fixed additions of ten and twenty per centum to the foreign cost. But, without regard to the duties, if there were any propriety in the idea of attempting to ascertain the true value of the imports here by fixed additions to the foreign cost, which might be equal to the additional value which the articles generally bear here, those additions should be far higher than ten and twenty per centum. It is evident that the official statements do not furnish the true value of these imports. If we seek to learn the value of the goods in the foreign countries from which they are brought, the statements do not give that fact. If we desire to know the value of the goods in this country, the statements do not afford that fact. The value assigned to the goods by the statements is an artificial result, never according with facts, unless by accident; but representing the goods as worth much more than their cost abroad, and much less than they are generally worth here.

But the additions of ten and twenty per centum may be deducted from the foreign cost of these imports. Undoubtedly this may be done. If it is proper that this should be done, then it is proper that these imports should be stated by the public officers at their foreign cost, without additions. Any person may, indeed, make the deduction from the amount stated, but not merely by a simple subtraction. It does not appear from the statements to what sums ten per centum is added, nor to what sums twenty per centum is added, otherwise than by reference to the particular countries from which imports are brought. These several countries are specified, with the amount imported from each of them. The imports which come from beyond the Cape of Good Hope may be selected from those which come from other places; the whole may be thus separated into two classes, and the total amount of each class may be obtained. When this has been done, it will be known that the first class is that which has received an addition of twenty per centum to its foreign cost, and that the second class is that which has received an addition of ten per centum to its foreign cost; and those additions may then be subtracted. But this resort to calculation must be unavailing to all who are not informed of the error in question, or know not the process by which it may be corrected. The liberty to correct errors is not sufficient. Every fact which is worthy of a place in statistical accounts should be so stated as to require no calculation to render it more true.

What, then, is the true principle upon which imports and exports should be valued? The question is thus stated because it is equally applicable to imports and exports, and to every part of both.

1. Commodities have different values in different countries; and the object of foreign commerce is to obtain the higher value which an article bears in the country to which it is sent. Both the lower and the higher values are equally real, and both are facts which may be stated when they are known. The first or lower value, always belongs to the country from which the article is exported. The additional value may accrue to any country whatever. When an article is sent from one country to another, the price paid for it as an export is universally paid by the country which buys to the country which sells. The same article now arrives in the country to which it is sent. There, its value is much greater than the sum paid for it as an export. The additional value is there received; and it becomes distinguished in its application into two parts—the expense of transportation, and the profit of the merchant. Other facts, which may increase or affect the enhanced value, are here laid out of view. Freight and mercantile profit must necessarily be defrayed by this additional value. The expense of transporting the article, and some profit to the merchant, must both be obtained in the augmented value of the article; for otherwise nothing would be gained, and the commerce would not take place. The expense of transportation is paid to the country which carries the article; and the profit of the merchant is paid to the country to which he belongs. The expense of transportation is always paid to the country whose ships and seamen are employed in that service; and the navigation employed may belong to the country which sells the article to the country which buys it, or to any other country. The merchant who causes the article to be conveyed from one country to another may be a citizen or subject of either of those countries, or of any other country. When he sells the article in the country to which it is sent, whatever he receives beyond the sum paid for it and the freight is paid to the country to which he belongs; and he may belong to any country. When the navigator and the merchant both belong to the country which buys the article, that country pays for it nothing more than its first or lower price. In this case, the country buying the article pays, indeed, both the freight and the mercantile profit; but these sums are paid to that country itself; they are paid by the right hand to the left; they are paid by one class to another class of the people of the country buying; by the consumer to the navigator and the merchant; and they are all of the same country. The country buying pays, as a society, only the lowersum for which the article was purchased from the country selling. If the navigator and the merchant both belong to the country which sells the article, the country buying pays to the country selling the higher value of the article, including freight and mercantile profit. When the merchant and the navigator both belong to some third country, the country buying pays the additional value to that third country; and when the merchant and the navigator are of different countries, the mercantile profit is paid to one country, and the freight to another. It is therefore always certain that the country buying pays to the country selling the sum paid for the article as an export, or the lower value which it bears at the place and time of exportation. It is not certain, from any valuation of the article, that the country buying pays to the country selling more than that lower value. The additional value is variously paid, according to the national characters of merchants and navigators; and these facts cannot be shown by any valuation of the article. The principle of valuation must be a uniform rule. If such a rule cannot exhibit the sums actually received and paid by the nation for exports and imports, it should exhibit those sums as nearly as may be practicable. The first or lower value of exports and imports are sums certainly received and paid; and those sums may be exhibited by valuations. If the higher values are stated, they will comprehend not only the lower values, which are uniformly paid by the nation buying, and received by the nation selling, but also the additional values, which are variously participated, as well between the nation selling and the nation buying as among other nations. The lower values and the additional values will then appear undistinguished in the gross amount of the higher values; and the valuations will not determine how much has been received and paid, either on account of the lower values or on account of the additional values. It is therefore proper that the valuations should express those sums which are uniformly and certainly received and paid by the nation for exports and imports; and that the additional values, which are variously and unequally received and paid among different nations, should not be included in the valuations.

2. The exports and the imports should both be valued by the same rule. If the exports are valued by one rule, and the imports by another, their values cannot be compared with each other. An exaggeration of one, or a depression of the other, must occur in the relation between them; and the uncertainty arising from this cause must defeat the utility of statistical accounts of values. The value of an imported article in the country from which it comes, and the value of the same article here, are both facts which may be ascertained; and either of these facts may be taken as the value to be given to the article in statistical accounts. But, though we can ascertain the values which our imports bear, either here or in the countries from which they come, we cannot ascertain the values of our exports in the foreign countries to which they are sent. The foreign cost of the imports is a fact which precedes the importation; and, having the imports under the control of our own laws and officers, we may ascertain that preceding fact. But the additional value of the exports in foreign countries beyond their value here is not within our reach; it is a fact which occurs after the exports are no longer subject to our control. We cannot institute legal proceedings in a foreign country to ascertain the value of our exports there; nor would it be proper to impose on the exporter the burden of returning proofs of the sales or value of his exports in a foreign country. Being unable to ascertain, by any suitable means, the foreign value of our exports, we are, in effect, obliged to adopt and state their domestic value; and, as we take the value which the exports bear here in the country from which they are sent, we should also state the imports according to the value which they bear as exports in the countries from which they come. If the rule for the valuation of the imports should be their value here, and the rule for the valuation of the exports should be their value here, the results of rules so different would be very extravagant in their relation to each other. The higher value of the imports would stand opposed to the lower value of the exports. The imports would appear with the additions of freights and mercantile profits, while the exports would appear without such additions. The imports would be greatly swelled, or the exports greatly reduced, in their relation to each other; and no just comparison between the values of the exports and the imports could be made. Such would be the consequence of adopting the value of the imports here as the rule for their valuation, unless the exports were also stated according to their value as imports in the foreign countries to which they are sent. But, as we cannot determine the foreign value of the exports, we must state them at their value here; and this reason alone renders it necessary to state the imports at the lower value which they bear in the countries from which they come.

It is accordingly conceived that all the imports and all the exports should be valued at the prices paid for them, or their real values, at the times and places of exportation in the countries from which they are, respectively, sent. This principle is recommended, by its intrinsic propriety, as that which affords greater certainty than any other, by the necessity which allows no other rule applicable with like effect to both exports and imports, and by the consideration that this rule is already established for the valuation of the exports.

Returning to the statements of imports, it is seen that the only part of the imports which now receives an official valuation is valued upon a principle which is both erroneous in itself, and different from that by which the exports are valued.

What has been the amount of the imports of the United States in the several years since the commencement of the present Government in 1789? This inquiry cannot be answered. It is not answered by the official statements of imports. It cannot be answered by any official document. In the absence of authentic information, every person is left to compute the amount for himself, from such materials as he may possess, and according to such principles of valuation as he may adopt. Estimates of the amount may undoubtedly be made; and, when formed with care and judgment, they may be probable approximations to truth. Estimates of the value of imports of some of the last thirty years have been made and laid before Congress by officers of the Government. These estimates are official, as proceedings from public officers; and they are entitled to high respect. They were made by men of eminent talents and great knowledge, who were able to form and give just views concerning the subject of their estimates. Still, they are mere estimates; and, to a great extent, estimates instead of ascertained facts. Other estimates of the imports of certain years have been made by other individuals. In the commencement of this report the imports of seven several years are stated, according to estimates of their value. These valuations are introduced here, because they have been considered as some of the most correct estimates of our imports which have been offered to the public. They were formed with great labor and care; and they are, undoubtedly, accurate results from the materials used, and the principles of calculation employed in the process. How far they afford a just statement of the value of the imports of these years will be seen when the materials and principles of calculation upon which they are founded are understood. The estimates for these seven years do not include the imports free from duty; and thus a part, equal to about a twentieth of all the imports, is omitted. The imports subject to ad valorem duties were here valued as they are valued in the official statements, with additions of ten and twenty per centum to their foreign cost. In respect to the imports subject to specific duties, as their value is not officially ascertained, it was necessary that the author of these estimates should himself assess the values of these articles. A vast mass of merchandise of various kinds, brought from all quarters of the world, in seven different years, was to receive valuations. The only practicable course was taken. The author of these estimates collected the current prices of the various articles, as those prices existed in some of the principal ports of the United States, in the different years of these importations. Taking those prices as the values, he computed the total value of the imports of each article in each year. In this manner, the values of the imports paying specific duties were assessed. The estimated values of the various articles, at different times and places, are not stated; and as the estimated amount only is given, no means of deciding how far that amount may be correct are afforded. If any different estimate of the value of these imports should be presented in the same way, it would be uncertain which estimate is more correct than the other. Hence, the credit due to all estimates which have been made of the value of this class of imports must depend upon the confidence reposed in the author of the estimates, who can only present such information as he may possess, and such probabilities as his own judgment may lead him to adopt. These estimates comprehend only imports subject to duty. They give the imports subject to ad valorem duties at their foreign cost, with additions of ten and twenty per centum. They give the value of the imports subject to specific duties, as that value was estimated to have been in the United States after importation. That value, of course, included freight, mercantile profits, and our own duties upon these articles. When the imports thus valued are placed in opposition to the exports of the same seven years, the contrast is remarkable. The imports appear to exceed the exports by great sums in each of the seven years. Upon the whole period of seven years, the imports appear to exceed the exports by $99,493,295; and the average of this sum for each year is $14,213,327; and yet, from the general state of our foreign trade during these seven years, from the 1st of October, 1794, to the 30th of September, 1801, and from every source of information to which we can look, excepting only the public statements, in which the facts should be found, there can hardly be any doubt that the exports exceeded the imports in every one of those years. The solution of these differences is found in the different methods of valuing the exports and the imports. The exports are valued at their cost here, as exports; and, consequently, they do not include the sums which we have received for them beyond that cost. The imports are not valued upon the like principle; they are valued at their foreign cost, together with all the accumulations which are produced by the addition of one-fifth and one-tenth to the foreign cost of a part of the imports, and by the addition of freight, mercantile profits, and our own duties to another part of the imports. According to this method of valuing the imports, they will always appear to be greater than the exports, whether they are, in truth, greater or less. Yet these are some of the best valuations of our imports which are now extant; and this is the method in which these valuations were made.

In regard to most of the last thirty years, it does not appear that any estimate of the amount of the imports has been made.

The value of the imports is therefore unknown.

We are without any official account of their amount, and are destitute of satisfactory information upon that point; it is, consequently, impossible to make any just comparison between our exports and our imports. The correctness of every such comparison depends upon values; and no just comparison between exports and imports can be made, unless the values of both are ascertained as facts, and upon the same principle in both cases. Hence, all those statements now before the public, which represent that our imports have exceeded our exports by a certain sum, or that our exports have exceeded our imports by any particular amount, in any of the last thirty years, are exceedingly uncertain and delusive. In respect to most of those thirty years, it must always remain uncertain whether the exports or the imports were greater; and, in respect to the whole period, the amount of any excess which may have existed on either side, in any year, must remain unknown. For the same reasons, the balances of our trade with particular countries are unknown.

The imports of the last year are not yet stated. They probably amounted to one hundred millions of dollars. Of that sum, five millions may have been articles free from duty, forty-five millions articles subject to specific duties, and fifty millions articles subject to ad valorem duties. These proportions of the three classes of imports may not be exact; but they must be nearly correct, and they are offered merely to illustrate. When the imports of the last year shall be stated in the present forms, the result from the facts supposed will be, that the amount of five millions will not appear in any manner whatever; an amount of forty-five millions will be stated by kinds and quantities, without any valuation; and an amount of fifty millions will be stated by valuations made upon an erroneous principle, without a designation of the kind, quantity, or value of any particular article.

The navigation employed in the foreign trade of the United States is a subject of great national concern. So far as that navigation is ours, it is to us a source of riches and power. So far as it belongs to other nations, its benefits are theirs. Navigation is, indeed, both wealth and power. It is important as wealth; but as power, it is indispensable to nations which desire to assert their rights, or display their strength on the ocean. The employment of shipping and seamen is a branch of national industry so peculiar in its character, and so important in its consequences, that it is worthy to be known with all possible distinctness, even if the exports and imports were not stated. Navigation must, therefore, be traced distinctly from exports and imports. The employment of shipping in foreign trade may be ascertained and shown by a very convenient method. The national character of the vessels employed, their tonnage, their departures for foreign countries, and their arrivals from foreign countries, may be all easily ascertained. These particular facts, when combined, show sufficiently the actual state of the navigation employed in foreign trade, and its division among different nations. They do not express the value of navigation in sums of money; but they show the several proportions of all the navigation employed, which are held by each nation whose vessels participate in the trade. The whole tonnage employed, and the several proportions of the whole, which belong to different nations, afford a sufficient knowledge of the subject for public purposes.

We have annual statements of the tonnage of the United States. These statements exhibit the amount of all the tonnage held by our own citizens. The principal division of this tonnage is into that which is authorized by law to be employed in foreign trade, and that which is authorized to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries. The respective amounts of both kinds of tonnage are stated. The registered tonnage is that which may be legally employed in foreign trade. But these statements do not show how the registered tonnage is really employed. Coasting vessels are not allowed to engage in foreign trade; but registered vessels are entitled to engage not only in foreign trade, but also in the coasting trade. A very considerable part of our registered tonnage is actually employed in the coasting trade; but how much of it is so employed is not stated by the Treasury. These statements afford no information of the actual pursuits of our registered vessels, or that they are employed at all. From this source, therefore, we learn the amount of our tonnage which has the legal character requisite for engaging either in the coasting trade or in foreign commerce, but we do not learn how much of this tonnage is employed either in coasting trade or in foreign commerce.

We have also annual statements of the tonnage of all vessels arriving in the United States from foreign ports. These statements show the amount of tonnage of our own vessels arriving, and the amount of tonnage of foreign vessels arriving, in each year. This information has been usually communicated to Congress, in statements annexed to the statements of the customs. The tonnage arriving is ascertained for the purpose of levying the duties imposed on the tonnage of all vessels entering the United States from foreign ports. Those duties are charged upon the whole tonnage of the vessel as often as it arrives from a foreign port. When the same vessel arrives twice or thrice in the same year, the tonnage of that vessel is repeated twice or thrice in the total amount of tonnage arriving stated for that year. The tonnage employed in trade with the West Indies appears, in the tonnage arriving, three, and frequently four times in the same year. The tonnage engaged in the trade with Europe enters into the tonnage arriving generally twice, and sometimes thrice, in the year. The tonnage employed in our trade with the countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope is generally included in the tonnage arriving once in each year. In some cases, the tonnage does not appear in the statements of tonnage arriving, until the first, second, or third year succeeding the departures of the vessels from the United States. These statements, therefore, show the amount of tonnage upon which duties are levied; and they comprehend in most cases the tonnage of the same vessel more than once in the same year.

Such is at present our official information concerning the employment of navigation in our foreign trade. This information is considerable and important; but it does not present all the facts which are sufficiently important to be known.

The true amount of our tonnage actually employed in foreign trade is not exhibited by either of the statements which have been mentioned. It is not exhibited by the statements of registered tonnage, not only because the registered tonnage may be unemployed, but also because much of that tonnage is constantly employed in the coasting trade. It is not exhibited by the statements of registered tonnage arriving from foreign ports, because, in most cases, the registered tonnage is included in these statements more than once in each year, as the same vessel arrives more than once in the same year. The total amount of tonnage registered, and the total amount of registered tonnage arriving, upon which duties are paid, are the facts which are now stated. Neither of these facts shows how much of our tonnage is really employed in foreign commerce at any time.

We have the amount of our own tonnage arriving, and the amount of foreign tonnage arriving, which are considered as the tonnage employed in introducing the imports; but we have no statement of the amount or national character of the tonnage departing, which is considered as that employed in taking away the exports.

In the absence of any account of vessels departing, this defect seems to have been considered as supplied by the accounts of vessels arriving. Every voyage of importation has been supposed to imply a corresponding voyage of exportation, and every arrival to indicate a corresponding departure. The same vessels are, in general, employed both in importation and exportation. As we have the tonnage of all vessels which enter the United States from other countries, the amount of that tonnage has been considered as the amount of the tonnage of all vessels which leave the United States for other countries; and as the amount of tonnage arriving is divided in the statements into the amount of our own tonnage and the amount of foreign tonnage, it has been supposed that the tonnage of our own vessels and the tonnage of foreign vessels bear the same proportion to each other in the case of departures as in the case of arrivals. The tonnage departing is thus deduced from the tonnage arriving; and the conclusion is, that they are both of the same amount. In pursuance of this conclusion, the tonnage arriving has been described in many statements which are before the public as the amount of our own tonnage, and of foreign tonnage employed in our foreign trade—an expression which comprehends exportations and departures as well as importations and arrivals.

The supposition that the tonnage departing and the tonnage arriving are of the same amount may be, in general, nearly correct, when it is applied to a considerable period of time; but it is by no means true that the tonnage departing and the tonnage arriving during any short period are equal to each other. In such periods as six months or a year there may be a great difference between the tonnage departing and that which arrives during the same period. The tonnage engaged in foreign trade varies greatly in amount from time to time. The proportion of our own tonnage to foreign tonnage also varies greatly from one time to another. As commerce fluctuates, so fluctuates the navigation which it employs. When the imports are much increased at any particular time, a quantity of tonnage may arrive greater than that which departs. When the exports increase, without a like increase of the imports, a quantity of tonnage departs greater than that which arrives. When we engage in a war which interrupts the ordinary pursuit of our navigation and commerce, the difference between the tonnage arriving and the tonnage departing may, in the first year of the war, be very great. In the first year of peace succeeding such a war, the tonnage departing may be much greater than the tonnage arriving. When wars between other countries open to our navigation new scenes of employment, much of our tonnage which is abroad may not return for a long time, or much of it which is at home may depart; and the tonnage arriving may, for some time, be much less than the tonnage departing. When such wars cease, our tonnage arriving may, for some time, much exceed our tonnage departing. When new regulations affecting commerce and navigation are established, they may for some time produce a great disparity between the tonnage arriving and the tonnage departing, or they may for some time produce a proportion between our own tonnage and foreign tonnage, very different in the case of vessels arriving from the proportion which may exist in the case of vessels departing. These inequalities, by whatever causes they may be produced, are, indeed, not of long duration; and the general equilibrium between the tonnage arriving and the tonnage departing is, in the sequel, restored. But when such disparities between the tonnage arriving and the tonnage departing occur, they should be known without delay, since they always denote the operation of some new cause which must deserve attention. The tonnage arriving is stated for each year; and, without doubt, the tonnage departing during a year is frequently much more, and frequently much less, than the tonnage arriving during the same year. The proportion between our own tonnage and foreign tonnage is often very different in the case of vessels departing, from the proportion which appears between the two kinds of tonnage, during the same year, in the case of vessels arriving.

Our own vessels engaged in foreign trade are not comprehended in the tonnage arriving until they have left the United States and return from a foreign port. Much of our tonnage departing returns in the same year; but a considerable part of it does not return until the first, second, or third year succeeding the departure of the vessels. We have, therefore, no account in these statements of that part of our tonnage departing which never returns; and of that which returns a considerable portion does not appear in the tonnage arriving until some year subsequent to its departure. When our navigation employed in foreign trade is in a course of rapid increase, as it has generally been since 1789, the fact would first appear in the tonnage departing, if that tonnage were known. The foreign tonnage appears, in these statements, in the year in which it arrives. If the tonnage departing were stated, much of the foreign tonnage would appear as departing in the year subsequent to its arrival.

The tonnage necessary for the conveyance of our exports is far greater than that which is necessary for the conveyance of our imports. A great portion of our imports consists of articles of small bulk. Much the greater part of our exports of our own production are articles of great bulk. Our foreign trade, therefore, employs, not only so much tonnage as is requisite to introduce our imports, but also the much greater quantity of tonnage which is requisite for the transportation of our exports. If we ask how much tonnage is necessary for the transportation of our exports, the inquiry cannot be answered with any certainty. The quantity of tonnage actually employed in taking away our exports, in any particular year, has never been ascertained. It is still a problem how much tonnage has been actually employed at any time in the exportation of our own products, or how much tonnage is now necessary for that purpose. In the present state of our information, this question can be answered only by estimates. The conveyance of our own bulky products to other countries is a most important part of our foreign trade, in respect to navigation. A great quantity of tonnage, and great numbers of seamen, are employed in this service. The freights received upon these exports are very great, both in reference to the value of the articles exported, and in absolute amount. We know, in general, that much the largest share of the navigation employed in conveying our exports to other countries is our own; but we do not know either the whole amount of the navigation so employed, or the actual partition of that navigation between ourselves and other nations. It is highly important that we should know with certainty the amount of the navigation employed in taking away our exports, and the proportions of the amount which are held by ourselves and by other nations.

For these reasons, it is proposed to ascertain and state the tonnage and national character of all vessels departing from the United States for foreign countries. When we have the tonnage and national character of vessels departing as well as of those arriving, we shall possess the amount of all tonnage employed in our foreign trade, and the amount of our own tonnage employed in foreign trade, so far as they can be conveniently presented by annual statements, and as nearly as will be useful for ordinary purposes. We can then compare the tonnage arriving and the tonnage departing with each other, and we can see the actual share of navigation which we possess, and that which foreigners enjoy, in the transportation of both our exports and our imports. We can then observe the increase or decline of the tonnage employed either in exportation or importation, and how far such changes may be favorable to ourselves or to foreigners; and we shall be able to trace fluctuations in the employment of navigation, as they occur in each year.

The statements of tonnage arriving distinguish it merely into that of the United States, and that which is foreign, or not of the United States. The amount of each of the two kinds of tonnage is stated. We therefore learn from these statements nothing more than the amount of all tonnage arriving, and the respective parts of the amount which belong to the United States on the one side, and to the rest of the world on the other. These statements do not show how much tonnage is employed in any particular branch of our foreign trade, as, for example, the trade with France. They do not show how much of the tonnage employed in any branch of trade, as that with France, is our own, or how much is foreign; and they do not show to what foreign nation any part of the foreign tonnage belongs. We do not learn from these statements either the amount of our own tonnage engaged in commerce with any nation or country, or the amount of British tonnage, or that of any other foreign nation, which enters or leaves our ports.

The returns of the collectors to the Treasury state the tonnage of every vessel arriving from a foreign port, and the country from which the vessel comes, and they also specify the national character of the different foreign vessels arriving. The materials for stating how much of the tonnage arriving from any particular country is our own, and how much of it is foreign, are, therefore, already provided. Some statements of these facts, in certain branches of trade, have been laid before Congress upon particular occasions, but the annual statements show nothing concerning the tonnage arriving from any particular country.

When the particular country from which tonnage arrives is stated, that fact indicates, in some degree, that the same tonnage, when it departs, returns to the country from which it came; because such is the most general course of foreign trade. But this is never a necessary inference; and, in a multitude of cases, the vessel does not depart directly for the foreign country from which it came. While our trade with the British West Indies was carried on in British vessels, much British tonnage, arriving from Great Britain, departed hence for the British West Indies. This tonnage appeared as tonnage employed in our trade with Great Britain. It was truly so employed in the voyages of importation, but in the voyages of exportation it was employed in trade with the West Indies; yet this tonnage never entered into any statement of tonnage employed in our trade with the West Indies. When one of our own ships exports a cargo to Spain, it may, in return, import a cargo from England. Its tonnage now appears only as so much tonnage engaged in trade with England. The same ship may, after its arrival from England, be sent to Russia, and there is no account of this tonnage departing. If the same ship should return directly from Russia, its tonnage will appear in the tonnage employed in trade with Russia; but, if the ship should proceed from Russia to Holland, and should enter here from Holland, its tonnage will appear as engaged in trade with Holland, and there will be no account of this tonnage as engaged in the trade with Russia. The practice is, to enter the vessel as arriving from the foreign port from which the imported cargo is brought. Much of our own tonnage which departs for particular countries returns with cargoes from other countries. All this tonnage now appears at the custom-houses and the Treasury as tonnage employed in the trade with the countries from which the vessels arrived with cargoes, and nothing appears respecting the tonnage or employment of the same vessels in their outward voyages to other countries. When the tonnage departing, and the countries for which it departs, shall be ascertained, as well as the tonnage arriving, and the countries from which it arrives, the tonnage employed in our trade with each foreign country will appear.

Our trade with China is carried on in our own vessels, but the amount of tonnage employed in that trade is unknown.

Our trade with most parts of the world is carried on partly in our own vessels, and partly in foreign vessels, but we know not either the whole amount of tonnage employed in our trade with any particular country, or what part of the amount is our own, and what part is foreign. In all those branches of our foreign commerce in which the conveyance of our exports or imports takes place partly in our own vessels and partly in foreign vessels, it is of great importance that we should know how much of our own navigation and how much foreign navigation are employed in the transportation. The cases in which the navigation is divided between ourselves and foreigners embrace far the greater part of our foreign commerce. It would, at all times, be useful to know the true share of navigation which we enjoy in trade with particular countries; yet this knowledge was, perhaps, less important while our system of discriminating duties was applied equally to all foreign countries. That system is now relaxed; we have relinquished it in respect to the British dominions in Europe, the Netherlands, Sweden, Prussia, Hamburgh, and Bremen. The vessels of those countries are now admitted into our ports upon the same terms as our own vessels. We should know how much of our own tonnage is now employed in trade with those countries, respectively, and how much of their tonnage now passes through our ports. These facts are not known; without them, we cannot estimate the effects of the present system of equal duties between ourselves and those countries; nor can we compare the effects of this system with the effects of the system of discriminating duties. The experiment of discriminating duties, operating equally upon all foreign countries, has been made, and with great effect, in favor of our own navigation. We are now in a course of opposite experiments. We have relinquished our discriminating duties in respect to Great Britain and certain other countries, which concede to us advantages supposed to be equivalent, while we retain those duties in respect to all foreign countries. The effects of both measures fall directly upon navigation. It is in the actual state of navigation as it may exist from time to time, and there only, that the effects of these different measures can be traced and seen. The experiment of open and common navigation, unfettered by preference or restriction, between some of the principal navigating countries of the world, is an interesting spectacle. To us, as one of the parties to this experiment, and possessing as we do a great navigation, and ample resources for its extension, it is a subject of peculiar concern. It is, therefore, specially important that we should possess the true state of navigation as it may exist between ourselves and those countries with which commerce is now equally open to the navigation of both parties.

When the tonnage of all shipping employed in our trade with particular countries shall be stated, we may estimate the value of the navigation employed in each branch of trade in reference to the length of the voyages performed. The benefits of navigation are in proportion, not only to the tonnage and seamen employed, but also to the time during which they are employed. The value of our trade with India and China depends much upon the great length of the voyages to and from those distant countries. The facts which are proposed to be stated will afford a view of the relative importance of the employments of navigation in the different branches of our foreign trade in this respect.

The returns of the collectors to the Treasury will specify the names, tonnage, and rational character of all vessels arriving and departing; and they will state the several foreign countries from which all vessels arrive, and for which all vessels depart. There will then be in the Treasury sufficient materials to show how many voyages are made by the vessels engaged in each branch of trade in one year, and how many times the tonnage of the same vessels enters into the statements of tonnage either arriving or departing in the same year. These facts are too minute to be inserted in the annual statements; but they are interesting, and they will be collected and preserved in the Treasury, from which they may be drawn upon special occasions. From these facts the exact amount of our tonnage actually engaged at any time in all foreign trade, or in our trade with any particular country, may be deduced; and from the same facts the number of seamen employed in all our foreign trade, or in our trade with any particular country, both in our own and in foreign vessels, may be sufficiently ascertained. The number of seamen usually employed in our vessels engaged in foreign trade has been estimated to be six men for one hundred tons of shipping. In this manner we may compute the numbers of seamen employed in any branch of our foreign trade, when we know the quantity of tonnage engaged in that trade; but such a computation must be founded upon the true quantity of tonnage actually employed in the trade. The annual statements of tonnage departing and arriving will, in most cases, comprehend the tonnage of the same vessels more than once in the same year; and, in some cases, the tonnage either departing or arriving will not enter into the statements of that year. The number of voyages made by the same vessels in the course of a year must therefore be known, in order to determine the true quantity of tonnage actually employed at any particular time, and the number of seamen requisite for that quantity of tonnage.

It is not meant that all the navigation which may pass between the United States and every foreign country should be stated separately in all cases. Where the intercourse between this country and any other is casual or inconsiderable, a distinct statement of the navigation employed in such intercourse would be of little use. Where the commerce between this country and any other is regular and considerable, a distinct statement of the navigation employed in it should be given. Our commerce with Great Britain, and that with France, Spain, Portugal, Holland, Russia, China, the British East Indies, Brazil, and the Spanish West Indies, are at present cases of this character. The propriety of stating the navigation separately in other branches of our foreign trade may be left to the officers who compile the statements. They will discern what branches of foreign commerce are of such importance as to render it useful to furnish separate statements of the navigation employed in those branches.

One peculiar case demands present attention. We have closed our ports against British vessels arriving from British ports which are closed against our vessels. This regulation relates particularly to the British West Indies. It is a measure which was due to ourselves, and to a just sense of our own rights; and it should be so enforced as to give it complete effect. The British Government have opened the island of Bermuda to our vessels. This act of the British Government defeats, in a great degree, the intended effect of our law. A great trade, hitherto unknown, now takes place between the United States and Bermuda, partly in our vessels and partly in British vessels, and between Bermuda and the British West Indies wholly in British vessels. Thus, the intercourse which we intended to suppress takes place between the United States and the British West Indies, through Bermuda; the longest part of the transit is performed exclusively by British vessels; and even a part of the intercourse between the United States and Bermuda is carried on by British vessels. It is our duty to pursue our own measure to its full effect, and to adopt such further provisions as may be necessary for that purpose. But, while this intercourse with Bermuda is allowed to exist, the extent to which it takes place should be stated and known.

The official statements of exports give no information of the vessels in which the goods are exported. Those statements do not show whether the goods are exported in vessels of the United States or in foreign vessels.

The official statements of imports divide the imports subject to duty into those which are imported in our own vessels, and those which are imported in foreign vessels. Three distinct tables are given: first, a statement of goods imported in our own vessels; next, a statement of goods imported in foreign vessels; and, thirdly, a statement called a general aggregate of all goods imported in our own and in foreign vessels. The kinds and amounts of the imports are stated in each table; the countries from which the imports come are stated alike in the first and second tables; and, in the third table, instead of particular countries, each foreign nation and its dependencies are stated. These three tables are of great length. One table, with some alterations in form, would be sufficient, and would better exhibit the facts, which are now separated from each other in distinct statements. A single table, with three suitable columns, would show all the facts to the eye upon the same lines. The first column might show the amount imported in our own vessels; the second column might show the amount imported in foreign vessels; and the third column would exhibit the total amount of the two preceding columns. Such an alteration will be proper, if the imports are to be hereafter stated with this discrimination of the vessels in which they are brought. But this discrimination in the statements is of very little use when accurate accounts of the tonnage arriving are taken. The object of stating the imports with this discrimination is to show how far the navigation which introduces them is our own, and how far it belongs to foreign nations. These facts are indeed shown, in some degree, in this manner. Where the imports are free from duty, these statements show nothing concerning the navigation which introduces them. When the imports subject to duty are brought from a particular country, wholly in our own vessels, or wholly in foreign vessels, those facts appear by these statements. But the same facts will also appear from the tonnage arriving, and with the additional advantage of showing the quantity of tonnage employed in the importation. In most cases where the imports come partly in our own vessels and partly in foreign vessels, these statements afford nothing certain in respect to the shares of navigation enjoyed by ourselves or by foreigners in the importations. A great variety of imports is presented, some of which are stated only by values, and others by kinds and quantities. These facts furnish very little information concerning the national proportions of the navigation employed in introducing these imports; and they form a very imperfect foundation for any calculation respecting the tonnage employed or the freights earned. The tonnage and freights depend upon the bulk of the articles transported. Where values only are given, we know nothing of the kinds or quantities of the articles, and of course nothing of the tonnage requisite for their transportation. Where the kinds and quantities of the articles are given, we may indeed estimate the quantity of the navigation, if we know the amount of tonnage requisite for the conveyance of the various articles in question. But every such calculation must be very complex; and all such estimates must be at last less certain and satisfactory than the plain proportions of the navigation held by ourselves and by foreigners respectively, as these facts are found in the tonnage arriving. If it were useful to know the particular goods which are actually conveyed in our own vessels and those actually conveyed in foreign vessels, such a knowledge would be more important in respect to our exports than in respect to our imports. But no such discrimination is made or will appear in the exports. It is conceived that this threefold statement of the imports subject to duty is not of sufficient use to be continued; and it is proposed that the imports shall be in future stated without this discrimination. This retrenchment will probably diminish the annual statements as much in point of volume as they will be increased by the addition of all the new matters which are now proposed to be stated. No general system for statistical accounts of our foreign commerce has ever been established by law. No officer of the Government is required by law to compile, to communicate to Congress, or to publish any thing upon this subject. All the statements of our foreign commerce which have been here mentioned have been rendered by the officers of the Treasury, either in compliance with resolutions of one or other branch of the Legislature, or without any requisition whatever. The Senate and House of Representatives have each separately adopted such resolutions as they thought fit, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for statements of exports and imports; and all the statements which the Treasury could furnish have been given. Some of these resolutions are perma-ment, and require annual statements. The permanent resolutions of the Senate are of the 10th of February, 1796, and the 16th of March, 1796; those of the House of Representatives are of the 3d of March, 1797, and the 29th of May, 1798. The special requisitions which have been made upon the executive officers, on the part of each of the two Houses of Congress, for information concerning our foreign commerce, have been very numerous. If any proof were necessary to show either the importance of complete statistical accounts of our foreign commerce, or the poverty of our present information on this subject, that proof would be abundantly found in these unceasing calls for information concerning matters connected with our foreign commerce, which do not appear in the annual statements. At almost every session of Congress measures relating to our foreign commerce are agitated. Many of these questions are of the highest importance, and some of them are difficult, even with the clearest light of facts. If any facts are wanted, which do not appear in the annual statements, a call is made upon the executive officers; and, generally, upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information. The officer returns the best answer which he is able to give. Many of these answers have at different times been given with great ability, and they have served, in some degree, to supply the want of ascertained facts, by general views and judicious estimates. But, if all the material facts which compose our foreign commerce were ascertained and presented to Congress in annual statements, the estimates of executive officers would not be wanted; every legislator would then have before him the whole subject in authentic facts.

The annual statements of the Treasury have been here examined as statistical accounts of foreign commerce. Imperfect as they are in this view, their imperfections are not to be attributed to the officers of the Treasury; those officers have faithfully given the materials they possessed, and they could do no more. They have performed the duty which was imposed upon them by the resolutions under which they acted. In some respects, they have done much more. They have at different times, without any requisition from superior authority, made several very useful improvements in the forms of stating the exports. The materials concerning the exports are arranged and stated in the best manner in which they can be presented, as they are now returned to the Treasury. The annual statements concerning navigation are arranged and rendered in the best form which the present state of materials in the Treasury will permit. All the annual statements concerning tonnage have been rendered by the officers of the Treasury without any requisition for that purpose. To this time there is neither law nor resolution requiring annual statements of the navigation employed in our foreign trade. The principal defects which have been here detailed are defects of law. The executive officers have no power to obtain the facts which are requisite to supply those defects. Such a power can only be conferred by law. It is the province of the Legislature to establish such a system as will supply the present defects, and bring forth all the desired information.

At present, the duty of preparing and rendering the annual statements of exports and imports depends merely upon the separate resolutions of the Senate and House of Representatives which have been mentioned. It is only in those resolutions that any account of the matters required to be stated concerning the exports and imports can be found; and those resolutions are very general and loose in their description of the facts which they require. The subjects which are proper to be stated should be defined by law; and the duty of compiling and rendering the annual statements should be imposed upon proper officers by law. A suitable and permanent system, adequate to the objects proposed, should be established. When this shall be done, a complete report of facts, showing the state of our commerce with every foreign country; and with all the world, in each year, may be annually laid before Congress.

The statements of exports, the statements of imports, and the statements of tonnage arriving from foreign countries, have been hitherto laid before Congress annually, but detached from each other, and at different times. It will be proper that the statements of exports, those of imports, and those of navigation employed in our foreign trade, should be laid before Congress in one body, and at the commencement of each annual session.

The present state of this subject will account for the method of this discussion. An existing system, sufficient in some points, but also defective in many respects, was to be examined. So far as it is sufficient, it required no comment. The proper course, therefore, seemed to be to point out and examine its defects. But this course of examination is deprived of the advantage of clear order. As many of the defects of the existing system are topics little connected with each other, so must be the parts of the discussion which examines them.

If we have statements of our foreign commerce at all, they should be both comprehensive and accurate; they should comprehend all facts which are really material for public uses, and they should be true in all matters stated as facts. Partial statements mislead, and erroneous statements deceive. The nature of the subject forbids us to expect entire accuracy in such statements. Perfect accuracy in these subjects is the shadow, which may be imagined, but cannot be touched; reasonable accuracy is the substance, which may be seized and presented in its just dimensions. Minute precision is not attainable, and, were it attainable, it would be without practical uses; but reasonable accuracy is sufficient for all practical uses, and reasonable accuracy is both necessary and attainable. Official statements will be taken for correct statements, and will be the foundation both of private reasonings and public measures. It may be better to have no official statements of foreign commerce than to have statements which are in any degree defective or erroneous.

According to the preceding views, a complete system for statistical accounts of our foreign commerce should embrace statements of these facts:

Statistical Accounts of Commerce and Navigation.

1. All our exports.
2. All our imports.
3. All the navigation employed in our trade with the rest of the world.

And these general heads should be stated in such details and divisions as to exhibit the following facts:

1st. The kinds, quantities, and values of exports and imports.

2d. The exports to every particular country.

3d. The imports from every particular country.

4th. All the navigation employed in our trade with each foreign country, distinguishing our own navigation from that of foreign nations.

The actual state of our trade with every particular foreign country would then appear distinctly; and the state of our foreign commerce would result from the several parts of the whole subject. Such statements would exhibit each branch of our foreign trade as one entire subject, both in respect to commerce and navigation; and the aggregate of all the particular branches of trade would exhibit the true state of our intercourse with all the world.

But, as much of this information is now afforded by the existing system, the particular amendments which are requisite to supply the defects of the present system are these:

1. That the accounts of exports furnished at the time of exportation, and the destinations of the exports, should be stated and verified, not only by the master of the vessel, but also by the owner or exporter of the articles.

2. That imports free from duty should be ascertained and valued.

3. That imports subject to specific duties should be valued.

4. That certain of the most considerable parts of the imports which pay duty on the value should be stated by their kinds and quantities as well as by their values.

5. That all the imports should be valued at their foreign cost.

6. That the national characters and tonnage of all vessels departing from the United States should be ascertained and stated.

7. That the national characters and tonnage of vessels, both departing and arriving, in the trade with each of the foreign countries with which our commerce is considerable, should be separately stated.

8. That all these facts should be properly combined with those which are now ascertained; and that the whole should be digested in suitable forms into annual statements; and

9. That a general and permanent system, providing for the attainment of the objects here proposed, should be established by law.

A bill embracing the provisions which are here recommended is now submitted.

Statistical accounts of foreign commerce are important, from the peculiar nature of intercourse between independent nations. Commerce between nations depends upon both parties, upon compacts between both, upon regulations which either or both may establish, and upon all the measures which the policy, the pleasure, or the passion of rulers may lead them to adopt in respect to intercourse with other nations. Though the interests of all nations would be best promoted by allowing to commerce between them the full freedom which is allowed to the commerce of persons in the same society, it is vain to expect that this theory will ever be generally adopted and carried into practice. While Governments, seeking to obtain superior or exclusive advantages, will regulate and restrain foreign commerce, the Governments of other nations affected by such measures, even if they feel not the like motives, must assert their equal rights and protect their own interests. If there were no other cause of obstruction, the necessity of revenue, and the facility of obtaining revenue, by taxes levied through the medium of foreign commerce, will always be a great impediment to the natural freedom of trade between nations. Our system is, to a great extent, that of open and free commerce with all the world; but, in some of the most important branches of our foreign commerce, we are met by foreign prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations, which deprive us of our just share of the benefits of mutual intercourse. We are therefore compelled to seek relief from the effects of such foreign systems by treaties, or to counteract them by our own regulations. Hence a knowledge of the actual state of our trade with particular countries is exceedingly important. It is with particular Governments, and concerning particular branches of trade, that these collisions take place. The commercial regulations of any country may be known, but such regulations afford no information of the state and extent of the trade to which they are applicable. The effects of such regulations cannot be justly comprehended without a knowledge of the facts upon which those regulations operate.

Our foreign commerce is the means of vending our surplus products, which are great and valuable, and the means of procuring the products of other countries, which we desire for our consumption. It is a great source of wealth from the profits of trade and the employment of navigation, and it affords the means of great naval power. It is the principal source of revenue; it is at the same time a great impediment to the progress of our own manufactures; and it holds us in a certain degree of dependence upon foreign nations for the supply of our own wants. Shall our foreign commerce be cherished for the sake of wealth, naval power, and revenue; or shall it be restrained to promote domestic manufactures; to render ourselves essentially independent of the rest of the world for the supply of our own wants; and to avoid the collisions to which foreign commerce is exposed from the ambition, rapacity, and wars, of other nations? These are all great questions of national policy; and they present, to a certain extent, a conflict of opposing considerations. It is not the purpose of this report to discuss these questions. Whatever views may be taken of them by some, and whatever may be the opinions entertained concerning them by others, the knowledge of the facts from which these questions arise is equally necessary and important to all. The facts which compose our foreign commerce must be the foundation of all reasonings and all conclusions concerning these questions. The present purpose is to provide authentic information of these facts. As our foreign commerce produces directly or indirectly most important effects upon all interests and classes of the nation, all are interested in that commerce; all are entitled to speculate and form opinions upon these questions; and every interest is entitled to a just protection from the Government of the whole. The Government has not only to judge, but to decide. Its decisions produce effects which are felt in every branch of public and private concerns. It is the common interest of all that our foreign commerce should be thoroughly known and understood. If our foreign commerce were, and could continue to be, perfectly free, it would still fluctuate with all the varying circumstances of the world; and information of its actual state, from time to time, would be highly interesting. But our foreign commerce will always be the subject of much legislation and many practical measures. The great questions and interests which are involved in our foreign commerce must always be a principal subject of the deliberations and measures of the National Government. The first requisite to wise legislation and judicious measures upon this subject must be the knowledge of the facts which constitute the subject itself.

Our foreign commerce is very great, and greater than that of any other nation, excepting one. This is not the place to discuss the importance of our external commerce, or to trace its connexion with our internal concerns. It exists, and it is closely interwoven with all the great interests of the nation. In whatever view it is considered, it is a subject of the highest moment. That the facts which compose this great subject should be known, will hardly be disputed. Without them, the subject itself cannot be understood, nor can the interests of the nation receive a judicious care. The power to regulate and protect our commerce with foreign nations is confided to this Government. It belongs to the same Government to provide authentic information of the state of that commerce. Let the facts, as they take place, be ascertained and made public to all. They deserve the attention of all, but more especially the constant and watchful attention of legislators and statesmen.

HORSES LOST IN THE SEMINOLE WAR.

[Communicated to the House, March 14, 1820.]

Mr WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians," submitted to the House the following report:

The discussion of the principles involved in this bill at an early period of the session supersedes the necessity for any very detailed remarks; the committee, therefore, merely suggest, with as much brevity as possible, the reasons which have induced them to recommend its indefinite postponement.

The bill presupposes a liability in the United States to pay for horses, which the committee are unwilling to acknowledge. The loss of horses for want of forage was one of the contingencies to be apprehended at the time they entered the service. In every country, in those best cultivated and most highly populated, a scarcity of food, both for man and beast, will sometimes be experienced. It is an accident or privation incident to the very condition of war. What, then, must have been the mutual understanding of the parties when the persons for whom the bill provides engaged in the service of Government? The act of Congress assured them they would be allowed forty cents a day for the use and risk of their horses. This sum they are entitled to claim, and, perhaps, in every instance, have already received.

The act further assured them they would be supplied with forage; but this, like every other promise, cannot be understood as obliging Government to act beyond the boundaries of reason and probability. It has been already stated that the want of forage is one of the contingencies to be apprehended in every country where military service is to be performed; if this be true in general, how much more so is it in regard to the particular country in which the Tennessee volunteers engaged to serve? It is unreasonable to suppose that Government could promise to supply them at all times with sufficient forage in a wild, uninhabited, and uncultivated country, when it is well known that it would be impossible to execute a similar promise in those districts of country where agriculture obtains in the highest perfection. The act of Congress must, therefore, be understood to mean that, as far as it was practicable, or even possible, for Government to supply forage, it should be done; not that it should be done at all hazards, in defiance of every accident or the most uncontrollable events.

The committee cannot judge of this principle assumed in the bill by any other rule. For whose benefit, let it be asked, was it that forage should be furnished? Certainly, for the Government. It follows, then, that, from a regard to its own interest, Government would have supplied forage whenever it was practicable; but to require payment now for losses occasioned by the want of it, goes to charge Government with culpable negligence; with having failed to perform its duty to itself. Such allegations cannot be supported either in principle, or by the facts which exist in the case. The letters from Dr. Bronaugh and Colonel Gibson, submitted to the committee with the bill, prove clearly that there was no negligence on the part of Government; that no exertions, however great, could have procured the necessary supplies. Will it then be said that Government should be required to perform impossibilities, or provide against events which the parties must be supposed to have included in the conditions of their contract? For these reasons, the committee object to the principle assumed in the bill, and deny any liability in Government to pay for horses which died in the Seminole campaign for want of forage.

The bill further provides that, when owners were dismounted in battle, and the horses escaped, payment shall also be made. The committee think this is another of those risks anticipated and understood by the parties, and covered by the allowance of forty cents per day. It cannot be pretended that Government engaged that the riders should always remain on horseback, notwithstanding the incidents of any particular battle, or the general service of the campaign, should require them to be dismounted. The mounted gunmen, on the other hand, must be supposed to have stipulated that, either on horseback or on foot, they would engage the enemy; that they would fight in any way pointed out by their commander; and if, in rendering obedience to orders, their horses should be lost, the loss was to be considered only as a usual and customary result from the service in which they had stipulated to engage.

The policy of the measure is likewise very objectionable. Government cannot insure property thus engaged in the public service. Volunteers, mounted gunmen, and every other species of troops, would become negligent in taking care of their horses, if it be once understood that they are to be paid for them when lost. It would, indeed, be the interest of owners to preserve them till near the close of a campaign, receiving forty cents a day for the use and risk, and then, just before quitting the service, let them die by neglect, even when forage was plenty, or destroy them by hard treatment. The policy of giving forty cents a day consists in this: that, while owners are allowed reasonable compensation, they also have an inducement sufficiently strong to take care of their horses. But this inducement would lose all its force and effect if the horses are to be paid for when lost. If forty cents is not adequate compensation, Congress should augment it to sixty, eighty, or a hundred cents, rather than pass laws holding out inducements to owners to neglect or destroy their property.

Experience forbids the passage of the bill. The act of the 9th of April, 1816, commonly called the "claims law," the Canadian volunteer act, and the late act granting pensions to those who performed service in the Revolutionary war, have all been productive of serious mischief. They have opened the door for immoralities so great, that the committee will forbear to name them more specifically. It is believed no law of the kind could be so guarded in its provisions as not to be evaded in practice; and, if not absolutely required by the demands of justice, it should never be proposed.

Insurmountable difficulties are to be seen in administering the law. Who can tell whether a horse died for the want of forage, on account of disease, or from the neglect and inattention of the owner? The only risk assumed by Government in the act under which these troops were called into service is, that if a horse be killed in battle, then the owner must be paid. The cause of this loss can be distinctly and definitely known, and therefore Government may safely assume the responsibility. But the total negation of all other risks on the part of Government proves clearly that the framers of the law conceived it would be bad policy to take upon themselves responsibility for losses, the cause of which could not be known, and which, perhaps, if properly understood, would, in nine cases out of ten, be found to exist with the owner rather than with Government.

The injuries sustained by the claimants are depended on as a reason to induce the passage of a law for their relief. But the committee think no injuries have been sustained. Information has been received from the Second Auditor of the Treasury Department, by which it appears that the rolls of four companies have reached that office; that the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, have received each forty cents a day for the use and risk of their horses, arms, and accoutrements, from the commencement to the termination of their services. The committee, therefore, feel authorized to state that the same rule was adopted in making payment to all the troops for whom it is intended to provide.

If, then, a horse died, when only one-third or one-half the campaign had expired, the owner received pay for him after his death, at the rate of forty cents a day. Without noticing the impropriety of paying for the use and risk of a horse after he was dead, the committee would remark that, under the operation of this rule, the owners of horses have received a sum fully equal to their average value, and, in most cases, perhaps, greatly beyond it. There is, then, no real cause of complaint. Had Government purchased the horses before they entered the service, the situation of the owners could have been no better than it now is; and surely there is not the least imaginable cause of complaint, provided they are placed on no worse footing than they would have been if their property had been purchased. At all events, if Congress should pass the bill, the committee would recommend that forty cents a day for the use and risk should be deducted from the time of the death of any horse. The bill itself presupposes and admits the fact that the horses died during the campaign, and, consequently, before the end of the campaign. But it appears the owners have received pay up to the end of the campaign, and therefore have been paid for the use and risk of their horses after they had died. The committee have never before been made acquainted with any principle which would sanction the propriety of paying for the use and risk of property when that property did not exist, could not be used, and was at no risk; all of which must have happened in the present case. It seems, indeed, that the claim of Government against these individuals is much more just than their claim against Government. The committee recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

*Discriminating Duties on American Products.DISCRIMINATING DUTIES ON AMERICAN PRODUCTS.

[Communicated to the House, December 27, 1819.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled :

The memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York respectfully sheweth, that your memorialists have witnessed, with feelings of deep concern, the consequences resulting to the shipping interest of the United States from the discriminating duties established in France on the staple products of this country.

At the period of their imposition, and for a considerable time subsequent to the late war in Europe, the trade carried on by French vessels with the United States was chiefly confined to New Orleans and other Southern ports, whose productions constituted the principal exports from this country to France, whilst their interest in shipping is very limited; so that the effects of the enormous discriminating duties, payable on the importations into France of cotton and tobacco, in transferring to French vessels the carrying trade to that country, were not immediately perceived or felt by the ship owners or merchants in this quarter of the Union. But the severe losses sustained by those who employed our vessels in that trade have since led to an investigation of their causes, and created a universal feeling of the injury and injustice to which our flag is subjected.

In giving to this subject the attention which its importance demands, your memorialists find that the foreign tonnage duty and light money payable in the United States are very nearly equal to the foreign tonnage duty and port charges in France, and may therefore be considered as regulated upon the principle of a just and fair reciprocity; while the discriminating duties imposed on the importation of merchandise operate on the shipping interests of the two countries in a manner altogether disproportionate and unequal.

The foreign or discriminating duties paid by American vessels importing the following articles into France are, one and one-half cent per pound (French weight) on cotton; one and one-eighth on tobacco, and fifty-five per one hundred pounds on potashes; which extra duties exceed the whole freight now paid for the transportation of those articles from the United States, whether in French or in American bottoms.

The present rates of freight in French vessels are about one and one-eighth cent per pound for cotton; three-fourths for tobacco, and one-half for potashes; and, in American vessels, about one-third below these rates—making the difference of duty by a French vessel exceed the gross amount of freight, by an American vessel, at least one-third.

To form an estimate of the practical result of these regulations, it will be assumed that a vessel of 300 register tons burden will carry 560,000 pounds weight of tobacco, the difference of duty on which, at one and one-eighth cent per pound, would be $6,300, which is equivalent to $21 per register ton; or, in a vessel of the same description carrying 280,000 pounds weight of cotton and 220,000 pounds weight of potashes—

The difference of duty, estimated at one and one-half cent on the cotton, is	$4,200
And that on the potashes, at 55 cents per 100 pounds, is	1,210

Would be, together	$5,410
--------------------	---------

which is equivalent to $18 per register ton.

The discriminating duties chargeable on the three articles above enumerated, which constitute the bulk of our exports to France, form an aggregate much greater than the foreign duty of ten per cent. payable in the United States would amount to, if calculated on the whole importations from France; and the experience of the last two years confirms what indeed is sufficiently obvious from the preceding statement, that a perseverance in the present regulations of our intercourse with France must operate to exclude American vessels from all participation in the carrying trade connected with it.

Your memorialists, in earnestly soliciting that the attention of your honorable body may be engaged in devising some remedy for an evil so serious and alarming, beg leave to suggest their conviction of the utter inefficacy of any system of countervailing discriminating duties to be levied on the importations into the United States of French merchandise, inasmuch as the articles which would be the necessary objects of such duties bear no proportion in their bulk and in the price of their transportation to those which form our exports to France. And the course of the colonial trade, moreover, enables French vessels to avoid the inconveniences of performing the voyage across the Atlantic in ballast, by taking a freight from the ports of France to those of her colonies, and then turning their course advantageously to our ports, either in ballast or with colonial produce; while our vessels generally return direct from France in ballast, or only with inconsiderable loadings.

To exhibit in its proper light the importance of the subject under consideration, it will be necessary not only to advert to the actual amount of tonnage employed in the transportation of our produce to France, compared with the aggregate tonnage employed in foreign trade generally, but also to take into view their future relative proportions, when our trade to France shall have received all the extension of which it is susceptible by the progressive increase in the cultivation of our Southern products, and when our shipping shall have experienced the reduction it is to suffer by the effects of the further development of the actual state of our foreign commerce.

It would be superfluous to enter into details to show how extensively, and almost entirely, all the sources of that commerce are cut off. It is a lamentable fact, that more than half the number of vessels lately arrived in this from foreign ports are dismantled, from the absolute absence of any advantageous object of commercial pursuit. And this state of commerce seems the natural and necessary result of the new order of things which has prevailed since the pacification of Europe. Every restraint that lately shackled the navigation of the principal maritime nations of Europe has been removed, whilst the general trade and navigation of those States are, at the same time, regulated with a studious regard to the interests of their own subjects; so that the United States have not only ceased to be the carriers for Europe, but are deprived of the means of entering into a fair competition in the transportation to foreign countries of the principal products of their own soil.

It would seem obvious that, during the continuance of a state of peace in Europe, the great elements of our commerce in that quarter of the globe will be confined to the exchange of our products for such articles of foreign production as may be required for home consumption.

The quantity of American cotton, tobacco, potashes, and other staples now consumed in France, cannot be correctly stated by your memorialists, but they presume it to be equal to a fourth of the whole quantity exported to Europe. The aggregate tonnage employed last year in the direct trade from the United States to France is estimated at fifty thousand tons; in addition to which, an indirect trade of considerable extent has been carried on through the circuitous channel of England. (The saving on the duties by reshipping our cotton and tobacco thence to France in French vessels, instead of shipping them direct from the United States in American vessels, being more than equivalent to the extra freight and charges attending the additional voyage.)

If we limit our views of this carrying trade to the employment of 50,000 tons of shipping, the freight out and home, calculated at $20 per ton, amounts to $1,000,000; which sum, if gained by our vessels, might justly be considered as so much capital added annually to the stock of national wealth.

However small the net profit may be to the ship owners on this amount of freight, the disbursements for the equipment, and the wages for the navigation of the vessels, would be left at home; and, together with the employment it would require of so large a body of seamen, would materially conduce to create and maintain the elements necessary to advance our commercial and naval interests.

The act of Congress offering to foreign nations the means of a free intercourse with this country, on terms of perfect reciprocity, has not, as is believed by your memorialists, been found as beneficial in its operation as was justly to have been expected.

Those nations whose acceptance of the invitation it held forth might subserve the views and interests of the United States are found to remain passive; while Holland, Sweden, Prussia, and the Hanseatic Towns, adopting the principle of reciprocity, secure to themselves an important exemption in our ports, without affording any privilege in theirs not before enjoyed by the United States, and, in fact, gratuitously granted to every other nation.

Until lately we found some advantages in our commercial relations with the possessions of the King of the Netherlands by participating in the trade to the colony of Java; but now, heavy discriminating duties are laid to confine all the advantages of that trade to Dutch vessels. Your memorialists do not notice this circumstance as requiring the application of any remedies within the purview of this memorial, but to show the progressive extension on the part of the European Powers of a system of absolute colonial monopoly, and to evince the necessity of devising means to counteract the growth of that system by some vigorous effort on the part of our Government.

Louisiana was acquired by the United States in her colonial state, and the monopoly of her extended and growing trade would be more valuable than that of any two colonies whatever; and the Floridas, if they passed from their present abandoned and miserable condition to be integral parts of the Union, cannot fail, by the quickening influence of our free institutions, to open vast resources of trade, and may add to the list of our present exports even the articles of sugar and coffee, hitherto deemed exclusively colonial.

The liberal policy of the United States in opening to all nations a free trade to the vast marts of their colonial acquisitions ought, it would seem, to entitle them to some corresponding privileges from those nations, at least, who participate largely in the benefits of that trade; but no such reciprocity has been experienced, nor, as the result of gratuitous concession, is it to be expected.

In reference to the oppressive discriminating duties on the importation of American products into France, which it is the principal object of the present memorial to bring under the notice of Government, your memorialists take leave most respectfully to suggest that they can devise no expedient more likely to produce a favorable change in the present system of the French Government, nor better calculated to enable the citizens of the United States successfully to resist it if persevered in, than the imposition of a heavy tonnage duty; and at the same time no measure appears to your memorialists so consistent with the general policy of the United States.

Referring to the statement already made, exhibiting the effects of the discriminating duties in France on cotton, tobacco, and potashes, considered as a tonnage duty on American vessels, your memorialists leave to the superior wisdom of Congress to determine, on a full consideration of all the circumstances connected with the case, what tonnage duty should now be imposed so as to make this a fair and effective countervailing measure.

Your memorialists, considering moreover that some new provision is necessary in order to render beneficially operative the act of Congress which offers to foreign nations the means of commercial intercourse upon the principle of reciprocity, respectfully suggest that this duty should be made to apply to all nations which shall not adopt that principle.

Discriminating Duties imposed on American Products.

A general regulation of this nature, while it would violate neither the letter nor spirit of our treaties with France, appears to be equally expedient in reference to other nations.

Spain, for instance, besides imposing, as is believed, discriminating duties on the articles of our exports imported into the mother country, exacts most excessive extra duties on provisions imported by American vessels into her colonies. Among others, that on the article of flour amounts, in Cuba, to $3 37½ per barrel. The regulations of trade in the ports of the Spanish colonies are such as not to place the intercourse with them under any of the restrictions contained in the navigation act; and thus, while this trade remains open to both nations, the discriminating duties imposed on those colonies must operate to transfer it altogether to Spanish vessels as soon as their flag can navigate securely.

Your memorialists are persuaded that a measure like the one proposed, could produce no injurious effects upon the agricultural and commercial interests of the United States, by abridging in foreign markets the sale of their produce.

The prohibitory regulations of different Governments prove, that the want of our provisions is the only security we now enjoy for their admission into foreign ports; and, wherever this want exists, they will continue to be received, direct, or by intermediate ports.

The principal articles exported to France are so essential to the supply of her manufactories that they cannot be dispensed with; so that, if a system of commercial regulations could be supposed to exist, operating to prevent a direct exportation of those articles to that country, its whole supplies of cotton and tobacco must be derived through the circuitous channel of England, (as has been partially practised for the last two years,) or through some of the neighboring ports of the Continent; and, in either case, we should at least partake in the advantages of their transportation across the Atlantic.

The right of the citizens of the United States to participate, on equal terms, in the advantages to be derived from their commercial intercourse with foreign nations, appears to your memorialists to be indisputable; and they appeal with confidence to Congress for such interference on their behalf as the public policy may justify.

Although it may be questionable whether, in a case like the present, it would comport with the dignity of the nation to offer any considerations to foreign Powers, in order to obtain a just reciprocity of commercial benefits, yet your memorialists take leave to suggest the expediency of holding out to France some further encouragements to the consumption in the United States of French wines and silk manufactures.

Encouragements of this nature, if not required as an inducement to France to place the regulations of her trade with this country on a more equal and just footing, may possibly be used to obtain some relaxation in her colonial restrictions, and induce the repeal of the late order directed to the national tobacco manufactory in France, which restricts the employment of the foreign growth of that article to the proportion of one-sixth part for five-sixth parts of domestic growth.

It is true, in reference to the article of wines, the duty on which is now sufficiently reduced, the United States could, in the way of inducement to France, only assure to her the continuance of that reduction; but, in regard to silk manufactures, the imposition of additional duties on the same articles imported from China might be adopted as a measure of reciprocal advantage.

It would certainly be of great importance to France to check the immense importations from China of silk goods in imitation of French fabrics; and, considering the heavy drains of specie from the United States, which are caused by the prosecution of the trade to China, it would at least be equally advantageous to us to receive the same articles from countries where they can be obtained in exchange for our own products.

Your memorialists are anxious to maintain the national prosperity, and would discredit the unreasonable clamor of desponding and embarrassed traders; but the foreign commerce of this country, at the present period, is so rapidly declining, and its shipping interest so particularly depressed, that they feel themselves constrained to declare their firm conviction that both must dwindle into comparative insignificance, unless the measures of foreign Governments operating to deprive this country of an equitable participation in the benefits of its commercial intercourse with them, shall be promptly met and counteracted.

Under a deep impression that the prosperity of the nation is intimately connected with the prosperity of its commerce, and that the rising hopes of its future naval power are essentially dependent on the maintenance of its navigation, your memorialists have thought it a duty they owe the community to submit these considerations to the wisdom of Congress, humbly praying that they will afford such relief in the premises as the nature of the case may require.

COUNTERVAILING MEASURES AGAINST THE DISCRIMINATING DUTIES IMPOSED BY FRANCE ON AMERICAN PRODUCTS.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 4, 1820.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned, captains of American vessels lying in the port of New Orleans, respectfully sheweth: That your memorialists, representing also the officers and seamen of — hundred — vessels lying in this port of New Orleans, (which they are in the habit of frequenting,) have experienced for the last two years an alarming decrease in the American shipping business previously employed in the trade hence to French ports.

That the means of procuring a comfortable livelihood from the profession exercised by your memorialists, being identified with the general prosperity of the shipping interest of the Union, imboldens them to set forth in this memorial the loss it is suffering from the fatal influence of the discriminating duties established in France to favor its own vessels in the exclusive importation there of the great staples of the United States, the progressive evils of which influence your memorialists have painfully witnessed for the last two years in silence, from the expectation they (and no doubt their ship owners also) entertained that a commercial treaty was negotiating, which, at least, would have established the intercourse between France and the United States on the same footing on which it exists as regards England and other countries that have adopted the liberal system to which Congress has invited all nations.

Your memorialists propose to prove, by inconsistent facts—

That the difference of duty in France paid by American and French vessels on the articles of cotton and tobacco, is more than the whole freight now paid on the same hence to Liverpool, or that can be obtained for an American vessel in France.

That the discriminating duties and tonnage that would accrue to American vessels in France, compared with the same that would apply on French vessels in the United States, with reference to the trade of this place, would be more than ten to one.

That, notwithstanding the ten per cent. additional duty paid by foreign vessels, it is only on a few articles of value, and not of bulk; that it is sufficient to give a preference to American vessels to obtain the freight of the imports from France; the aggregate importations thence to this port by French vessels, exceeding very much in quantity that by American vessels.

That the carrying trade to France, which three years ago was altogether in American vessels, last year was nearly equally divided between them and French vessels; and that, since the beginning of the year 1819, it has been carried on in French vessels nearly in the proportion of four to one.

To establish the truth of these facts, your memorialists beg reference to the annexed tables, extracted from the custom-house books of this district, and certified by the collector; from which it appears that the vessels cleared out hence for French ports were, in 1818,

	Tons. 94ths.
39 American, aggregate tonnage	9,134 53
36 French, aggregate tonnage	7,553 63
75 vessels, total aggregate tonnage	16,688 22

The vessels cleared out and about loading for the same ports, since 1st January to 17th March, (about two and a half months,) in 1819:

	Tons. 94ths.	Tons. 94ths.
33 French. 21 cleared, aggregate tonnage	-	-4,945 74
12 in port and loading, aggregate tonnage	-2,839 57
		7,785 37

9 American. 7 cleared, aggregate tonnage	-	- 1,750 84
2 loading, aggregate tonnage	-	- 655 00
		2,405 84

42 total vessels until the 17th of March, 1819, tonnage	10,191 27
---	-----------

These results demonstrate what your memorialists have advanced as to the rapidly progressive transfer of the carrying trade in question from American to French vessels; which, indeed, has not become absolute for the whole, from the circumstance that until now there have not been a sufficient number of French vessels to embrace it, and that a few of our ship-owners have made forced operations in order to employ their vessels.

By comparing the dates of clearances of the French vessels, it will appear that last year, until all the French vessels left this port, few or no American vessels were loaded for France; and probably the latter part of this year there will be, for the same reason of a want of French vessels, many Americans employed in the same way. But it cannot be doubted, with the advantages the former possess, that a short period will only be necessary for them to multiply and entirely destroy the feeble efforts of competition that may be maintained by a few ship-owners that load their own vessels, who must, however, if they persevere, eventually terminate it by ruinous sacrifices.

To avoid useless details and amplifications, your memorialists have confined themselves to the consideration of the articles of cotton and tobacco, (although potashes and others might be added,) to establish the difference paid in France by American and French vessels.

The duty in France on cotton is—

On an American vessel, 38f. 50c.
per 200 lbs., (French pounds,) or	- 3.61 cents per lb.
On a French vessel, 22f. 00c.
per 200 lbs., (French pounds,) or	- 2.06 cents per lb.

Difference of duty on cotton, in favor of French vessels, per pound	- 1.55
---	--------

The duty on tobacco is—

In an American vessel, 11f. 00c. per 200 pounds, (French.)
Add 10 per cent.	1f. 10c. for that paid on the tare, which is not deducted by the custom-house in France, makes 12f. 10c. or equal to 1.125 cent. per pound.
Tobacco in a French vessel is free.
Difference of duty on tobacco in favor of French vessels, per pound,	1.125 cent.

It is to be remarked that the tonnage duty paid by American vessels in France is 4f. 50c. per ton, or 85 cents; and the brokerage for entering and clearing at the custom-house is established at 1f. per ton, or 18½ cents; together, per ton, $1.03½, which is more than the foreign tonnage paid in the United States, at 50 cents, and foreign light-money, 50 cents; together, $1 per ton.

Discriminating Duties imposed on American Products.

Without taking notice, therefore, in the following calculations, of the tonnage or light-money paid in the respective ports, your memorialists will proceed to state that the freight now and usually current from this port to Liverpool is one penny per pound on cotton, equal to 1.85 cent per pound.

To be deducted, charges attending shipment at New Orleans:

75 cents per bale for re-pressing the cotton.
12½ cents drayage to the press.
28 cents rolling and stowing on board.

$1 15½ altogether, per bale of 350 pounds, equal to 0.31 cent per pound; net freight 1.54 cent per pound, (exclusive of stone ballast.)

The freight on tobacco for the same place is a half-penny per pound, equal to 0.93 cent.

To be deducted, rolling and stowing on board, at 75 cents per hogshead of 1,200 pounds, net per pound 0.6 cent; net freight per pound 0.86 cent.

Applying these data to shipment by an American vessel of—

80 tons cotton, or 179,200 pounds, the freight, at 1.54 cent would be - - - $2,759 68
130 tons tobacco, or 291,200 pounds, the freight, at 0.86 cent, would be 2,504 32

210 tons total freight would be - 5,264 00

The difference of duty on 179,200 pounds cotton, at 1.55 cent, would be - - - $2,777 69

The difference of duty on 291,200 pounds tobacco, at 1.25 cent would be - 3,276 00

Total difference of duty - - - 6,053 69

Making the difference of duty more than freight by - - - $789 69

And supposing it would require a vessel of 300 register tons burden to carry the 210 tons weight of cotton and tobacco, it would make the saving of duty of $6,053 69 to a French vessel, amounting to more than twenty dollars per ton.

It now remains to be considered how far the ten per cent. additional duty on goods imported into the United States by foreign vessels, goes to countervail the difference shown to be paid in France by American vessels. It may be premised, indeed, as there is no proportion between the bulk and value of our exports to the imports from France, that the French merchants, if they employed our vessels exclusively to bring their produce to the United States, which they can do at a most trifling freight would not certainly pay one-tenth part of the freight money that would accrue to their vessels, if they are allowed to secure to themselves the carrying trade of cotton and tobacco from the United States to France.

Therefore, that it is ineffectual to seek a remedy to the discriminating duties on our produce in France by increasing those paid here by French vessels bringing the produce of that country, and that nothing can be sufficient but a positive tonnage duty, graduated according to the amount of the discriminating duties that may exist in France on our principal staples; it being almost certain that the difference of duty on these articles sent to France from hence this year will amount to more than all the duties collected by this custom-house on imports from France, both by American and French vessels.

By the accompanying table, it will be seen that there entered from French ports from the 1st of September, 1817, to the end of 1818—

36 American vessels.
57 French vessels.
93 total vessels.
Aggregate tonnage, American vessels	- 7,601
Do. French vessels	- 12,089
	19,690
Amount of duties, American vessels	$290,834 65
Do. French vessels	- 263,664 67

Total - - - $554,499 32
being at the rate of $443,600 per annum.

But the importations during these fifteen months were excessive, and prices, in consequence thereof, are less in this place than first cost.

A large estimate for average duties of importations of succeeding years may be taken at 400,000 dollars.

It has been shown already that, in little more than two and a half months of this year, 10,191 27-94 tons shipping are employed in the exports hence to France; and, supposing what will be employed for the remaining nine months as much more, together will make for the whole year 20,382 tons. The difference of duties, at $20, will amount to $407,640. This extract of duties paid further shows that fifty-seven French vessels, all with cargoes of the aggregate burden of 12,089 tons, paid only for duties $263,664 66, the tenth part of which paid as foreign duty $23,969 51, being less than $2 per ton.

These results, recapitulated, would establish that the discriminating duties in France on American vessels are $20 per ton, while those on the trade thence in French vessels are $2 per ton only; and that this year, in the trade from this to French ports, the quantity of shipping to be employed would amount to more than 20,000 tons, the discriminating duties on which in France, estimated at $20 per ton, would, as was before advanced, more than equal the total amount of duties on goods imported from the same, both in American and French vessels, estimated at $400,000.

But these comparative estimates will not prove exact during the present and succeeding years; for, while the inordinate importations of French goods last year, as was observed before, reduced they will not be continued hereafter in the same their value here below prime cost, it showed that quantity; but the reverse must take place with respect to the exports of cotton and tobacco, which will increase with the extended production of them, and yearly cause a greater disparity between the exporting and importing trade to France.

If the circumstance is reverted to, that the proportion of American vessels loaded this year, and now loading for France, is only as one to four to the number of French, it may be offered as a conclusive proof, considering the inactivity of our shipping, that it has to contend with great disadvantages; for, on fair grounds of competition, your memorialists are bold to assert that neither the vessels of France nor of any other country could obtain a triumph over those navigated by American seamen; neither can it be an argument against them, that French vessels, notwithstanding the foreign duty, have had the largest share of the import trade of goods from France, (at least as regards bulk;) because the disproportion shown to exist between the tonnage used in the exports and imports from this port causes the incipient voyage from France to have no other object than to seek a return freight for the vessels; and, therefore, whenever it happens (as is mostly the case) that the difference of duty is not equivalent to the freight, there is no motive to employ an American vessel.

But the owners of French vessels, not to send them empty, keep the market in this place glutted with all kinds of French things, even sausages, sweetmeats, butter, cheese, shoes, hats, millinery, bricks, tiles, hollow cast iron ware, stone jugs, bottles, and many other articles that are objects of domestic trade or produce in our own country, as good and cheap as they can be brought from any place else. And to give a better idea of the nature of this trade, and to call the attention of your honorable body to the propriety of laying specific duties on some of them, a copy of the manifest of entry of a French ship also accompanies this memorial.

And your memorialists further beg leave to observe that the whole extent of the loss of the carrying trade of the articles of export from this place to France will not be correctly appreciated by that part only that heretofore has gone direct hence to France, for a considerable proportion of the Louisiana cotton and Kentucky tobacco shipped hence to the Eastern ports found its way by that circuitous channel to France; affording double employment to our vessels in the voyage coastwise, and then in the subsequent voyage across the Atlantic.

The loss of both these sources of employment to our ships must, in time, be superadded to that which your memorialists have shown to have existed in preceding years direct from this place. How long the trade, or how much of it, would continue in this circuitous channel, your memorialists are not prepared to say positively, provided our vessels were put upon an equality with French vessels in France; but they believe, from the active coasting trade now arising in lumber, bricks, building stones, lime, hay, oats, candles, soap, cider, salted fish, New England rum, potatoes, furniture, carriages, saddlery, shoes, cut nails, and other domestic manufactures, that return freight will be so low that, aided by particular circumstances attending the seasons of business and navigation of the river, a great portion of it that now exists, at least, will be continued.

Besides the direct trade to France, it will be seen, by the accompanying tables of entries and clearances of French vessels at this port, that a permanent trade is establishing to their colonies in the West Indies, that is not open, except partially, to the vessels of the United States. Thus, whilst the avenues of French commerce are straitened to our flag within the direct line from our ports to France, and an intolerable and odious duty is levied for the rights of passage to that, a vast and varied career is opened to that of France, secured from competition on our part, where it might exist by discriminating duties, and finding in the English and other European colonies exclusively all the ramifications of profitable trade that can arise from carrying our produce.

An act of Parliament exists, particularly permitting the importation to the British colonies of all articles of provisions, besides salted meat, from all places in America, except from the ports of the United States.

Your memorialists have only taken a partial view of the evils growing out of the cause of complaint they now submit to your honorable body. They have only shown how much the trade from this place is liable to be affected by it, and leave to those better acquainted to say what proportion the 20,000 tons of shipping employed from New Orleans to French ports bears to the whole trade from the United States to France.

The magnitude of this aggregate, when duly ascertained, must no doubt excite the attention of every branch of the General Government, and suggest some expedient to counteract the inordinate selfishness that influenced that of France when it first devised a system that can only exist by being tolerated in the United States, to the inconceivable dereliction of the maintenance of the most important national interest.

A tonnage duty, if made dependent on the nature of the cargo exported from the United States, would strike directly at the object of this memorial: a calculation would show probably that $15 per register ton on vessels carrying cotton, and $25 per register ton on those carrying tobacco, would about countervail the present duties laid in France on the same articles imported in American vessels.

Your memorialists will further observe that, throwing the carrying trade from this place to France out of the hands of the American ship-owners naturally influences the trade in the same articles from American merchants into the same channel; the number of French vessels, being continually augmented, bring necessarily their owners in some degree to partake of it; every one tries to push off some articles of goods to gain a freight for his ship, and to pay for cotton and tobacco, instead of furnishing money advances; French commission houses to transact this business are daily multiplied, and adventurers with their "pacotilles" are daily crowding the port.

This excessive excitement to the consumption of the articles of luxury and fashion from France, as well as the encouragement offered to transient traders, your memorialists conceive cannot be beneficial to the country; they feel too much that French fashion and French feelings are thereby likely to be perpetuated in this newly adopted sister State; and that whilst Americans are denied the rights they ought to possess in France, they will continue to be considered as foreigners in this part of their own country.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

SICK AND DISABLED SEAMEN IN THE PORT OF NEW YORK.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 13, 1820.]

To the honorable the Congress of the United States of America:

The memorial of the Governors of the New York Hospital respectfully sheweth: That your memorialists, as trustees of an institution erected and endowed for the relief only of those indigent and sick for whom no particular charity is provided, have, from sentiments of humanity, and with a confident reliance on the justice of Congress, ventured to appropriate a portion of their funds to the succoring and healing of sick and disabled seamen, for whom they conceived provision had been, or was intended to be, made.

It would appear that, by the act of the 16th July, 1798, which imposes a tax of twenty cents a month on seamen's wages, the Government of the United States engaged and contracted to protect and maintain these hardy citizens, whenever sickness or other disability should render them dependent; and also that, from the circumstance of large sums having been expended in the erection of hospitals, it is manifest the provision must have been adequate to its primary object, as the law appropriates only the surplus to such buildings. Your memorialists, therefore, can perceive no reason why, in the application of this fund, the collector should undertake either to limit the number to be benefited, or to proscribe any particular class of patients.

Soon after the passing the aforementioned act, an agreement was made to receive into the New York hospital, at the rate of three dollars a week for board, medical attendance, and every other necessary except clothing, all such sick and disabled seamen as were contemplated to be relieved.

In a settlement of this account, in November, 1804, with the collector, your memorialists were surprised to learn that he undertook, and did absolutely refuse, and has continued to refuse, to pay for more than seventy-five seamen at any one time, and has since reduced the number to sixty-five, though considerably more than that number are generally in the hospital. He has also excluded seamen employed in the coasting trade, and such as have only performed the voyage, and has even undertaken to construe the law as not applying to cases of disability resulting from venereal infection, and to exclude from its benefits this class of patients—a distinction this, as your memorialists conceive, that is arbitrary and very oppressive, especially as it respects seafaring men: for those people, in most cases, expend all their wages in paying of men, pretenders to the healing art, before they come to the hospital; and having then no further credit at boarding-houses, and being incapable of serving at sea, they must absolutely perish by that inveterate disease unless they are received into the hospital. It consists with our observation that more than half the seafaring men who have lately applied to the hospital for relief were men who labored under that disease.

Your memorialists, in full faith that the legitimate and professed guardians of sailors would remunerate the expense, and being convinced that Congress intended to provide for all sick and disabled seamen, have, notwithstanding, administered relief unto all those unfortunate objects discarded by the collector; and, feeling repugnant to eject from the doors of their hospital to suffer, and perhaps to perish, men who have contributed so essentially to the prosperity and honor of our country, have humanely restored most of them to health, and secured their usefulness to society.

The funds of your memorialists are now, however, so burdened by the numerous charities they are compelled to administer, and especially in consequence of the large and increasing number of supernumerary seamen beyond what is paid for, that they feel themselves constrained to observe that, unless some provision is made to discharge the existing debt, as also to indemnify them in future, they may be reluctantly compelled to withdraw their charity from this class of patients.

If it is correct that all, or nearly all, the hospital money received at this port has been expended here, your memorialists would then most respectfully ask whether it is consistent with justice or humanity that such numbers of distressed seamen, who have all contributed equally to this fund, should be abandoned to want and misery? Your memorialists presume otherwise, and assuredly believe that the same motives which produced the law of 1798, in regard to this subject, will equally characterize the present Congress, and confidently hope that, if it should appear the sum received here is inadequate to support the sick and disabled seamen constantly found here, such further provision will be made as may be requisite to realize the humane views of Government.

If the demand of your memorialists for maintaining and relieving these improvident sufferers is inquired into, it will appear that the compensation solicited is not only less in every instance, but in some not half of what has been charged in other ports. And if the fund originally created is inadequate to this object, generally, your memorialists then beg leave respectfully to suggest the policy of an addition of ten cents a month to the hospital tax, as both reasonable and necessary. And your memorialists would further respectfully solicit that the proper officer may be directed to audit the accounts for the past, and pay them such sum as may appear to be due.

All which is respectfully submitted.

APPLICATION TO ABOLISH PRIVATEERING IN TIME OF WAR.

[Communicated to the House, January 11, 1820.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled :

The memorial of the undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully represents: That, while they have rejoiced in the privileges of a free people, they have been deeply affected with the multiplied instances of criminal prosecutions, imprisonment, capital convictions, and public executions, which have recently occurred in several States. Your memorialists are far from imputing to defects in the Government of their country all the crimes of their fellow-citizens, and as far from a disposition to attribute the defects of Government to base and criminal intentions on the part of legislators or magistrates. They believe that the best informed men are but partially enlightened, and that men of the best hearts are necessarily liable to the influence of hereditary opinions, prejudices, and customs. But while crimes of the deepest die abound in the land, while our courts of justice and our prisons are thronged with malefactors, your memorialists conceive it to be a duty of all well informed men to search out the causes of these evils, and, when discovered, to represent them for the consideration of their legislators. They also regard it as the duty of legislators to seek the virtue and welfare of their fellow-citizens, and to do all in their power to prevent crimes; not merely by providing for the punishment of criminals, but by the abolition of those customs or practices by which men are naturally led into the paths of vice and ruin. Among the many atrocious offences of the present day, highway robbery, piracy, and murder, frequently occur. The melancholy scenes of public executions which have been witnessed in several of the United States, have justly excited reflection and inquiry; and, in searching for the causes of those crimes for which so many fellow beings have been sentenced to the gallows, your memorialists have been impressed with a belief that much may justly be imputed to the practice of privateering in time of war.* They are aware that this practice has long been sanctioned by all the maritime Powers of Christendom, but they cannot, on that account, regard it as the less to be deplored or the less to be abhorred. It is in their view of the same character with the practice of the States of Barbary, for which the people of those regions are reproached as piratical barbarians.

In the course of the late war between Great Britain and the United States, many thousands of people were licensed by the two Governments to commit just such acts of injustice, depredation, and violence, as those for which pirates are hanged in time of peace. They were commissioned to capture, rob, or destroy, the property of innocent merchants, and, in case of resistance, to maim or murder innocent seamen while pursuing their lawful occupations. In this way hundreds of merchants in the two countries were unjustly despoiled of their property, many of them ruined, and their families reduced to poverty, wretchedness, and despair. The number of seamen who lost their lives in consequence of these licensed depredations was doubtless very considerable.

It is impossible for your memorialists to conceive how such deeds of rapine and violence can be reconciled to the principles of justice or humanity, when done by privateersmen, any more than when done by unauthorized pirates. The injustice and injury to the innocent sufferers are the same in both cases, and in both the motives and dispositions of the perpetrators may be the same.

As in the business of privateering all the odious passions of human nature are licensed—as the youth of our country become associated with desperate and unprincipled men let loose from every moral restraint—what better can reasonably be expected than that many of them will, after the close of the war, follow the trade to which they had been educated? When thousands of our citizens have served an apprenticeship in such an employment, can it be wonderful if hundreds of them become pirates or highway robbers? And if they become hardened in iniquity, inured to crime, and ruined by the education which they thus receive, at whose hands will their blood be required? This is a question which, in the opinion of your memorialists, deserves the serious consideration of every legislator, every magistrate, and every citizen of the United States. However necessary it may be, in the present state of society, to inflict capital punishments on piratical offenders, still philanthropy must weep and humanity recoil at the thought of taking the lives of men for crimes to which they have been trained up by the Government, and by the authorized customs of their country.

In this age of improvement it will generally be

* If we may credit the narratives of the four pirates who were executed in Boston, February 18, 1819, they had all been concerned in privateering, or State piracy; not all, however, by license from our Government.

Application to abolish Privateering in time of War.

admitted in theory, that rulers should ever exercise a tender and parental care towards their subjects, do all in their power to cause them to be educated in the paths of benevolence and virtue, and to preserve them from the snares of vice, and the influence of contaminating customs. Punishments are not the only nor the most effectual means of preventing crimes or saving men from vice. A virtuous education is infinitely preferable to sanguinary laws, as a means of preserving men from those crimes which are usually punished with death; and no laws, however severe, can reasonably be expected to prevent crimes, while such schools of depravity and licentiousness as those of privateering are sanctioned by public authority. It is, therefore, believed by your memorialists, that the principles of justice, humanity, religion, and sound policy, all unite in demanding the abolition of such seminaries of crime.

It is a gratifying fact that, in the infancy of the American Government, an attempt was made by our rulers to effect by treaties the very object of the present memorial. As early as 1785, the celebrated philosopher, Dr. Franklin, in a letter to a friend,* observed, that "the United States, though better situated than any other nation to profit by privateering, are, as far as in them lies, endeavoring to abolish the practice, by offering, in all their treaties with other Powers, an article, engaging solemnly that, in case of a future war, no privateer shall be commissioned on either side, and that unarmed merchant ships on both sides shall pursue their voyages unmolested." This humane effort on the part of the American Government, at so early a period, affords encouragement to your memorialists that Congress will listen with pleasure to a proposition for abolishing a practice which has justly been termed "a remnant of ancient piracy," and which has for ages been a disgrace to civilized nations, and the abhorrence of good men.

Though the magnanimous proposition formerly made was not generally adopted by other Governments, yet your memorialists are of opinion that the people of Europe are more enlightened than they were thirty-five years ago, and that there is much reason to believe that a similar proposition at this period would meet the approbation of nearly all the Powers of Christendom. To repeat or renew a proposition so philanthropic and humane, will not by enlightened men be regarded as beneath the dignity of any Government on earth; and, as the proposition probably originated in the United States, your memorialists have a strong desire that their own Government should have the honor of reviving it, and of pursuing the object till it shall have been completely accomplished.

Barbarians and unprincipled politicians might find a motive for continuing the practice in the circumstance mentioned by Dr. Franklin, that "the United States are better situated than any other nation to profit by privateering." But can the enlightened legislators of this country deem it proper to "do evil that good may come?" Can any considerations of profit induce them to continue a practice so palpably unjust in its nature and operations, so ruinous to the morals of their fellow-citizens, and which furnishes such a multitude of convicts for the State prisons and the gallows?

During a time of general peace it may naturally be expected that the rulers of Christendom will more impartially examine the subject, if proposed to them, than in a time when their passions are excited by war. The present state of the world is, therefore, deemed favorable for accomplishing the object of this memorial.

In regard to the best course for abolishing the practice in question, your memorialists would not undertake to prescribe, but confide in the wisdom of their Representatives in Congress. They have no fear that any method will be adopted to effect the abolition of privateering, which can more endanger the best interests of the country than a continuance of the custom. They, however, most respectfully and fervently pray that Congress would devise and adopt some plan which shall free our nation from the reproach of being supporters of a practice which every enlightened mind must deprecate and abhor.

The undersigned beg leave to close their memorial to the honorable Legislature of the United States in the words of Dr. Franklin, on the same subject: "This will be a happy improvement in the law of nations. The humane and the just cannot but wish success to the proposition."

An Act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose.

Be it enacted, &c., That the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia," and the act supplementary to the same, passed on the twenty-fourth of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four, and the act, entitled "An act further to amend the charter of the City of Washington," and all other acts or parts of acts, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That the Mayor, the members of the Board of Aldermen, and members of the Board of Common Council of the corporation of the said city, shall and may remain and continue as such for and during the terms for which they have been respectively appointed, subject to the terms and conditions in such cases legally made and provided; and all acts or things done, or which may be done by them in pursuance to the provisions, or by virtue of the authority of the said acts, or either of them, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be valid, and of as full force and effect as if the said acts had not have been repealed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the City of Washington shall continue to be a body politic and corporate, by the name of the "Mayor, Board of Aldermen, and Board of Common Council, of the City of Washington," to be elected by ballot, as hereinafter directed; and, by their corporate name, may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, grant, receive, and do all other acts as natural persons, and may purchase and hold real, personal, and mixed property, or dispose of the same, for the benefit of the city; and may have and use a city seal, and break and alter the same at pleasure.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Mayor of the said city shall be elected on the first Monday in June next, and on the same day in every second year thereafter, at the same time and place, in the same manner, and by the persons qualified to vote for members of the Board of Aldermen and the Board of Common Council. That the commissioners hereinafter mentioned shall make out duplicate certificates of the result of the election of Mayor; and shall return one to the Board of Aldermen, and the other to the Board of Common Council, on the Monday next ensuing the election; and the person having the greatest number of votes shall be the Mayor; but in case two or more persons, highest in vote, shall have an equal number of votes, then it shall be lawful for the Board of Aldermen and the Board of Common Council to proceed, forthwith, by ballot, in joint meeting, to determine the choice between such persons. The Mayor shall, on the Monday next ensuing his election, before he enters on the duties of his office, in the presence of the Boards of Aldermen and Common Council, in joint meeting, take an oath, to be administered by a justice of the peace, "lawfully to execute the duties of his office, to the best of his skill and judgment, without favor or partiality." He shall, ex officio, have and exercise all the powers, authority, and jurisdiction, of a justice of the peace for the county of Washington, within the said county. He shall nominate, and, with the consent of the Board of Aldermen, appoint to all offices under the corporation, (except commissioners of election,) and may remove any such officer from office at his will and pleasure. He shall appoint persons to fill up all vacancies which may occur during the recess of the Board of Aldermen, to hold such appointments until the end of the then ensuing session. He may convene the two Boards when, in his opinion, the public good may require it; and he shall lay before them, from time to time, in writing, such alterations in the laws of the corporation as he may deem necessary and proper; and he shall receive for his services, annually, a just and reasonable compensation, to be allowed and fixed by the two Boards, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during his continuance in office. Any person shall be eligible to the office of Mayor who is a free white male citizen of the United States, who shall have attained to the age of thirty years, who shall have resided in the said city for two years immediately preceding his election, and who shall be the bona fide owner of a freehold estate in the said city; and no other person shall be eligible to the said office. In case of the refusal of any person to accept the office of Mayor, upon his election thereto, or of his death, resignation, inability, or removal from the city, the said Boards shall assemble and elect another in his place, to serve for the remainder of the term, or during such inability.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Board of Aldermen shall consist of two members, to be residents in, and chosen from, each ward, by the qualified voters therein, and to be elected for two years, from the Monday next ensuing their election; and the Board of Common Council shall consist of three members, to be residents in, and chosen from, each ward, by the qualified voters therein, and to be elected for one year, from the Monday next ensuing their election; and each Board shall meet at the Council Chamber, on the second Monday in June next, for the despatch of business, at ten o'clock in the morning, and at the same hour on the second Monday in June, in every year thereafter; and at such other times as the two Boards may, by law, direct. A majority of each Board shall be necessary to form a quorum to do business, but a less number may adjourn from day to day; they may compel the attendance of absent members in such manner, and under such penalties, and allow such compensation for the attendance of the members, as they may, by law, provide; each Board shall appoint its own President, who shall preside during its sessions, and who shall be entitled to vote on all questions; they shall settle their rules of proceedings, appoint their own officers, regulate their respective compensations, and remove them at pleasure; and may, with the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole, expel any member for disorderly behavior, or misconduct in office, but not a second time for the same offence; each Board shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and the yeas and nays shall be entered thereon, at the request of any member; and their deliberations shall be public. All ordinances or acts, passed by the two Boards, shall be sent to the Mayor for his approbation, and, when approved by him, shall be obligatory as such. But, if the Mayor shall not approve of any ordinance or act, so sent to him, he shall return the same within five days, with his reasons in writing therefor; and if two-thirds of both Boards, on reconsideration thereof, agree to pass the same, it shall be in force, in like manner as if he had approved it; but, if the two Boards shall, by their adjournment, prevent its return, the same shall not be obligatory.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be eligible to a seat in the Board of Aldermen or Board of Common Council unless he shall be more than twenty-five years of age, a free white male citizen of the United States, and shall have been a resident of the City of Washington for one year next preceding the day of election, and shall, at the time of his election, be a resident of the ward for which he shall be elected, and be then the bona fide owner of a freehold estate in the said city, and shall have been assessed on the books of the corporation, for the year ending on the thirty-first of December next preceding the day of election. And every free white male citizen of the United States, of lawful age, who shall have resided in the City of Washington for one year next preceding the day of election, and shall be a resident of the ward in which he shall offer to vote, and who shall have been assessed, on the books of the corporation, for the year ending on the thirty-first day of December next preceding the day of election, and who shall have paid all taxes legally assessed and due on personal property, when legally required to pay the same, and no other person, shall be entitled to vote at any election for members of the two Boards. And it shall be the duty of the Register of the city, or such officer as the corporation may hereafter direct, to furnish the commissioners of election, in each ward, previous to opening the polls, at every election, a list of the persons having a right to vote, agreeably to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That an election for members of the Board of Aldermen, and Board of Common Council, shall be held on the first Monday of June next, and on the first Monday in June annually thereafter; and all elections shall be held by three commissioners to be appointed in each ward, by the two boards in joint meeting, which appointment shall be at least ten days previous to the day of each election. And it shall be the duty of the commissioners so appointed to give at least five days' previous public notice of the place in each ward where such elections are to be held. The commissioners shall, before they receive any ballot, severally take an oath or affirmation, to be administered by some justice of the peace for the county of Washington, "truly and faithfully to receive and return the votes of such persons as are by law entitled to vote for members of the Board of Aldermen and Board of Common Council, in their respective wards, according to the best of their judgment and understanding; and not knowingly to receive or return the vote of any person who is not legally entitled to the same." The polls shall be opened at ten o'clock in the morning, and be closed at seven o'clock in the evening of the same day. Immediately on closing the polls, the said commissioners for each ward, or a majority of them, shall count the ballots, and make out, under their hands and seals, a correct return of the persons having the greatest number of legal votes for members of the Board of Aldermen, and for members of the Board of Common Council, respectively, together with the number of votes given to each person voted for; and the persons having the greatest number of votes for the two Boards respectively, shall be duly elected, and, in all cases of an equality of votes, the commissioners shall decide the choice by lot. The said returns shall be delivered to the Mayor, on the day succeeding the election, who shall cause the result of the election to be published in some newspaper printed in the City of Washington; a duplicate return shall, together with a list of the persons who voted at such election, also be made on the day succeeding the election, to the register of the city, who shall preserve and record the same; and shall, within two days thereafter, notify the several persons, so returned, of their election. And each Board shall judge of the legality of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members, and shall supply vacancies in its own body, by causing elections to be held to fill the same, and appoint commissioners to hold the same; and such commissioners shall give at least five days' public notice of the time and place of holding such elections; each of the members of either Board shall, before entering on the duties of his office, take an oath or affirmation "faithfully to execute the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and ability," which oath or affirmation shall be administered by the Mayor or some justice of the peace for the county of Washington.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the corporation aforesaid shall have full power and authority to lay and collect taxes upon the real and personal property within the said city, provided that no tax shall be laid upon real property, at a higher rate than three-quarters of one per centum on the assessment valuation thereof, except for the special purposes hereinafter provided; and that no tax shall be laid upon the wearing apparel, or necessary tools and implements used in carrying on the trade or occupation of any person; nor shall the same be subject to distress and sale for any tax; and, after providing for all objects of a general nature, the taxes raised on the assessable property in each ward shall be expended therein,

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the clerk of the circuit court, and the register of wills, for the county of Washington, respectively, shall furnish the register of the city, or other officer of the Corporation, appointed to receive the same, on or about the first Monday in January and July, in every year, correct lists of the transfers of real property in the city, during the next preceding half year, as far as can be ascertained by the records in their respective offices; and the said Corporation shall make to the said clerk and register of wills such compensation therefor, as shall be agreed on between the respective parties, not exceeding six cents for each transfer on such lists.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, or other person appointed to superintend the United States' disbursements in the City of Washington, shall reimburse to the said corporation a just proportion of any expense which may hereafter be incurred in laying open, paving, or otherwise improving, any of the streets or avenues in front of or adjoining to, or which may pass through or between, any of the public squares or reservations; which proportion shall be determined by a comparison of the length of the front or fronts of the said squares or reservations of the United States on any such street or avenue, with the whole extent of the two sides thereof; and he shall cause the curb-stones to be set, and foot-ways to be paved, on the side or sides of any such street or avenue, whenever the said corporation shall by law direct such improvements to be made by the proprietors of the lots on the opposite side of any such street or avenue, or adjacent to any such square or reservation; and he shall cause the foot-ways to be paved, and the curb-stones to be set, in front of any lot or lots belonging to the United States, when the like improvements shall be ordered by the corporation, in front of the lots adjoining or squares adjacent thereto; and he shall defray the expenses directed by this section out of any moneys arising from the sale of lots in the City of Washington belonging to the United States, and from no other fund.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the present Boards of Aldermen and Common Council shall, before the last Monday in May next, divide the said city into as many wards as in their opinion shall be most conducive to the interests of the city; and the Boards of Aldermen and Common Council may from time to time, as the interests of the city shall require, alter the number and boundaries of the said wards: Provided, That the said wards shall at all times be so laid off, altered, and bounded, that each ward shall comprise, as near as may be, an equal number of the inhabitants of the said city: And provided, however, That if such division shall not be made prior to the said last Monday in May, then the said city shall be divided into six wards, in manner following, to wit: All that part of said city westward of Sixteenth street west shall constitute the first; that part to the eastward of Sixteenth street west, and to the westward of Tenth street west, shall constitute the second; that part to the eastward of Tenth street west, to the westward of First street west, and to the northward of E street south, shall constitute the third;

The expenses which may be incurred in improving and repairing the streets which form the boundaries of the several wards shall be defrayed out of the taxes raised in the several wards which adjoin the same, respectively, in equal proportions; and the present Boards of Aldermen and Common Council shall, before the first Monday in June next, apportion by law such portions of the debt of the city as have been heretofore chargeable to the existing wards amongst the wards established by this section, upon just and equitable principles. And the Board of Aldermen shall, so soon as the same shall have been organized, on the second Monday in June next, divide the members into two classes, in manner following, to wit: Those members who are now in office, and by virtue of their election in June last shall be entitled to take their seats in the new board, as members from the wards in which they shall respectively reside, shall be placed in the first class; and those members who shall be elected from the same wards in June next shall be placed in the second class; and the other members shall be placed in their respective classes by lot; and the seats of the first class shall be vacated at the end of the first year, and the seats of the second class shall be vacated at the end of the second year; so that one member shall be elected in each ward every year thereafter. And the members of the Board of Aldermen shall be hereafter ex officio justices of the peace for the county of Washington, unless holding commissions in the Army or Navy of the United States.

Approved, May 15, 1820.

An Act providing for the better organization of the Treasury Department.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of such officer of the Treasury Department as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, designate for that purpose, as the agent of the Treasury, to direct and superintend all orders, suits, or proceedings, in law or equity, for the recovery of money, chattels, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, in the name, and for the use, of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of September next, if any collector of the revenue, receiver of public money, or other officer, who shall have received the public money before it is paid into the Treasury of the United States, shall fail to render his account, or pay over the same in the manner, or within the time, required by law, it shall be the duty of the

First Comptroller of the Treasury to cause to be stated the account of such collector, receiver of public money, or other officer, exhibiting truly the amount due to the United States, and certify the same to the agent of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and required to issue a warrant of distress against such delinquent officer and his sureties, directed to the marshal of the district in which such delinquent officer and his surety or sureties shall reside; and where the said officer and his surety or sureties shall reside in different districts, or where they, or either of them, shall reside in a district other than that in which the estate of either may be situate, which may be intended to be taken and sold, then such warrant shall be directed to the marshals of such districts, and to their deputies, respectively; therein specifying the amount with which such delinquent is chargeable, and such sums, if any, which have been paid. And the marshal authorized to execute such warrant, shall, by himself or by his deputy, proceed to levy and collect the sum remaining due, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of such delinquent officer, having given ten days' previous notice of such intended sale, by affixing an advertisement of the articles to be sold at two or more public places in the town or county where the said goods or chattels were taken, or in the town or county where the owner of such goods or chattels may reside; and if the goods and chattels be not sufficient to satisfy the said warrant, the same may be levied upon the person of such officer, who may be committed to prison, there to remain until discharged by due course of law. Notwithstanding the commitment of such officer, or if he abscond, or if goods and chattels cannot be found sufficient to satisfy the said warrant, the marshal or his deputy may and shall proceed to levy and collect the sum which remains due by such delinquent officer, by the distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the surety or sureties of such officer; having given ten days' previous notice of such intended sale, by affixing an advertisement of the articles to be sold at two or more public places in the town or county where the said goods or chattels were taken, or in the town or county where the owner of such goods or chattels resides. And the amount due by any such officer as aforesaid shall be, and the same is hereby declared to be, a lien upon the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, of such officer and his sureties, from the date of a levy in pursuance of the warrant of distress issued against him or them, and a record thereof made in the office of the clerk of the district court of the proper district, until the same shall be discharged according to law. And for want of goods and chattels of such officer, or his surety or sureties, sufficient to satisfy any warrant of distress issued pursuant to the provisions of this act, the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, of such officer, and his surety or sureties, or so much thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, after being advertised for at least three weeks in not less than three public places in the county or district where such real estate is situate, prior to the time of sale, may and shall be sold by the marshal of such district or his deputy; and for all lands, tenements, or hereditaments, sold in pursuance of the authority aforesaid, the conveyance of the marshals or their deputies, executed in due form of law, shall give valid title against all persons claiming under such delinquent officer, or his surety or sureties. And all moneys which may remain of the proceeds of such sales, after satisfying the said warrant of distress, and paying the reasonable costs and charges of the sale, shall be returned to such delinquent officer or surety, as the case may be: Provided, That the summary process herein directed shall not affect any surety of any officer of the United States, who became bound to the United States before the passing of this act; but each and every such officer shall, on or before the thirtieth day of September next, give new and sufficient sureties for the performance of the duties required of such officer.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of September next, if any officer employed, or who has heretofore been employed, in the civil, military, or naval departments of the Government, to disburse the public money appropriated for the service of those departments, respectively, shall fail to render his account, or to pay over, in the manner, and in the times, required by law, or the regulations of the department to which he is accountable, any sum of money remaining in the hands of such officer, it shall be the duty of the First or Second Comptroller of the Treasury, as the case may be, who shall be charged with the revision of the accounts of such officer, to cause to be stated, and certify, the account of such delinquent officer to the agent of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and required immediately to proceed against such delinquent officer, in the manner directed in the preceding section, all the provisions of which are hereby declared to be applicable to every officer of the Government charged with the disbursement of the public money, and to their sureties, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if they had been described and enumerated in the said section: Provided, nevertheless, That the said agent of the Treasury, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, in cases arising under this or the preceding section, may postpone, for a reasonable time, the institution of the proceedings required by this act, where, in his opinion, the public interest will sustain no injury by such postponement.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person should consider himself aggrieved by any warrant issued under this act, he may prefer a bill of complaint to any district judge of the United States, setting forth therein the nature and extent of the injury of which he complains, and thereupon the judge aforesaid may, if in his opinion the case requires it, grant an injunction to stay proceedings on such warrant altogether, or for so much thereof as the nature of the case requires; but no injunction shall issue till the party applying for the same shall give bond, and sufficient security, conditioned for the performance of such judgment as shall be awarded against the complainant, in such amount as the judge granting the injunction shall prescribe; nor shall the issuing of such injunction in any manner impair the lien produced by the issuing of such warrant. And the same proceedings shall be had on such injunction as in other cases, except that no answer shall be necessary on the part of the United States; and if, upon dissolving the injunction, it shall appear, to the satisfaction of the judge who shall decide upon the same, that the application for the injunction was merely for delay, in addition to the lawful interest which shall be assessed on all sums which may be found due against the complainant, the said judge is hereby authorized to add such damages as that, with the lawful interest, it shall not exceed the rate of ten per centum per annum on the principal sum.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That such injunction may be granted or dissolved by such judge, either in or out of court.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall consider himself aggrieved by the decision of such judge, either in refusing to issue the injunction, or, if granted, on its dissolution, it shall be competent for such person to lay a copy of the proceedings had before the district judge, before a judge of the Supreme Court, to whom authority is hereby given, either to grant the injunction, or permit an appeal, as the case may be, if, in the opinion of such judge of the Supreme Court, the equity of the case requires it; and thereupon the same proceedings shall be had upon such injunction, in the circuit court, as are prescribed in the district court, and subject to the same conditions in all respects whatsoever.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the attorneys of the United States, for the several judicial districts of the United States, in the prosecution of all suits in the same, in the name and for the benefit of the United States, shall conform to such directions and instructions, touching the same, as shall, from time to time, be given to them respectively, by the said agent of the Treasury. And it shall, moreover, be the duty of each of the said attorneys, immediately after the end of every term of the district and circuit courts, or of any State court, in which any suit or action may be pending, on behalf of the United States, under the direction of any district attorney, to forward to the said agent of the Treasury a statement of the cases which have been decided, during the said term, together with such information touching such cases as may not have been decided, as may be required by the said officer.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the clerks of the district and circuit courts, within thirty days after the adjournment of each successive term of the said courts respectively, to forward to the said agent of the Treasury a list of all judgments and decrees which have been entered in the said courts respectively, during such term, to which the United States are parties, showing the amount which has been so adjusted or decreed for or against the United States, and stating the term to which execution thereon will be returnable. And it shall, in like manner, be the duty of the marshals of the several judicial districts of the United States, within thirty days before the commencement of the several terms of the said courts, to make returns to the said agent, of the proceedings which have taken place upon all writs of execution or other process which have been placed in his hands for the collection of the money which had been so adjudged and decreed to the United States, in the said courts respectively.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to take away or impair any right or remedy which the United States now have, by law, for the recovery of taxes, debts, or demands.
